INTRODUCTION

Lincoln, the Incarnation of the Union [1]

THE war of sections, inevitable to the conflict of systems but long delayed by the compromises of patriotism, did two things which surpass in importance and value all other things: it confirmed the Federal Union as a nation, and it brought the American people to the fruition of their manhood. Before that war we were a huddle of petty sovereignties held together by a rope of sand; we were as a community of children playing at government. Hamilton felt it, Marshall feared it, Clay ignored it, Webster evaded it. Their passionate clinging to the Constitution and the flag, bond and symbol of an imperfect if not tentative compact, confessed it. They were the intellectual progenitors of Abraham Lincoln. He became the incarnation of the brain and soul of the Union. "My paramount object," said he, "is to save the Union, and not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could do it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would do that."

In the sense of security which his travail and martyrdom achieved for us we are apt to forget that it was not a localized labor system but institutional freedom which was at stake; that African slavery was the merest relic of a semi-barbarism shared in the beginning by all the people, but at length driven by certain laws of nature and trade into a corner, where it was making a stubborn but futile stand; that the real issue was free government, made possible by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and inseparable from the maintenance of the Union. If the Union failed, freedom failed.

The trend of modern thought was definitely set against human slavery; but outside the American Union the idea of human freedom had gone no further than limited monarchy. Though he came to awaken the wildest passions of the time, the negro was but an incident —never a principal—to the final death-grapple between the North and the South.

No man of his time understood this so perfectly, embodied it so adequately, as Abraham Lincoln. The primitive Abolitionists saw only one side of the shield, the original secessionists only the other side. Lincoln saw both sides. His political philosophy was expounded in four elaborate speeches: one delivered at Peoria, Illinois, the 16th of October, 1854; one at Springfield, Illinois, the 16th of June, 1858; one at Columbus, Ohio, the 16th of September, 1859; and one at Cooper Institute, in New York City, the 27th of February, 1860. Of course he made many speeches and very good speeches, but these four, progressive in character, contain the sum and substance of his creed touching the organic character of the Government, and at the same time express his personal and party view of contemporary affairs. They show him to have been an old-line Whig of the school of Henry Clay, with strong emancipation leanings; a thorough anti-slavery man, but never an extremist or an Abolitionist. To the last he hewed to the line thus laid down.

It is essential to a complete understanding of Mr. Lincoln's relation to the time and of his place in the history of the country that the student peruse closely those four speeches: they underlie all that passed in the famous debate with Douglas, all that their author said and did after he succeeded to the presidency. They will always stand as masterpieces of popular oratory. The debate with Douglas, however—assuredly the most extraordinary intellectual spectacle in the annals of our party warfare—best tells the story and crystalizes it. Lincoln entered the canvass unknown outside the State of Illinois. He ended it renowned from one end of the land to the other.

Judge Douglas was himself unsurpassed as a ready debater, but in that campaign, from first to last, he was at a serious disadvantage. His bark rode an ebbing tide, Lincoln's a flowing tide. African slavery had become the single issue now; and, as I have said, the trend of modern thought was against slavery. The Democrats seemed hopelessly divided. The Little Giant had to face a triangular opposition embracing the Republicans, the Administration, or Buchanan, Democrats, and a remnant of the old Whigs, who fancied that their party was still alive and might hold some kind of a balance of power. Judge Douglas called the combination the "allied army," and declared that he would deal with it "just as the Russians dealt with the allies at Sebastopol; that is, the Russians did not stop to inquire, when they fired a broadside, whether it hit an Englishman, a Frenchman, or a Turk." It was something more than a witticism when Mr. Lincoln rejoined, "In that case I beg he will indulge us while we suggest to him that those allies took Sebastopol."

He followed this center-shot with volley after volley, of exposition so clear, of reasoning so close, of illustration so homely and sharp, and, at times, of humor so incisive, that, though he lost his election—though the allies did not then take Sebastopol—his defeat counted for more than Douglas's victory, for it made him the logical and successful candidate for President of the United States two years later.

What could be more captivating to an outdoor audience than Lincoln's description "of the two persons who stand before the people as candidates for the Senate," to quote his prefatory words? "Judge Douglas," he said, "is of world-wide renown. All the anxious politicians of his party . . . have been looking upon him as certainly . . . to be President of the United States. They have seen in his round, jolly, fruitful face post-offices, land-offices, marshalships, and cabinet appointments, chargeships, and foreign missions bursting and spreading out in wonderful exuberance, ready to be laid hold of by their greedy hands. And as they have been gazing upon this attractive picture so long they cannot, in the little distraction that has taken place in the party, bring themselves to give up the charming hope; but with greedier anxiety they rush about him, sustain him, and give him marches, triumphal entries and receptions, beyond what in the days of his highest prosperity they could have brought about in his favor. On the contrary, nobody has ever expected me to be President. In my poor, lean, lank face nobody has ever seen that any cabbages were sprouting."

As the debates advanced these cheery tones deepened into harsher notes; crimination and recrimination followed; the gladiators were strung to their utmost tension. They became dreadfully in earnest. Personal collision was narrowly avoided. I have recently gone over the entire debate, and with a feeling I can only describe as most contemplative, most melancholy.

I knew Judge Douglas well; I admired, respected, loved him. I shall never forget the day he quitted Washington to go to his home in Illinois to return no more. We sat down together in a doorway. "What are you going to do?" said he. "Judge Douglas," I answered, "we have both fought to save the Union; you in your great way and I in my small way; and we have lost. I am going to my home in the mountains of Tennessee, where I have a few books, and there I mean to stay." Tears were in his eyes, and his voice trembled like a woman's. He was then a dying man. He had burned the candle at both ends; an eager, ardent, hard-working, pleasure-loving man; and although not yet fifty the candle was burned out. His infirmities were no greater than those of Mr. Clay; not to be mentioned with those of Mr. Webster. But he lived in more exacting times. The old-style party organ, with its mock heroics and its dull respectability, its beggarly array of empty news columns and cheap advertising, had been succeeded by that unsparing, telltale scandal-monger, Modern Journalism, with its myriad of hands and eyes, its vast retinue of detectives, and its quick transit over flashing wires, annihilating time and space. Too fierce a light beat upon the private life of public men, and Douglas suffered from this, as Clay and Webster, Silas Wright, and Franklin Pierce had not suffered.

The presidential bee was in his bonnet, certainly; but its buzzing there was not noisier than in the bonnets of many other great Americans who have been dazzled by the presidential mirage. His plans and schemes came to naught. He died at the moment when the death of those plans and schemes was made more palpable and impressive by the roar of cannon proclaiming the reality of the "irrepressible conflict" he had refused to foresee and had struggled to avert. His lifelong rival was at the head of affairs. No one has found occasion to come to the rescue of his fame. No party interest has been identified with his memory. But when the truth of history is written it will be told that, no less than Webster and Clay, he, too, was a patriotic man, who loved his country and tried to save the Union. He tried to save the Union, even as Webster and Clay had tried to save it, by compromises and expedients. It was too late. That string was played out. Where they had succeeded he failed; but, for the nobility of his intention, the amplitude of his resources, the splendor of his combat, he merits all that any leader of a losing cause ever gained in the regard of posterity; and posterity will not deny him the title of statesman.

In those famous debates it was Titan against Titan; and, perusing them after the lapse of forty years, the philosophic critic will conclude which got the better of it, Lincoln or Douglas, much according to his sympathy with the one or the other. If Douglas had lived he would have become as Lincoln's right hand. Already, when he died, Lincoln was beginning to look to him and to lean upon him. Four years later they were joined together again on fame's eternal camping ground, each followed to the grave by a mourning people.

As I have said, Abraham Lincoln was an old-line Whig of the school of Henry Clay, with strong free-soil opinions, never an extremist or an Abolitionist. He was what they used to call in those old days "a Conscience Whig." He stood in awe of the Constitution and his oath of office. Hating slavery, he recognized its legal existence and its rights under the compact of the organic law. He wanted gradually to extinguish it, not to despoil those who held it as a property interest. He was so faithful to these principles that he approached emancipation not only with anxious deliberation, but with many misgivings. He issued his final proclamation as a military necessity; and, even then, so fair was his nature, he was meditating some kind of restitution.

Thus it came about that he was the one man in public life who could have taken the helm of affairs in 1861 handicapped by none of the resentments growing out of the anti-slavery battle. While Seward, Chase, Sumner, and the rest had been engaged in hand-to-hand combat with the Southern leaders at Washington, Lincoln, a philosopher and a statesman, had been observing the course of events from afar, and, like a philosopher and a statesman, his mind was irradiated and sweetened by the sense of humor. Throughout the contention that preceded the war, amid the passions inevitable to the war itself, not one bitter, proscriptive word escaped his lips or fell from his pen, while there was hardly a day that he was not projecting his great personality between some Southern man or woman and danger.

Had Lincoln lived! In that event it is quite certain that there would have been no era of reconstruction, with its repressive agencies and oppressive legislation. If Lincoln had lived there would have been wanting to the extremism of the time the bloody cue of his taking off to mount the steeds and spur the flanks of vengeance. For Lincoln entertained, with respect to the rehabilitation of the Union, the single wish that the Southern States—to use his familiar phraseology—"should come back home and behave themselves," and if he had lived he would have made this wish effectual as he made everything effectual to which he seriously addressed himself.

His was the genius of common sense. Of admirable intellectual aplomb, he sprang from a Virginia pedigree and was born in Kentucky. He knew all about the South, its institutions, its traditions, and its peculiarities. "If slavery be not wrong," he said, "nothing is wrong," but he also said, and reiterated it time and again: "I have no prejudice against the Southern people. They are just what we would be in their situation. If slavery did not now exist among them they would not introduce it. If it did now exist among us we would not instantly give it up."

The idea of paying the South for the slaves had been all along in his mind. He believed the North equally guilty with the South for the existence of slavery. He clearly understood that the irrepressible conflict was a conflict of systems, not merely a sectional and partisan quarrel. He was a considerate man, abhorring proscription. He wanted to leave the South no right to claim that the North, finding slave labor unremunerative, had sold its negroes to the South and then turned about and by force of arms confiscated what it had unloaded at a profit. He recognized slavery as property. In his message to Congress, of December, 1862, he proposed payment for the slaves, elaborating a scheme in detail and urging it with copious and cogent argument. "The people of the South," said he, addressing a war Congress at that moment in the throes of bloody strife with the South, "are not more responsible for the original introduction of this property than are the people of the North, and, when it is remembered how unhesitatingly we all use cotton and sugar and share the profits of dealing in them, it may not be quite safe to say that the South has been more responsible than the North for its continuance."

This is the language not only of justice, but of far-reaching statesmanship.

Something more than two hundred and sixty years ago there arrived at the front of affairs in England one Cromwell. In the midst of monarchy he made a republic. It had no progenitor. It left no heirs at law. Why such cost of blood and treasure for an interval of freedom so equivocal and brief puzzled the wisest men and remained for centuries a mystery, though it is plain enough now and was long ago conceded, so that at last—dire rebel though he was—the name of Cromwell, held in execration through two hundred years, has a place in the history of the English-speaking races along with the names of William the Conqueror and Richard of the Lion Heart.

That which it took England two centuries to realize we in America have demonstrated within a single generation. Northerner or Southerner, none of us need fear that the future will fail to vindicate our integrity. When those are gone that fought the good fight, and philosophy comes to strike the balance sheet, it will be shown that the makers of the Constitution left the relation of the States to the Federal Government and of the Federal Government to the States open to a double construction. It will be told how the mistaken notion that slave labor was requisite to the profitable cultivation of sugar, rice, and cotton raised a paramount property interest in the Southern section of the Union, while in the Northern, responding to the impulse of modern thought and the outer movements of mankind, there arose a great moral sentiment against slavery. The conflict thus established, gradually but surely sectionalizing party lines, was wrought to bitter and bloody conclusion at Appomattox.

The battle was long though unequal. Let us believe that it was needful to make us a nation. Let us look upon it as into a mirror, seeing not the desolation of the past but the radiance of the present; and in the heroes of the new North and the new South who contested in generous rivalry up the fire-swept steep of El Caney and side by side reëmblazoned the national character in the waters about Corregidor Island and under the walls of Cavite, let us behold hostages for the old North and the old South blent together in a Union that recks not of the four points of the compass, having long ago flung its geography into the sea.

Henry Watterson

CHAPTER I

"The Union Is Perpetual"

[LINCOLN'S FIRST INAUGURAL AND THE DEBATE THEREON]

Speaking Tour of the President-elect on His Way to Washington—Remarks at Springfield, Ill., on "Divine Guidance"; at Indianapolis on "Preservation of the Union the People's Business, Not the President's"; to the Indiana Legislature on "The Union: Is It a Marriage Bond or a Free Love Arrangement?"; at Cincinnati on "Good Will to the South"; to the Ohio Legislature on "Nothing Is Going Wrong"; at Steubenville on "The Majority Should Rule"; at Pittsburgh on "Protection"; at Cleveland on "The Crisis Is Artificial"; at Buffalo on "Waiting for Developments"; at Albany on "President, Not Party Leader"; to the New York Legislature on "Reliance on the People"; at Poughkeepsie on "Standing by the Pilot"; at New York on "A Time for Silence" and "Save the Ship and Cargo—if Not Both, Then the Ship"; to the Senate of New Jersey on "The Liberty Inherited from the Fathers"; to the House of Representatives of New Jersey on "Putting the Foot Down Firmly"; at Philadelphia on "The Teachings of Independence Hall"; "The Principles of the Declaration," and "The Flag of the Union"; at Harrisburg on "The Men of Peace"; at Washington on "Misunderstanding Between the Sections"—His First Inaugural Address: "The Chorus of the Union"—Debate in the Senate upon the Address: Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.], Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.], Louis T. Wigfall [Tex.], James M. Mason [Va.]; Lafayette S. Foster [Conn.] Moves in the House to Expel Senator Wigfall; Motion Is Not Brought to Vote—The Senate Declares That the Seats of Senators from Seceded States Are Vacant.

ON February 11, 1861, the President-elect left his home at Springfield, Ill., to travel by a circuitous route to the national capital, there to be inaugurated on March 4. In a parting speech to his neighbors he expressed a solemn sense of his responsibility and a reliance upon "that Divine Being who ever attended Washington," the first President, upon whom rested a similar responsibility.

tance, he spoke on the tariff, since, even in the stress which was threatening to tear the Union asunder, the citizens of Pennsylvania seemed to be primarily interested in that subject.

On the same day, at Cleveland, he returned to the theme that the crisis was an artificial one.

What they do who seek to destroy the Union is altogether artificial. What is happening to hurt them? Have they not all their rights now as they ever have had? Do not they have their fugitive slaves returned now as ever? Have they not the same Constitution that they have lived under for seventy-odd years? Have they not a position as citizens of this common country, and have we any power to change that position? [Cries of "No!"] What, then, is the matter with them? Why all this excitement? Why all these complaints? As I said before, this crisis is altogether artificial. It has no foundation in fact. It can't be argued up, and it can't be argued down. Let it alone, and it will go down of itself.

At Buffalo on February 16 he excused himself from telling his specific plans to save the Union.

When it is considered that these difficulties are without precedent, and have never been acted upon by any individual situated as I am, it is most proper I should wait and see the developments, and get all the light possible, so that when I do speak authoritatively I may be as near right as possible. When I shall speak authoritatively I hope to say nothing inconsistent with the Constitution, the Union, the rights of all the States, of each State, and of each section of the country, and not to disappoint the reasonable expectations of those who have confided to me their votes.

On February 18 he spoke to the citizens of Albany, saying that he intended to be the President, not of a party, but of the nation. On the same day he addressed the New York legislature, which had tendered him unanimous support, saying that he was the "humblest of all individuals that had been elevated to the Presidency"; and yet, with a more difficult task before him than had confronted any, Mr. Lincoln expressed con-

At Indianapolis, upon the same day, he addressed the citizens, saying: "To the salvation of the Union there needs but a single thing—the hearts of a people like yours." The preservation of the Union, he repeated, "is your business, not mine; not with Presidents, not with politicians, but with you is the question."

To the Indiana legislature he spoke on "The Union: Is it a Marriage Bond or a Free Love Arrangement?" claiming that the South regarded it as the latter. "Coercion," he said, could not properly be applied to the enforcement of Federal laws in South Carolina, but it could be so applied to the attempt of that State, being not one fiftieth part of the nation in soil and population, to break up the nation and force a proportionally larger subdivision of itself (the Union men in the State) into compliance with the act.

To the citizens of Cincinnati, on February 12, being on the border of the slave States, he expressed good will to the South, repeating a former speech which he had made in the city in 1859, in which he said: "We mean to treat you, as near as we possibly can, as Washington, Jefferson, and Madison treated you. We mean to leave you alone, and in no way to interfere with your institutions, to abide by all and every compromise of the Constitution."

On February 13 he addressed the Ohio legislature at Columbus, assuring them that he had not hitherto preserved silence on the state of the country from any want of real anxiety, as had been charged. Anxiety he felt, but not alarm, for "there is nothing going wrong." "Time, patience, and a reliance on that God who has never forsaken this people" would save the Union.

On February 14 he addressed the citizens of Steubenville, O., on the subject: "The Majority Should Rule." Where is there a judge to be found between the majority and the minority? Since one of the two, therefore, must rule, shall we submit to the minority? Would that be right? Would it be just or generous?

At Pittsburgh on February 15 he declared that the crisis was artificial, and, as if to minimize its impor-fidence in the Almighty that, with the help of the people, these difficulties would be overcome.

On February 19 at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., he expressed the sentiment that, though he had not been the choice of all the people to "pilot the ship of State," he was confident that the defeated party were desirous of "running it through the tempest in safety," and would loyally support him in his endeavor to do so.

On the same day he spoke to the citizens of New York City on the theme, "There Is a Time for Silence." He would wait until the proper moment to announce details of his policy. For the present it sufficed to say that he would propose nothing in conflict with the Constitution, or the Union, or the perpetuation of the liberties of the people.

Replying to the reception accorded him by the mayor of the city, he returned to his former simile of the ship of state, saying that he would save, if possible, both ship and cargo, but, if necessary, the ship without the cargo.

He addressed the Senate and House of the New Jersey legislature at Trenton on February 21. Speaking to the Senate on the revolutionary memories aroused by the name of the State capital, he implored them to save the liberty inherited from the Fathers of the country. To the House he said, adverting to the fact that most of them were his political opponents, he would perform his duties in no partisan spirit.

I shall do all that may be in my power to promote a peaceful settlement of all our difficulties. The man does not live who is more devoted to peace than I am, none who would do more to preserve it, but it may be necessary to put the foot down firmly. [Here the audience broke out in cheers so loud and long that for some moments it was impossible to hear Mr. Lincoln's voice.] And if I do my duty and do right, you will sustain me, will you not? [Loud cheers and cries of "Yes, yes; we will."]

At Philadelphia on February 21 Mr. Lincoln addressed the citizens on "The Teachings of Independence Hall," pledging himself never to do anything inconsistent with these. On the following day (Washington's birthday) he spoke in Independence Hall. Amplifying his remarks of the former day he said:

I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. I have often pondered over the dangers which were incurred by the men who assembled here and framed and adopted that Declaration. I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the army who achieved that independence. I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of separation of the colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weights would be lifted from the shoulders of all men, and that all should have an equal chance. Now, my friends, can this country be saved on that basis? If it can, I will consider myself one of the happiest men in the world if I can help to save it. If it cannot be saved upon that principle, it will be truly awful. But if this country cannot be saved without giving up that principle I was about to say I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it.[1] Now, in my view of the present aspect of affairs, there is no need of bloodshed and war. There is no necessity for it. I am not in favor of such a course; and I may say in advance that there will be no bloodshed unless it is forced upon the Government. The Government will not use force unless force is used against it.

My friends, this is wholly an unprepared speech. I did not expect to be called on to say a word when I came here. I supposed I was merely to do something toward raising a flag. I may, therefore, have said something indiscreet. [Cries of "No, no."] But I have said nothing but what I am willing to live by, and, if it be the pleasure of Almighty God, to die by.

When the flag to which Mr. Lincoln referred was raised, he called attention to the new star which had been placed upon it for Kansas, admitted into the Union on January 29:

[1] Threats had been made that the President-elect would never take his seat.

I think we may promise ourselves that not only the new star placed upon that flag shall be permitted to remain there to our permanent prosperity for years to come, but additional ones shall from time to time be placed there until we shall number, as it was anticipated by the great historian, five hundred millions of happy and prosperous people.

On the same day, at Harrisburg, Pa., he replied to the welcome of Governor Andrew G. Curtin, saying:

Allusion has been made to the peaceful principles upon which this great commonwealth was originally settled. Allow me to add my meed of praise to those peaceful principles. I hope no one of the Friends who originally settled here, or who lived here since that time, or who lives here now, has been or is a more devoted lover of peace, harmony, and concord than my humble self.

While I have been proud to see to-day the finest military array, I think, that I have ever seen, allow me to say, in regard to those men, that they give hope of what may be done when war is inevitable. But, at the same time, allow me to express the hope that, in the shedding of blood, their services may never be needed, especially in the shedding of fraternal blood. It shall be my endeavor to preserve the peace of this country so far as it can possibly be done consistently with the maintenance of the institutions of the country. With my consent or without my great displeasure, this country shall never witness the shedding of one drop of blood in fraternal strife.

Later he addressed the State legislature in the same vein.

From Harrisburg Mr. Lincoln went secretly to Washington, since those who were managing his tour wished to guard against his assassination on the way, which had been threatened. On his arrival at the national capital he was welcomed by the mayor. Mr. Lincoln assured those present that he had as kindly feeling toward the slaveholding section as toward his own, and was confident that the enmity between the two was only the result of a misunderstanding. Replying to a serenade the next evening (February 28) he repeated his assurances of fair dealing toward the whole country.

On March 4 he delivered his inaugural address before a vast crowd of people assembled from all parts of the country.

A tentative draft of this, the most important of his utterances, Lincoln wrote and had privately printed while at his home in Springfield, Ill. On his way to Washington he gave a copy to his friend, O. H. Browning, at Indianapolis, who suggested that the statement therein that Lincoln would "reclaim" the Federal property in the hands of the secessionists should be omitted, as subject to construction as a threat, and as such unnecessarily aggravating to the South. This suggestion the President adopted. On arriving at Washington Mr. Lincoln gave a copy of the draft to William H. Seward, his appointee as Secretary of State. Mr. Seward suggested two important changes, one that was virtually Mr. Browning's emendation, and the other the omission of a statement that the President would follow the principles of the Republican platform. Referring to the latter, he reminded Lincoln that Jefferson, at a similar crisis when the opposing party sought to dismember the Government, "sank the partisan in the patriot in his inaugural address, and propitiated his adversaries by declaring: 'We are all Federalists, all Republicans.'" Most of Seward's other suggestions related to improvements in rhetoric. His "general remarks" were as follows:

LINCOLN AND SEWARD RUNNING THE UNION ENGINE

The argument is strong and conclusive, and ought not to be in any way abridged or modified.

But something besides or in addition to argument is needful to meet and remove prejudice and passion in the South and despondency in the East.

Some words of affection—some of calm and cheerful confidence.

Mr. Seward submitted two paragraphs of his own as suggestions for closing the speech in a conciliatory and cheerful manner. The second was in that poetic vein which occasionally cropped out in Seward's speeches and writings, and over which Lincoln, on better acquaintance, was wont good-naturedly to rally him. Seward wrote:

I close. We are not, we must not be, aliens or enemies, but fellow countrymen and brethren. Although passion has strained our bonds of affection too hardly, they must not, I am sure they will not, be broken. The mystic chords which, proceeding from so many battlefields and so many patriot graves, pass through all the hearts and all hearths in this broad continent of ours, will yet again harmonize in their ancient music when breathed upon by the guardian angel of the nation.

Lincoln took this paragraph, and by deft touches which reveal a literary taste beyond that of any statesman of his time, transformed it into his peroration. More than anything else in the address, it was the tender spirit and chaste beauty of these closing words that convinced the people that Lincoln measured up to the high mental stature demanded of one who was to be their leader during the most critical period of the life of the nation.

THE CHORUS OF THE UNION

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

The President began by assuring the people of the South that their peace would not be endangered, as they apprehended, by the accession of a Republican Administration. He quoted from one of his former speeches a declaration that he had neither the right nor the intention to interfere with slavery where it existed, and referred to a plank in the Republican platform showing that the same was true of his party.

I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given will be cheerfully given to all the States when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause—as cheerfully to one section as to another.

The return of fugitive slaves he regarded as a constitutional obligation which he and the national legislators were, by their unanimous oaths, bound to see executed. If Congressmen "would make the effort in good temper," he said, "could they not, with nearly equal unanimity, frame and pass a law by means of which to keep good that unanimous oath?"

It mattered little whether the surrender of fugitive slaves was by national or State authority.

If the slave is to be surrendered, it can be of but little consequence to him or to others by which authority it is done. And should anyone in any case be content that his oath shall go unkept on a merely unsubstantial controversy as to how it shall be kept?

However, abuses of the Fugitive Slave act should be remedied so that no free man should be delivered to slavery.

And might it not be well at the same time to provide by law for the enforcement of that clause in the Constitution which guarantees that "the citizen of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?"

He continued:

I take the official oath to-day with no mental reservations, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules. And, while I do not choose now to specify particular acts of Congress as proper to be enforced, I do suggest that it will be much safer for all, both in official and private stations, to conform to and abide by all those acts which stand unrepealed, than to violate any of them, trusting to find impunity in having them held to be unconstitutional.

He then turned to the question of secession.

I hold that, in contemplation of universal law and of the Constitution, the Union of these States is perpetual. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all national governments. It is safe to assert that no government proper ever had a provision in its organic law for its own termination. Continue to execute all the express provisions of our National Constitution, and the Union will endure forever—it being impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself.

Again, if the United States be not a government proper, but an association of States in the nature of contract merely, can it, as a contract, be peaceably unmade by less than all the parties who made it? One party to a contract may violate it—break it, so to speak; but does it not require all lawfully to rescind it?

He argued from history that the Union is perpetual. It is older than the Constitution, having been formed by the Articles of Association in 1774, confirmed by the Declaration of Independence, and specifically plighted as perpetual in the Confederation.

But the Constitution was formed to secure "a more perfect union." Therefore,

If the destruction of the Union by one or by a part only of the States be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost the vital element of perpetuity.

It follows, from these views, that no State, upon its own mere motion, can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence, within any State or States, against the authority of the United States, are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances.

I therefore consider that, in view of the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken; and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States. Doing this I deem to be only a simple duty on my part; and I shall perform it so far as practicable, unless my rightful masters, the American people, shall withhold the requisite means or in some authoritative manner direct the contrary. I trust this will not be regarded as a menace, but only as the declared purpose of the Union that it will constitutionally defend and maintain itself.

In doing this there needs to be no bloodshed or violence; and there shall be none, unless it be forced upon the national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government, and to collect the duties and imposts; but, beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere.

Where hostility to the United States in any interior locality shall be so great and universal as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the Federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among the people for that object. While the strict legal right may exist in the Government to enforce the exercise of these offices, the attempt to do so would be so irritating, and so nearly impracticable withal, that I deem it better to forego for the time the uses of such offices.

The mails, unless repelled, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union. So far as possible, the people everywhere shall have that sense of perfect security which is most favorable to calm thought and reflection. The course here indicated will be followed unless current events and experience shall show a modification or change to be proper, and in every case and exigency my best discretion will be exercised according to circumstances actually existing, and with a view and a hope of a peaceful solution of the national troubles and the restoration of fraternal sympathies and affections.

That there are persons in one section or another who seek to destroy the Union at all events, and are glad of any pretext to do it, I will neither affirm nor deny; but, if there be such, I need address no word to them. To those, however, who really love the Union may I not speak?

Before entering upon so grave a matter as the destruction of our national fabric, with all its benefits, its memories, and its hopes, would it not be wise to ascertain precisely why we do it? Will you hazard so desperate a step while there is any possibility that any portion of the ills you fly from have no real existence? Will you, while the certain ills you fly to are greater than all the real ones you fly from—will you ask the commission of so fearful a mistake?

All profess to be content in the Union if all constitutional rights can be maintained. Is it true, then, that any right, plainly written in the Constitution, has been denied? I think not. Happily, the human mind is so constituted that no party can reach to the audacity of doing this. Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied. If, by the mere force of numbers, a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution—certainly would if such a right were a vital one. But such is not our case. All the vital rights of minorities and of individuals are so plainly assured to them by affirmations and negations, guaranties and prohibitions, in the Constitution, that controversies never arise concerning them. But no organic law can ever be framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may occur in practical administration. No foresight can anticipate, nor any document of reasonable length contain, express provisions for all possible questions. Shall fugitives from labor be surrendered by national or by State authority? The Constitution does not expressly say, May Congress prohibit slavery in the Territories? The Constitution does not expressly say: Must Congress protect slavery in the Territories? The Constitution does not expressly say.

From questions of this class spring all our constitutional controversies, and we divide upon them into majorities and minorities. If the minority will not acquiesce, the majority must, or the Government must cease. There is no other alternative; for continuing the Government is acquiescence on one side or the other.

If a minority in such case will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which in turn will divide and ruin them; for a minority of their own will secede from them whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such minority. For instance, why may not any portion of a new confederacy a year or two hence arbitrarily secede again, precisely as portions of the present Union now claim to secede from it? All who cherish disunion sentiments are now being educated to the exact temper of doing this.

Is there such perfect identity of interests among the States to compose a new Union as to produce harmony only and prevent renewed secession?

Plainly, the central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy. A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or to despotism. Unanimity is impossible; the rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible; so that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left.

I do not forget the position assumed by some that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court; nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government.

And, while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a different practice. At the same time the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the court or the judges. It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them, and it is no fault of theirs if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

One section of our country believes slavery is right and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong and ought not to be extended. This is the only substantial dispute. The fugitive slave clause of the Constitution and the law for the suppression of the foreign slave trade are each as well enforced, perhaps, as any law can ever be in a community where the moral sense of the people imperfectly supports the law itself. The great body of the people abide by the dry legal obligation in both cases, and a few break over in each. This, I think, cannot be perfectly cured; and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before. The foreign slave trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be ultimately revived, without restriction, in one section, while fugitive slaves, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

Physically speaking, we cannot separate. We cannot remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced, and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other; but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face, and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among friends? Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it. I cannot be ignorant of the fact that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the National Constitution amended. While I make no recommendation of amendments, I fully recognize the rightful authority of the people over the whole subject, to be exercised in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself; and I should, under existing circumstances, favor rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to either accept or refuse. I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed

Congress, to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the States, including that of persons held to service. To avoid misconstruction of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments so far as to say that, holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made express and irrevocable.

The Chief Magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have conferred none upon him to fix terms for the separation of the States. The people themselves can do this also if they choose; but the Executive, as such, has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present Government, as it came to his hands, and to transmit it, unimpaired by him, to his successor.

Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In our present differences is either party without faith of being in the right? If the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with his eternal truth and justice, be on your side of the North, or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgment of this great tribunal of the American people.

By the frame of the Government under which we live, this same people have wisely given their public servants but little power for mischief; and have, with equal wisdom, provided for the return of that little to their own hands at very short intervals. While the people retain their virtue and vigilance, no Administration, by any extreme of wickedness or folly, can very seriously injure the Government in the short space of four years. My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time; but no good object can be frustrated by it. Such of you as are now dissatisfied still have the old Constitution unimpaired, and, on the sensitive point, the laws of your own framing under it; while the new Administration will have no immediate power, if it would, to change either. If it were admitted that you who are dissatisfied hold the right side in the dispute, there still is no single good reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty.

In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine is the momentous issue of civil war. The Government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the Government, while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect, and defend it."

I am loath to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

Debate Upon the President's Inaugural

Senate, March 4, 1861

President Buchanan had convened the Senate in special session on March 4 to receive and act upon such communications as might be made by his successor. It so met and was in session until March 28.

Upon motion made to print copies of the inaugural address of President Lincoln, Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.] took occasion to dissent from its views as leading to war with the seceded States.

The President declares expressly that he intends to treat those States as though they were still members of the Union; as though the acts of secession were mere nullities; and, as they claim to be independent, there can be no result except a collision. In plain, unmistakable language he declares that it is his purpose to hold, occupy, and possess the forts and arsenals in those States. We all know that he can hold them only by dispossessing the State authorities. He says, further, that it is his purpose to collect the revenue from those States. Surely I need not argue to any Senator that this must lead to a collision of arms. After we declared independence from Great Britain nobody supposed that the colonies were willing still to pay taxes or duties to the British Government. In point of fact, they refused to pay them even before the Declaration of Independence.

Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.] replied:

Mr. President, I cannot assent to the construction which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Clingman] has placed upon the President's inaugural. I have read it carefully, with a view of ascertaining distinctly what the policy of the Administration is to be. The inaugural is characterized by ability and by directness on certain points; but with such reservations and qualifications as require a critical analysis to arrive at its true construction on other points. I have made such an analysis, and come to the conclusion that it is a peace-offering rather than a war message. I think I can demonstrate that there is no foundation for the apprehension which has been spread through the country that this message is equivalent to a declaration of war; that it commits the President of the United States to recapture the forts in the seceded States, and to hold them at all hazards; to collect the revenue under all circumstances; and to execute the laws in all the States, no matter what may be the circumstances that surround him. I do not understand that to be the character of the message. On the contrary, I understand it to contain a distinct pledge that the policy of the Administration shall be conducted with exclusive reference to a peaceful solution of our national difficulties. True, the President indicates a certain line of policy which he intends to pursue, so far as it may be consistent with the peace of the country; but he assures us that this policy will be modified and changed whenever necessary to a peaceful solution of these difficulties.

The President declares that, in view of the Constitution and laws, the Union remains unbroken. I do not suppose any man can deny the proposition that, in contemplation of law, the Union remains intact, no matter what the fact may be. There may be a separation de facto, temporary or permanent, as the sequel may prove; but, in contemplation of the Constitution and the laws, the Union does remain unbroken. Let us see what there is in the address that is supposed to pledge the President to a coercive policy. He says:

"I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States."

This declaration is relied upon as conclusive evidence that coercion is to be used in the seceding States; but take the next sentence:

"Doing this I deem to be only a simple duty on my part. I shall perform it, so far as is practicable, unless my rightful masters, the American people, shall withhold the requisite means, or in some other authoritative manner direct the contrary."

This condition, on which he will not enforce the laws in the seceding States, is not as explicit as I could desire. When he alludes to his "rightful masters, the American people," I suppose he means the action of Congress withholding the requisite means. Query: does he wish to be understood as saying that the existing laws confer upon him "the requisite means"? or does he mean to say that, inasmuch as the existing laws do not confer the requisite means, he cannot execute the laws in the seceding States unless those means shall be conferred by Congress? The language employed would seem to imply that the President was referring to the future action of Congress as necessary to give him the requisite means to enforce obedience to the laws in the seceding States.

In a subsequent paragraph he says:

"The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government, and to collect the duties and imposts."

What power? Does he mean that which has been confided or that which may be confided? Does he mean that he will exercise the power unless Congress directs the contrary or that he will exercise it when Congress confers it? I regret that this clause is understood by some persons as meaning that the President will use the whole military force of the country to recapture the forts and other places which have been seized without the assent of Congress. If such was his meaning, he was unfortunate in the selection of words to express the idea.

He says further:

"But, beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere."

He will use the power confided to him to hold, occupy, and possess the forts and other property, and to collect the revenue; but beyond these objects he will not use that power. I am unable to understand the propriety of the distinction between enforcing the revenue laws and all other laws. If it is his duty to enforce the revenue laws, why is it not his duty to enforce the other laws of the land? What right has he to say that he will enforce those laws that enable him to raise revenue, to levy and collect taxes from the people, and that he will not enforce the laws which protect the rights of persons and property to the extent that the Constitution confers the power in those States? I reject the distinction; it cannot be justified in law or in morals.

The next paragraph is also objectionable. I will read it:

"Where hostility of the United States in any interior locality shall be so great and universal as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the Federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among the people for that object."

I rejoice to know that he will not attempt to force obnoxious strangers to hold office in the interior places where public sentiment is hostile; but why draw the distinction between "interior localities" and exterior places? Why the distinction between the States in the interior and those upon the seaboard? If he has the power in the one case, he has it in the other; if it be his duty in the one case, it is his duty in the other. There is no provision of the Constitution or the laws which authorizes a distinction between the places upon the seaboard and the places in the interior.

This brings me to the consideration of another clause in the message which I deem the most important of all and the key to his entire policy.

After indicating the line of policy which he would pursue, if consistent with the peace of the country, he tells us emphatically that that course will be followed, unless modifications and changes should be necessary to a peaceful solution of the national troubles; and if in any case or exigency a change of policy should be necessary, it will be made "with a view and hope of a peaceful solution." In other words, if the collection of the revenue leads to a peaceful solution, it is to be collected; if the abandonment of that policy is necessary to a peaceful solution, the revenue is not to be collected; if the recapture of Fort Moultrie would tend to a peaceful solution, he stands pledged to recapture it; if the recapture would tend to violence and war, he is pledged not to recapture it; if the enforcement of the laws in the seceding States would tend to facilitate a peaceful solution, he is pledged to their enforcement; if the omission to enforce those laws would best facilitate peace, he is pledged to omit to enforce them; if maintaining possession of Fort Sumter would facilitate peace, he stands pledged to retain its possession; if, on the contrary, the abandonment of Fort Sumter and the withdrawal of the troops would facilitate a peaceful solution, he is pledged to abandon the fort and withdraw the troops.

Sir, this is the only construction that I can put upon this clause. If this be not the true interpretation, for what purpose was it inserted? The line of policy that he had indicated was stated vaguely; but there is not a pledge to use coercion.

I submit, then, to the Senate whether the friends of peace have not much to rejoice at in the inaugural address of the President. It is a much more conservative document than I had anticipated. It is a much more pacific and conciliatory paper than I had expected. I am clearly of the opinion that the Administration stands pledged by the inaugural to a peaceful solution of all our difficulties, to do no act that leads to war, and to change its policy just so often and whenever a change is necessary to preserve the peace.

Now, sir, far be it from me to intimate that the President, in these recommendations, has not been faithful to the principles of his party, as well as to the honor and safety of his country. Whatever departure from party platforms he has made in these recommendations should be regarded as an evidence of patriotism, and not an act of infidelity. In my opinion, if I have understood the inaugural right, he has sunk the partisan in the patriot, and he is entitled to the thanks of all conservative men to that extent. I do not wish it to be inferred, from anything I have said or have omitted to say, that I have any political sympathy with his Administration, or that I expect that any contingency can happen in which I may be identified with it. I expect to oppose his Administration with all my energy on those great principles which have separated parties in former times; but on this one question—that of preserving the Union by a peaceful solution of our present difficulties; that of preventing any future difficulties by such an amendment of the Constitution as will settle the question by an express provision—if I understand his true intent and meaning, I am with him.

Mr. President, if the result shall prove that I have put a wrong construction on the inaugural, I shall deplore the consequences which a belligerent and aggressive policy may inflict upon our beloved country, without being responsible in any degree for the disasters and calamities which may follow. I believe I have placed upon it its true interpretation. I know I have put the patriotic construction on it. I believe the action of the President will justify that construction. I will never relinquish that belief and hope until he shall have done such acts as render it impossible to preserve the peace of the country and the unity of the States. Sir, this Union cannot be preserved by war. It cannot be cemented by blood. It can be preserved only by peaceful means. And, when our present troubles shall have been settled, future difficulties can be prevented only by constitutional amendments which will put an end to all controversy by express provision. These remedies and preventives have been clearly marked out by the President in his inaugural. All I ask is that his Administration shall adhere to them and carry them out in good faith. Let this be done, and all who join in the good work will deserve, and they will receive, the applause and approbation of a grateful country. No partisan advantage can be taken, no political capital should be made out of a generous act of noble patriotism. While I expect to oppose the Administration upon all the political issues of the day, I trust I shall never hesitate to do justice to those who, by their devotion to the Constitution and the Union, show that they love their country more than their party.

Louis T. Wigfall [Tex.].—It is impossible for the Senator from Illinois, or for any other Senator to rise here, and, by giving a commentary—a construction—of the inaugural to restore peace to the country. It is impossible for the Administration, by dealing in generalities, whether glittering or not, to give peace to the country. It is a fact that seven States have withdrawn from this Union; that they have entered into a new compact with each other; that they have established a government; and I suppose, though it may not have yet been officially announced, as it is a fact that is well known, I may allude to it, they have their representatives now here, prepared to reside near this court, and, waiving all questions of irregularity as to the existence of this Government, to enter into a treaty with it in reference to matters which must be settled, either by treaty or by the sword.

It is easy to indulge in general phraseology; it is easy to write so as to be misunderstood. It is very easy to talk of enforcing the laws; it is very easy to speak of holding, occupying, and possessing forts; but, when you come to holding, occupying, and possessing forts, bayonets and not words settle the question. This Administration will, by action, be forced to construe its inaugural. How will that inaugural be construed? Were it not for these facts which are pressing for solution, it might be that a Union party, both North and South, might be organized; and, were it not for these troublesome things called bayonets, platforms might be adopted to be construed differently on different sides of particular degrees of latitude; but, unfortunately for the Union-savers, these matters are practical, pressing for present solution; and this Government may leave Fort Moultrie, Castle Pinckney, and Fort Johnson in the possession of the Confederate States, but the Confederate States will not leave Fort Sumter in the possession of this Government.

I am one of those who deny that this Union, as it formerly was, now exists legally, constitutionally. The Union has been disrupted. Seven of the high contracting powers have withdrawn from this Government (that now de facto exists at Washington) the powers heretofore exercised by them through this Government, and invested all those powers in their separate State governments first, and then entered into a new compact with each other.

These are facts. How are you going to deal with them? What is a remedy in one stage of a disease is no remedy in another. A blue-mass pill and a cup of coffee next morning will relieve the liver and prevent one from having a fever very frequently; but when the disease is on you, blistering and blood-letting may sometimes be necessary; and when the patient is dead, then it is necessary to have a coffin, a grave-digger, funeral services, and things of that sort; the only question is whether we shall have a decent, peaceable, quiet funeral or whether we shall have an Irish wake.

"Cannot preserve this Union by war!" Why, sir, there is no Union left. You may have reconstruction. The States that are now in the old Union may secede from it to the other, and come into the new Union, and, in the course of time, the thirty-four States may all be living under the same form of government again; but the seven States that have withdrawn from this Union are surely never coming back. If you were to give them a sheet of blank paper, and tell them to write their constitution on it, they would not come in again and live under this Administration. They are out; they have formed a union; they have a constitution, and it is satisfactory to them; and they will not secede again. Our doctrine of secession has been so belittled and so belied that we are beginning to have a downright contemptuous opinion of it ourselves; and we never intend to exercise it again. Other States that have not made the experiment may secede and come to us; Mohammed may come to the mountain, but the mountain will never come to Mohammed.

You have, therefore, to deal with all these things practically. What will you do? Getting up here and making constructions of Mr. Lincoln's message is not the remedy. To have persuaded the people of the seven seceded States at one time that the Republican party was a very conservative, Constitution-loving party might have prevented the act of secession; but it will do no good now. The act of secession has been committed; a new government has been formed, and new remedies must be offered. Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.[1] The question now is not of saving the Union, but of saving the peace of the country. Withdraw your troops; acknowledge the right of self-government; make no futile attempt to collect tribute from people who are no longer citizens of the United States; do these things and you will have peace. Send your flag into that country with thirty-four stars upon it, and it will be fired at and war will ensue.

The seceded States—having paid much of the money into the Federal Treasury, with which your army was organized and your navy built, with which your lighthouses and your buoys were placed, your harbors cleaned out, and the public domain acquired—send commissioners here to their former associates, and ask them to enter into a fair arrangement for the division of the public property and the assessment of the public debt. Will you do that? Or will you sit stupidly and idly gazing on until there shall be a conflict of arms, because you cannot "compromise with traitors"—because you cannot recognize the independence of States that were States before this Government had existence?

Senators, what is the meaning of this declaration? It is that, if we acknowledge ourselves to be slaves; if we will abandon the right of self-government; if we will agree to be governed by you, you promise us to govern us well. We say first acknowledge our right of self-government; withdraw your troops; yield to us the right of collecting our own revenues; divide fairly the public property; give us our pro rata share of men-of-war that are now afloat; send us our pro rata share of the army—we want two, three, or four of the regiments; turn them over to us; give us our share of the public domain—do these things, and we will, pro tempore, enter into with you a treaty of commerce, of peace, and amity; and if you will reorganize your own Government, and form such a one as suits us, we may again confederate with you and enter into a compact of common defence and general welfare. Refuse it and we will settle this question by the sword.

There is no dodging these issues. If you want war, you will have it; if you want peace, we are anxious for it; but the time has passed for party platforms; the time has passed for demagogism to adopt compromises which mean nothing. These are plain, palpable issues, and they have to be met.

The President of the United States and the Senator from Illinois both misapprehend, utterly and wholly, the issues that are before the country. They seem to think that the whole difficulty is as to the question of the Wilmot proviso or squatter sovereignty in the Territories. These are dead issues; they are past; they were discussed; they have been decided upon; they are res adjudicata.

Seven States have withdrawn from the Union. What are the remaining States going to do? Preserve the Union you cannot, for it is dissolved. Conquer those States and hold them as conquered provinces, you may. Is the play worth the candle? Treat with them as a separate confederacy, and you have peace. Treat with them as States of this Union, and you have war. One or the other you must do. Which will you do? There is a very strong desire on the part of many to avoid the issue, to hold what are called the tobacco States still in the Union, and build up what is to be called a great Union party, composed of Free Soilism and Whiggery, and avoid a war with the cotton States; hold things as they are at home, get through the next succeeding three years, and elect somebody as President of the old Union upon the ground that he has been a great Union-saver. But, unfortunately, you cannot control facts, and making speeches will not do this thing. Mr. Abraham Lincoln has to remove those troops from Fort Pickens and from Fort Sumter or they will be removed for him. He has to collect the revenues in Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, or the Confederate States will collect their own revenues. He has no judiciary department, he has no custom house collectors, he has none of the machinery of government there. He has to appoint his custom house officers; he has to collect the revenues; and, when he attempts it, you know, and I know, that resistance will be made, and that a conflict of arms will ensue, and that war will be the result.

As to the States that remain, you can so amend the Constitution as to give them security for the future, if not indemnity for the past; but in doing that it will not be by dividing Territories. I say to you, though I do not represent those States, that it is useless to blind your eyes to these facts: that no compromise, no amendment of the Constitution, no arrangement that you enter into will be satisfactory to those States, Senators, unless you recognize the doctrine that slaves are property, and that you will protect that species of property as you do every other.

I have said so much in reply to the Senator from Illinois because I did not wish his speech to go out as an explanation of the meaning of the President of the United States. His speech was calculated to produce the impression that Mr. Lincoln meant to do nothing. Masterly inactivity is a policy that cannot now prevail. Action! action! action! as the great Athenian orator [Demosthenes] said, is now necessary. You cannot longer serve God and Mammon; you must declare "under which king, Bezonian?"

Senator Douglas.—The Senator from Texas is quite right in saying that the issue cannot be long postponed; words will not answer the purpose much longer; action must soon begin; and that action must be in the direction of peace or war. Which shall it be? I think the President means peace. His policy must be peace, or it is time that Congress was in session and two hundred thousand men ordered into the field and preparations made for war.

The Senator is unwilling to believe that Mr. Lincoln means peace. I rejoice in the belief that he does mean peace. The Senator and myself look at this question from different points of view. He has told us several times that he is here merely because you continue to call his name at the desk; but that to all intents and purposes he regards himself a foreigner. His affections are with his own country; mine are with my country.

Senator Wigfall.—Mr. President, I have tried to explain, several times, the position which I occupy. I am not officially informed that the State which I represent here has abolished the office of United States Senator. When I am so advised, officially I shall file at your desk that information; and then, if after being so informed, you shall continue to call my name, I will answer, probably, if it suits my convenience; and, if I am called on to vote, I shall probably give my reasons for voting; and, regarding this as a very respectable public meeting, continue my connection with it in that way. But, while I am up, I will ask the Senator, as he is speaking for the Administration—though not a part of it, nor a large part of it [laughter]—to say explicitly whether he would advise the withdrawal of the troops from Fort Sumter and Fort Pickens, the removal of the flag of the United States from the borders of the Confederate States, and that no effort should be made to levy tribute upon a foreign people?

Senator Douglas.—Mr. President, as I am no part of the Administration, as I do not speak for them—although I hope that I speak the same sentiments which will animate them—as I am not in their counsels nor their confidence, I shall not tender them my advice until they ask it. I do not choose, either, to proclaim what my policy would be, in view of the fact that the Senator does not regard himself as the guardian of the honor and interests of my country, but he is looking to the interests of another, which he thinks is in hostility to this country. It would hardly be good policy or wisdom for me to reveal what I think ought to be our policy to one who may so soon be in the counsels of the enemy and the command of its armies.

There was much laughter and applause in the galleries at this hit at Senator Wigfall's reputed ambition to become a military leader of the Confederacy. Upon the Vice-President making the usual threat (which was never enforced) to clear the galleries if the applause were repeated, Senator Wigfall hoped that the applause would be permitted, as, the Union being dissolved, he considered the present occasion only a public meeting.

James M. Mason [Va.] denied that the President's message could be construed as a pronouncement of peace.

It is a declaration of the possession of political power, and a duty to exercise it, and a purpose to discharge that duty. Now, there are seven States out of the Union. You say they are not out; that the Constitution and laws are still extended over them. They say the contrary. You say you will execute the laws in all the States, including those that have abandoned the Union; and common sense tells us, if you attempt it, it will be resisted by force. Unless there be some men laboring under the hallucination to believe that secession is a mere stage trick to deceive and delude the Government from which these States have detached themselves, there can be no man who can tell me that the President does not intend war.

I am not quarreling with the President because of the interpretation that he puts upon his duty. The responsibility is with him; let him exercise it. But what I challenge him for is that he has not more explicitly told us what he means to do; that he has left it to inference, to construction, to interpretation that may possibly mislead these people as to his actual purpose. If the Senator from Illinois thinks that, because the President has a peaceful view of this armed invasion of a foreign territory, or a hope of a peaceful solution, notwithstanding the armed invasion which he declares he will exercise, I can only say to that Senator he is more credulous than any of those around him.

I say, sir, the message is silent only as to the question of the time when the President will use his powers. It is reported that Fort Sumter has provisions for only thirty days. No one doubts that this fort can never be reinforced by the Federal Government, who claim to be its owners, without a struggle of thousands and tens of thousands of armed men spilling their blood on the sands and on the sea; therefore, within the next thirty days, whatever of peace the Senator saw in this message will be converted into war, real war, stern war.

No, Mr. President, there is a solution of peace, one only—a solution that is not only not held out in this message, but that is carefully avoided, sedulously avoided; there is a solution of peace of this great question between the contending sections, and there is but one; and, so far from that being contained in this inaugural, it is repelled and repudiated by its whole tenor and purpose. That solution is to admit that the Union is broken; to yield to the existing fact; to admit that the Union is at an end by the separation of the seven States which have gone out; and, whether they are acknowledged as an independent power or not, to admit the fact of their separate and independent existence; and then withdraw the troops.

I can see no reason why that should be longer denied, even among those statesmen who look upon this Government, as the inaugural expresses it, as a thing so peculiar, God-given, or otherwise that it is insusceptible of being broken. The President says by the universal law it is presumed to be perpetual. What he means by the universal law I am quite as much at a loss to understand as I was the cabalistic meaning of a phrase used by a Senator from New York of a higher law. What is the universal law? I know what the law of the Constitution is; I know what the laws of the United States are; I know what the international law is; but what this universal law is, unless it be the law of the universe, the law which keeps the spheres in place, and directs their motions, and provides for their rotation upon their axes and in their orbits, I am at a loss to know. But it is by terms like these, not only general but unmeaning and inapplicable, that we are to be deluded into the idea that there is no mode by which this Government, as he calls it, however oppressive it may become, however odious to the people under it, however cruel in its exactions, however perverse in its infractions of constitutional duty, can be got rid of, because of some law of the universe.

I have thought it a matter of moment that the policy of this message should be eviscerated, wherever its meaning was indirect or dark, because my own people, the people in Virginia, who are yet in the Union, are banded together upon the fixed, unchangeable purpose of making themselves a party to that war when the first gun is fired.

On March 8 Lafayette S. Foster [Conn.] moved to expel from the Senate Louis T. Wigfall [Tex.] because of his declaration that he was a foreigner. On the 11th the matter came up for discussion. Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.] moved as a substitute:

Whereas, it is understood that the State of Texas has seceded from the Union and is no longer one of the United States; therefore be it resolved that she is not entitled to be represented in this body.

The motion in regard to Senator Wigfall's expulsion was not brought to vote.

On March 13 William P. Fessenden [Me.] moved that the names of Jefferson Davis [Miss.] and other Senators who had announced that they were no longer members of the Senate and had vacated their seats be stricken from the roll.

Senator Fessenden's motion was finally amended to "Whereas the seats of (the said Senators) have become vacant, resolved that the Secretary be directed to omit their names from the roll," and was passed in this form.

CHAPTER II

The Right of Secession

Speech of Senator James A. Bayard, Jr., on "The Right of Secession and the Propriety of Recognizing the Southern Confederacy"—The Confederate Peace Commission; It Is Not Received—The Fall of Fort Sumter—Secession of Virginia—Military Movements April-July, 1861—President Lincoln's First Message to Congress: "The Sophistry of Secession."

ON March 30, 1861, James A. Bayard, Jr. [Del.], introduced in the Senate a resolution to the effect that, whatever view be taken of the right of secession, seven States having withdrawn from the Union and the enforcement there of Federal laws by the magistracy being impracticable, the only alternative was civil war or recognition of their secession; and that, whereas war would not bring them back into the Union, their independence should be acknowledged and a treaty be made with them.

In support of his resolution Senator Bayard discussed the nature and right of secession and the causes which had led to its adoption by the Southern States in a speech which continued for three days.

The Right of Secession

Senator Bayard

The act of secession has been characterized in this body by some of its members as a constitutional right, as among the reserved rights of the States. By others it has been denounced as treason to the United States on the part of any of the actors. I agree with neither. It is not among the reserved rights of the States, but is a revolution by organized communities, by the authority of the people of the seceding States, in whom the ultimate power of sovereignty is vested. Its effect is the same, whether revolutionary or legal; it severs the State from the Union, and it suspends the operation of the laws of the Federal Government in the seceding States. It is, in the old Roman sense of the term, rebellion—the revolt of a nation—but not in the modern sense of the term rebellion.

All forms of republican government rest upon one great general principle which is recognized in America, and has been always recognized as the great basis, the only just basis, of all government, "the consent of the governed." Our fathers so declared it in the Declaration of Independence, but the mode of consent depends upon the character of the government. The consent of the governed as applied to the State governments, which are purely national, and to any purely national government, is but a political axiom called commonly the social compact, which assumes that there is an implied contract between each individual citizen by which that government is established. The law of that compact is, in theory and in practice, that the will of the majority of society shall be conclusive evidence of the consent of the whole; and, further, it has been denominated an inherent right in society and in the majority. It is still but an axiom. In practice, sex excludes one-half the governed from giving consent. Age excludes one-fourth. Age is arbitrary; it might be twenty-five; it is twenty-one. Further, in the origin of our Government, though the States were all national governments and all republican, an interest in the soil was essential for the purpose of giving consent. Nay, still, in many of the States, the prepayment of taxes is essential for the dissent or consent on the part of the individual, though he is bound under the axiom by the laws of the government established by his implied consent. Residence of greater or less duration is requisite in all the States; in some three months, in some six, in some a year, and at one time two years. Yet all the individuals who exist as inhabitants of that government or are within its jurisdiction are considered by the force of the axiom as consenting to the government and bound by its laws. In the State of Pennsylvania and in several other of the non-slaveholding States, I believe, race excludes many of the community from giving their actual consent, but their consent is implied and they are bound by the laws. No negro can vote in the State of Pennsylvania, and in others of the non-slaveholding States the same rule applies.

Yet the axiom is true and is a wise one; it is the foundation of government on the basis of the social compact, which is the will of society, evidenced by the determination of the majority of the great body of the people who are supposed to be competent to form government.

It is very evident, Mr. President, that revolution in a government founded upon such a basis could rarely, if ever, occur; because the majority, having it in their power to bring into accord with their opinions the legislative authority, could always change the form of government at will, without revolutionary action; and I understand revolution to mean a change of government against the will of the existing government. The word revolution is sometimes applied to any radical change of a government, whether with or without the will of the ultimate power of sovereignty; but, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, we mean, by revolution, a change against the consent of the existing government. The power of change, the right of change, exists in all governments, no matter what may be their form, and is vested of necessity where the ultimate power of sovereignty exists; in Russia, in an autocrat. No one doubts that the Emperor of Russia could change the form of government of Russia. In England it is in the King, Lords, and Commons. Being effected by the will of the existing government, the idea of force and resistance is precluded, and the change of government would be legal in all respects.

In the United States this ultimate power of government in each State is vested in the people under the social compact, and the majority in each State, having the ultimate sovereignty, have the right to change the form of government under which they live. This I suppose to be the established and uncontroverted principle derived from all the publicists, as to the theory on which purely national republics are founded, which all the States of this Union are. But it is very evident that the principle of the social compact cannot be applied to the United States as an aggregate nation. Could it be, of course a majority of the people of the United States could change the form of government by their will. The majority of one State would be carried into another State, and the majority of the aggregate nation would be competent to impose the form of government they desired over the people of all the States. Such is not the structure of the Federal Government.

The speaker here quoted in support of his views from the 39th number of "The Federalist," written by James Madison.

I think, if the present President of the United States had read this passage, he would have been able to understand the distinction between the relations of a county to a State and the relations of a State to the Federal Government. There exists, then, this broad distinction between the Federal and the State governments: the State governments exist by the consent of the governed, under the law of the social compact; but the Federal Government exists, not as the result of the implied compact which arises under that law, but by the express compact of the several States which were independent sovereignties at the time they created it. That compact specifies the extent of the powers delegated to the common Government, and without the compact it could have had no existence. Sir, whence came, or on what do we base, the power of the Federal Government to make or administer any laws? Has it any other basis than the consent given by the people of each State severally, by the adoption of the Constitution framed by the representatives of States and submitted to the people of each State for their several acceptance? Did unanimity in the State of Pennsylvania bring the State of Georgia within the operation of the Federal Constitution? Certainly not. The consent of the governed, the consent of the community, expressed under the social compact in the State (which is the basis of its government), forming, by express compact with the people of other States, a common government for all, with special delegated powers, is the only basis of the general Government of this Union.

Then, sir, what is the rule as to compacts of this kind? That they cannot be changed without the consent of all the parties to the compact. It matters not whether the compact is a treaty or creates a government; the law of the compacts of sovereignties is that no change can be made in terms except by the consent of all, unless it is otherwise provided in the instrument.

The Constitution contains no provision which authorizes a State by its own act to separate from the other States and withdraw from the Union. Had there been no provision as to amendments to the Federal Constitution, within the rule which governs the compacts of sovereignties, it would have been unalterable in any one particular; and it can only be altered in the mode which it provides. Neither a majority of the people of the United States can alter the Constitution on the basis on which it rests, nor a majority of the States; nor is the power expressly given to any State to withdraw at will from the confederation and establish herself as a separate nation. I hold, therefore, that the act of secession is a breach of the compact on the part of the seceding States; and that, being a breach of compact and against the will of the Federal Government, it is of necessity an act of revolution. But, Mr. President, it is a revolution inaugurated by a people in their collective capacity—a revolution and breach of the compact which, if groundless in morals and reason, gives just cause of war, but leaves no other remedy. You may quell insurrection, you may put down domestic violence by the operation of the law, but you cannot meet the collective action of a people in any other mode than by war or by peaceable negotiation; and that statesman will find that he makes a terrible mistake who is unable to distinguish between the collective action of a people and a mere temporary insurrection of factious individuals. Lord North made it, and he lost, under the plea of executing the laws, the brightest jewels of the British Crown. Concession might have led to a very different termination.

Mr. President, I can scarcely realize that it can be seriously urged that the States of this Union were not independent and sovereign States when they formed their original confederacy; that they did not, as independent and sovereign States, adopt, by the several action of their people, the present Federal Constitution; and that they did not reserve to the States and the people thereof all rights which were not ceded to the common Government by the Constitution which they adopted. But, sir, if the States were sovereign originally, what change was made in their relations by the formation of the present Constitution? The first and the most important change was the power to tax for the purpose of its support, which was given to the general Government, and which was the great defect of the old confederation. The next radical change was that the laws should operate upon the individual citizen, instead of operating upon the citizen through the action of the State. To that extent the alteration made the general Government a National Government. This change in the operation of the laws on individuals instead of communities was intended to strengthen and give stability to the Union by substituting for the coercion of arms—which existed in the Confederacy as against the State, but was practically a useless power—the coercion of the magistracy upon the individual. No more was intended, and the power it confers is quite sufficient for any federal government existing over independent communities, and founded upon opinion. But the coercion of a State in its collective capacity, even by the magistracy, which they inserted in the Constitution when it was originally adopted, was stricken out very soon afterward by amendment.

The inference seems irresistible. If the power was abrogated which, as first inserted in the Constitution, gave the means of coercion by the magistracy as against a State, on what principle can it be contended that the Federal Constitution gives the right of coercion by arms against a State, while the State remains in the Union? If the State, by secession, becomes alien, you have the same right of war or peace with her that you have with any other alien people; but, while you recognize her as a member of the Union, coercion by arms, or by the magistracy, against the State in its collective capacity, was neither given, nor intended to be given, by the Federal Constitution. The attempt to give the power in both shapes was made in the convention, and expressly voted down, both as to coercion by arms and coercion by the magistracy. It was given indirectly by the clause which gave jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in suits by individuals against a State; but that was stricken out, within a few years after its adoption, by amendment. The right of secession at will, with or without cause, was not given, because the insertion of such a clause in the Federal Constitution would but have been an invitation to dissolution. It was left unprovided for, as one of those exigencies in human affairs against which no government and no human foresight could provide.

Sir, coercion by the magistracy of the individual citizen gave all the strength and sanction to the laws of the Federal Government which were requisite; but it has no application to the collective action of the people in any State in their political capacity. Where a State, by the action of her people, declares herself out of the Union, or, in ordinary language, secedes, the necessary effect is that the magistracy is gone; there is no Federal officer to carry into execution the laws by means of the civil power, and of course the laws must cease to operate. It is the result of revolutionary action, I admit, because against the will of the existing common Government; but it is the action of an independent community in their collective capacity, and has precisely the same effect upon the relative condition of the people of that State and the rest of the Union that the abrogation of a treaty would have between independent nations. The treaty in such case is at an end; but if abrogated without sufficient cause the annulment gives just cause of war. The Union, however, stands; the Federal Government remains, as to all the other States, in its entirety, and with its laws and its Constittuion, as it stood before; but secession has abrogated the coercion of the magistracy within the States that have withdrawn by the action of the people thereof. Is not this action the consent of the governed? It is revolutionary; but, still, action had by the consent of the governed. Who adopted the Constitution? The people of Georgia, by the vote of their own people alone. If they decide to withdraw from that Union by the act of the same people—not of the legislature—on what principle, consistent with the Declaration of Independence, can it be denied that this same people can change their common as well as their State government, except on the ground that such change is a breach of the compact which they made with the people of other States, by adopting the Federal Constitution? If secession be, then, as I believe, a breach of compact, yet it would be justified by sufficient cause; if resulting from caprice without grave cause of discontent, or sense of insecurity, it gives just right of war; but it does not necessarily ensue, from the right of war, that war should follow. War is a question of morals and power combined, and always must be.

The military power in this country was never intended to be a primary power in the execution of the laws. It may be called in aid, under the mandate of the magistrate, as subsidiary to the civil power. By the express terms of the Constitution, you may, at the request of a State, use the military power in case of domestic violence; you may repress insurrection in the same mode; but this Government never was intended to be carried on by means of the military, as a substitute and primary power in place of the civil power—the action of the magistracy; and yet no other mode remains in which the laws can be enforced in the seceding States than by the military power, if their enforcement is insisted on. All laws require some sanction, or they are futile. There is but the sanction of the magistracy or the sanction of arms. Under the old Confederacy they had to depend entirely upon the sanction of arms, but never attempted its exercise, relying solely on the good faith of the States. The change made in constructing the present Government was by giving the power of coercion by the magistracy upon the individual citizen; but, of necessity, that is dependent upon the action of the people of the State in their collective capacity; and if they subvert and put an end to the magistracy the laws of the Union cannot be enforced, under our present Constitution, without a violation of its intent. The action of the seceding States was beyond human foresight, and one of those calamities against which no government, unless a military despotism, can guard.

When a State secedes by the action of her people, though its effect severs her from the Union and makes her an alien people, it is a breach of the compact which created this Government, and is, in itself, just cause of war. But the right of war arises only as consequent upon the effect of the action of the people of the State, having made the people thereof an alien to the rest of the Union. If still in the Union, you cannot make war upon a State. Such is the doctrine inculcated by Mr. Madison in "The Federalist," as the law of the compact in all governments founded upon the express compact of sovereignties, and not, as this Federal Government certainly is not, upon the social compact. It is the law, as laid down by all publicists, that the breach of any one article absolves all the others from the engagements of the compact, "unless they choose rather to compel the delinquent party to repair the breach." I will not say that the case might not be supposed, where a State, from mere caprice, without any cause whatever, should withdraw from the Federal Union, hostile measure, mingled with conciliation, might have the effect of restoring her to the Union, of repairing the breach. Where the people were divided and the State small in power, I can conceive that the use of hostile or coercive measures, mingled with affectionate consideration for her people, might conduce to such a result without destroying the form of our Government, though, in such a case, hostile measures would be a stretch of constitutional power; but such supposition has no relation to the case of a large section of country, having sufficient population and resources to exist as an independent nation, which chooses to throw off its allegiance to the Federal Government, and, by the action of the people, withdraw from any further connection with it. In such a case, you cannot restore the Union by means of the power of arms. Conciliation and concession alone, and their consent, must bring back those States to this Government, as by their separate consent they were originally incorporated among its members.

It has been said that the action of a State in seceding makes all the actors guilty of treason if they attempt to support that action by force of arms. I am unable to appreciate the force or the humanity of such a doctrine. It may serve to excite; it will never serve to deter. It is not a practical question. When revolution comes, not insurrection, it overrides and cannot be met by the law of treason. The allegiance is due to the State as well as to the Federal Government; and the allegiance to the Federal Government is due through the State. If the State, as a political community, dissolves her connection with the Federal Government, could there be a more revolting proposition than that the individual man, who is domiciled in the State, and residing there, shall be held in the position that he is guilty of treason against the State if he does not side with her, and of treason against the general Government if he does? The law of domicile must necessarily govern the allegiance of the individual where the political action of the community has severed the State in which he is domiciled from the general Government. Humanity alone requires that such a doctrine should be enforced. But it is really not a practical question. The charge of treason only irritates; for the words "treason" and "traitor" are terms to which no man submits without a sense of indignation and a disposition to resistance. Practically you can never enforce the law of treason against the collective action of a people. It was threatened in the case of the revolution of our own ancestors in 1776. Was it ever enforced? Must it not always lead to retaliation where there is this collective action? Is there a possibility that where revolution occurs—and this is revolution on the part of the people of seven States in their collective capacity—that the law of treason can be enforced? Why, then, is the term applied unless, indeed, those who use it intend so to increase exasperation that neither reconciliation nor reunion, nor even peaceful separation, shall be practicable or possible.

But, sir, though the act of secession, which, for the reasons I have assigned, I believe to be revolutionary, is a revolutionary right, and is a right which the people of a State alone, in whom the ultimate sovereignty is vested, not the legislature, can exercise; and it is from the use of the words "the people," by our ancestors, to distinguish between the mere Government as an agent and the great body of the people in which, as possessing the ultimate sovereignty, the right to change the form of government reposes, that so many have been led into false views of the act of secession. They used the word "people" as representing the ultimate and true source of sovereignty in contradistinction to the mere Government. If the people of a State, acting in the same collective capacity in which they adopted the Constitution of the United States, as a distinct people, afterward choose to abrogate that Constitution, it seems clear, if they had the authority to adopt, they must have the sovereignty to rescind. The act is revolutionary, because it is against the will of the common Government, and a breach of the compact which created that Government. It becomes just cause of war, as in any case in which one nation abrogates a compact with another, and war alone must be the remedy or peaceful arrangement.

The remaining question, which I wish to discuss, is as to the power of the President and Senate, by treaty, to adjust all questions likely to give rise to difficulty and to collision between the new republic which has been formed and the Federal Government. I cannot entertain a doubt as to the existence of that power. It is not expressly given in those terms, but the treaty-making power is vested in the President and Senate. It is an indefinite power. The war power, contrary to the rule which exists in other nations, is in Congress, the legislative body, alone. The treaty-making power is confined to the President, and two-thirds of the Senate concurring with him in the negotiation of the treaty. One must necessarily, in the exigencies of a nation, be as broad as the other. What is there that prevents the United States from ceding a portion of territory not within a State, if the exigencies of the Government require it? You acquire territory by means of treaty, with no express power given for the purpose, because the external sovereignty of the Union is vested in the Federal Government alone; and for the same reason, if the general interests of the whole, where no particular State has jurisdiction or authority, require that you should cede territory of the United States to a foreign government, can anyone doubt that the cession could be made, not by Congress, but by the President and Senate, only by means of a treaty? You did it for the purpose of closing a boundary in the case of Maine, within a State, with the consent of the State. You were not able to run the line between Great Britain and the United States; and for the purpose of establishing a boundary and preventing collision and war between the nations you did cede a portion of the State of Maine, with the consent of the legislature of that State.

If one purpose will justify you in ceding a portion of the United States to a foreign nation, on what principle is it that, where seven States of this Union, by their consent and by the action of their people, have chosen to withdraw themselves from the Union and declare themselves out of the Union, you cannot accept their declaration and treat with them? You cannot doubt that you have the power of war against them, though not while they are States of the Union. If you once begin war, you treat them as an alien people. It is the necessary result of war. Will war give a power to the President and Senate to make a treaty, which they do not possess antecedent to the war? Is a baptism of blood necessary in order to give authority under the Constitution to the President and Senate of the United States to conclude peace? If such a doctrine be tenable, the result is that, if a collision of arms occurs with this new republic, and you fight for a period of eight or ten years, still you are powerless; the President and Senate cannot treat, peace can never be concluded, and eternal war must be the rule of your Government. No new power will be acquired by a collision of arms between you and this new republic. The power must exist now, or it exists never.

Mr. President, I do not see how this conclusion can be escaped; and why you should not have the power. The treaty-making power, beyond all question, is an indefinite power. It embraces all relations external to the Union. If any State had never become a party to the present Government, can anyone doubt that, such State remaining an independent state, you could have treated with her, and that every State of this Union had the right to part with any portion of her territory irrespective of the consent of the general Government, if she was not a party to that Government? It was part of their sovereignty and their independence, as it belongs to every other nation, to either acquire territory, which is one of the rights of sovereignty, or to diminish her territory by cession, where the public exigencies require it. Well, then, if a State, by the action of her people, declares herself out of the Union, what clause in the Constitution forbids your acceptance of her declaration, and excludes from the treaty-making power negotiation and treaty with her? If you, with her consent, can cede a portion of her territory to a foreign power, why can you not, with her consent, permit the whole State to withdraw from the Federal jurisdiction?

For the acquisition of territory by the United States, you find no express authority in the Constitution; but it results from the nature of your Government. It is forbidden to the States; it is permitted to the general Government, because the right of acquisition is incident to sovereignty.

The right to acquire territory implies the right to part with it. There is no limit, in fact, to the power of diminishing the territory of the Union, except in the States. As we have seen, the general Government, with the assent of the State concerned, did it for one purpose, in the case of the State of Maine, without even the action of the people.

In the case of the seven seceded States, the people in their original capacity, in whom the ultimate sovereignty rests according to our Declaration of Independence, have declared those States to be out of the Union by their representatives elected for that purpose, and they have dissolved their connection with the Federal Government. Have we not the right, has not this Government the power, to accept that declaration; not to destroy the Union, but to preserve it, and maintain peace with those States? You cannot escape from perpetual and eternal war, unless you come to this conclusion, that the President and the Senate have the power of negotiation with a State which secedes, if they see fit to exercise it. I admit freely that, on the other hand, the act of secession having the effect of severing the State from the Union, though revolutionary, and making her people an alien people, Congress has also the right of war, and just cause of war, if there is no cause for the withdrawal.

If you refuse to treat, if the relations between these two republics are left in their present unsettled condition, the danger of collision must be constantly existent. There is the loss also of prestige on the part of the Federal Government, if you assert your jurisdiction over the seceded States, and do not enforce your laws. In fact, non-action would amount to a virtual acknowledgment of the independence de facto of those States. Why not acknowledge it by treaty, by direct action, and thus avoid collision? Foreign governments will so act if you do not, and thus complicate the relations between the two republics.

But, sir, it cannot be doubted that war will be the inevitable result if the army or the navy is employed to execute the laws of the Federal Union within the seceded States. If you do mean war, it is a question of morals and of power. There is but one legitimate object for such a war, and that is the restoration of the seceded States to the Union. But you can never effect that result by a war of subjugation. Is it consistent with your form of government, if you could succeed in conquering those States, to hold them as subject provinces? You must either desolate them, if you succeed, or you must maintain your supremacy by an immense standing army, in order to keep them in subjection. Look at the condition of Venice and Austria. What myriads of troops is Austria obliged to maintain in order to keep an enervate people in a state of subjection against their will! Sir, the admiration of military glory is quite as strong a passion among the American people as with other nations. The permanent maintenance of a large standing army would necessarily foster and encourage that passion, and, in the end, some successful soldier would become the military autocrat of the Republic, and substitute the coercion of arms for the coercion of the magistracy, because the character of the people, under a war of one or two generations, would change, and the love of civil liberty that now exists throughout this nation would be seriously diminished, or, perhaps, entirely pass away.

You cannot conquer the South any more than the South could conquer the North. The first attempt at conquest would, of necessity, from the cause of contest, force other slaveholding States into the Southern Confederacy, and this new republic, as it stands, has both the wealth and population to maintain a national existence. It would be no short war. The result of war, too, is always doubtful, and far beyond human foresight. Accident will often determine a decisive battle. The individual genius of leaders controls the events of war far beyond any control that can be exercised by human genius during a state of peace. The genius of Andrew Jackson secured the victory of New Orleans. Under another, though an able soldier, it might have been lost. The majority of numbers and resources will not insure success in war. On the plains of Marathon, ten thousand Greeks defeated the countless hosts of Xerxes, and a comparatively small number of deficiently armed Swiss mountaineers met the mailed chivalry of Charles of Burgundy, and defeated, utterly and disastrously, the best armed and organized army of Europe. Bannockburn must not be forgotten, and history is filled with similar illustrations.

Again, sir, a war of invasion—which, if the war commences, must be its character, if you attempt to effect your purpose under the pretext of enforcing the laws—is always in favor of the invaded country. Men will fight for their homes and their firesides as they will not fight for conquest, and will endure the utmost extent of privation and suffering, rather than yield to the invader; and disparity of force never insures the conquest of an invaded country. You have the illustration in our own contest with Great Britain.

Great Britain might possibly, under abler military men, have succeeded for the time; but after the first blood was shed she never could have retained her supremacy over this country. Conciliation might have saved her the colonies in the first instance, before independence was declared, but after its declaration the acknowledgment of their independence became an inevitable result, and was merely a question of time.

I trust the idea that it would be a legitimate act on the part of the Federal Government, for the purpose of effecting their subjugation, to incite servile insurrection in the States of this new republic, is not entertained. The act would be forbidden by common humanity and the indignant voice of the world. But if the spirit of malignity entertain such an idea, it will be disappointed. Servile insurrections may occur, and have occurred in the history of the world, but not at the call of an invader. Your own wars with Great Britain, in the Revolution and in 1812, illustrate this.

Is there, Mr. President, a point of honor? The Union is not dissolved if we let these States go. The United States remain; the Federal Government remains. We are a great and powerful nation. Part of the dominions over which our laws extended may be curtailed, and our jurisdiction over them lost, but we remain with all the elements of a great nation, if we acknowledge the new republic. But it may be said that, if we sever in consequence of this secession, arising from the anti-slavery sentiment, into two separate governments, the same sentiment will produce collision between the independent governments by the same interference which has led to secession from the common government. The answer is that the anti-slavery sentiment, with the masses at least, is an honest, though, as I think, a mistaken conviction, founded in ignorance of the relations of race. They believe, also, that there is a moral responsibility on their part connected with the operations of the common government, in relation to this institution. That responsibility ceases if this new republic is acknowledged as a separate nationality.

Mr. President, if so many separate and independent communities existing under a common government find that, from dissonance of habits, of manners, of customs, or from antagonism of opinion, or any other cause, they can no longer remain under that common government, and can agree by peaceful action to separate into two republics, each pursuing its own destiny according to its own views and the will of its own people, it will afford the most pregnant and conclusive evidence that has ever been exhibited to the world of the capacity of man for self-government. If, on the contrary, blood must flow, and war, prolonged civil war, be consequent upon separation, then, indeed, will the columns that support this Federal Government be scattered into fragments, and probably many petty and powerless governments arise upon their ruins. Years of conflict may establish separate nationalities, but in that event the last hope of the patriot, the philosopher, and the statesman, for the self-government of man, will perish with the dissolution of the Federal Union.

Negotiations with Confederate Peace Commission

Prior to the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln the Confederate Government had selected three commissioners to adjust the "differences" which existed between the two governments. They were Martin J. Crawford, a former Democratic member of Congress from Georgia; John Forsyth, editor of a Democratic paper at Mobile, Ala., and Andrew B. Roman, a former Governor of Louisiana, and a Whig who had used all his influence to prevent disunion.

On the 13th of March, 1861, the commissioners sent a diplomatic dispatch to the Federal State Department informing the Federal Government that they had been appointed by the Confederate authorities as commissioners empowered to open negotiations for the settlement of all controverted questions between the two governments, and to conclude treaties of peace between "the two nations."

To this note no reply was returned, but Secretary William H. Seward made out a memorandum and filed it with the document, simply stating that the Government could not recognize the authority under which the alleged commissioners acted, nor reply to them. The memorandum stated that "it could not be admitted that the States referred to had, in law or fact, withdrawn from the Federal Union, or that they could do so in any other manner than with their consent, and the consent of the people of the United States, to be given through a national convention to be assembled in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States."

This memorandum was withheld until April 8, when it was at once telegraphed both to Montgomery, Ala., the Confederate capital, and Charleston, where it created great excitement.

In the meanwhile Chief-Justice Taney and Associate-Justices Campbell and Nelson had, of their own volition as good citizens, examined the legal question of the right of the President to coerce a State, and had concluded that there was no constitutional right so to do; and they gratuitously advised the several members of the Cabinet of the conclusions to which they had come, and recommended that terms of conciliation be proposed to the Confederate Government through the commissioners.

Secretary Seward was in favor of evacuating Fort Sumter, and he informed Judge Campbell, who was acting as mediator, that it would be evacuated, and Campbell so informed the Confederate commissioners, who in turn informed their Government. Mr. Lincoln was taking ample time to deliberate what to do, being uncertain as to the best policy. He was hopeful that Virginia would not secede, and that the Virginia convention, which was deliberating upon the question, would adjourn and so cease to be a menace to him.

On the 9th of April the Confederate commissioners sent a letter to the Secretary of State in which they proffered as their ultimatum of negotiation the evacuation of Sumter. Secretary Seward replied that he was not "at liberty to hold official intercourse with them."

Of this action the Confederate authorities were duly apprised, and the commissioners left Washington on April 11, and returned to Montgomery.

The Fall of Fort Sumter

President Lincoln, against the advice of a majority of his Cabinet, had finally resolved to send provisions to Fort Sumter, and an expedition sailed for this purpose on April 6.

Owing to a gale only the Baltic of the fleet arrived in time to be of service to Major Anderson, and that only to bear away the surrendered garrison. The Confederate Government heard of the coming of the provisioning expedition and, considering the capture of the fort necessary to the life of the rebellion, ordered General Pierre G. T. Beauregard, who was in charge of the investment, to procure its surrender, or, failing in this, to bombard it. On the 11th Beauregard sent to Major Anderson a summons to surrender, offering to him, in case of compliance, facilities to remove the troops, and to the garrison the privilege of saluting their flag. To this Anderson replied that he would surrender the fort on the 15th if supplies did not reach him by that time, or if he did not before then receive orders to the contrary from his Government.

These conditions did not suit the Confederates, and on Friday, April 12, at 3 a. m., they gave Anderson notice that their batteries would open on the fort in an hour. At 4:30 the bombardment began, and continued throughout that day and into the next.

Anderson then accepted the conditions of surrender offered, and on the following day, Sunday, April 14, the garrison sailed northward in the Baltic.

The Virginia Convention

Since February 13 Virginia had been holding a convention to consider its policy in the crisis. The Union delegates were in a majority. An ordinance of secession was voted down on March 17 by a majority of ninety to forty-five, and a similar proposition was defeated on April 4, but still the convention declined to adjourn. Mr. Lincoln therefore caused a letter to be sent to George W. Summers of Charleston, Va., the most talented of the Union men in his State, requesting that he come to Washington for conference. Summers was kept by timidity from accepting the President's invitation, but he sent John B. Baldwin in his place.

The interview was held on the morning of April 4. Baldwin returned to the convention reporting that his conference with the President was inconclusive; that Mr. Lincoln had characterized the convention as a "standing menace which embarrassed him very much," and therefore he desired that it adjourn sine die, but that he had given no promise of what return he would make to it for compliance with his wishes. John Minor Botts, another member of the convention, called on the President two days afterward, and held a conversation in which Mr. Lincoln gave an account of the interview with Baldwin which, as remembered by Mr. Botts, differed materially from Baldwin's report. The President, said Botts, spoke of the fleet in New York harbor preparing to sail that afternoon to provision Fort Sumter. "Now," said Mr. Lincoln, "your convention in Richmond has been sitting for nearly two months, and all it has done has been to shake the rod over my head (threatening to secede if coercion should be used to bring back South Carolina into the Union). If the Union majority in the Virginia convention will adjourn it without its passing an ordinance of secession, this fleet shall be kept from sailing, and, instead, Fort Sumter shall be evacuated. I think it is a good swap to give a fort for a State any time."

As a result of Baldwin's report, the Virginia convention remained in session, and on April 8 appointed another delegation, consisting of William Ballard Preston, Alexander H. H. Stuart, and George W. Randolph, to wait on President Lincoln, and ask him to communicate to the convention "the policy which the Federal Executive intends to pursue in regard to the Federal States."

The committee had an audience with the President at Washington on April 13, the day after Fort Sumter had been fired upon by the South Carolinian secessionists. He referred the convention to the policy expressed in his inaugural address:

> As I then and therein said, I now repeat: "The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government, and to collect the duties and imposts; but beyond what is necessary for these objects there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere." . . . In case it proves true that Fort Sumter has been assaulted, as is reported, I shall perhaps cause the United States mails to be withdrawn from all the States which claim to have seceded, believing that the commencement of actual war against the Government justifies and possibly demands this. . . .
> Whatever else I may do for the purpose, I shall not attempt to collect the duties and imposts by any armed invasion of any part of the country; not meaning by this, however, that I may not land a force deemed necessary to relieve a fort upon a border of the country.

The report of this committee, followed as it was by the President's call of April 15 for 75,000 militia to suppress the rebellion and to be raised by the several States of the Union, which included Virginia, caused the convention, on April 17, to pass an ordinance of secession.

This was followed by a similar ordinance in Arkansas on May 6, and a military league with the Confederacy in Tennessee on May 7.

The Confederate Government established its capital at Richmond, Virginia, on the 21st of May, and North Carolina, being surrounded by secession territory, seceded the same day.

The Call for Troops

On April 15, the day after the surrender of Fort Sumter, the President issued a proclamation calling forth the militia of the several States of the Union to the aggregate number of 75,000 to suppress combinations which existed in the seceding States for the purpose of opposing and obstructing the enforcement of Federal laws, and which were "too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by law." The concluding paragraph of the proclamation convened Congress to meet on July 4 "to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, the public safety and interest might seem to demand."

The call for troops was really signed on Sunday, April 14, though dated April 15. On the evening of the 14th Senator Stephen A. Douglas called upon President Lincoln and was closeted with him for two hours. He went forth from the conference to publish by telegraph to the country the declaration that he was "prepared to sustain the President in the exercise of all his constitutional functions to preserve the Union, and maintain the Government, and defend the Federal capital." On April 25, before the Illinois legislature, he made, in behalf of the Union, the most eloquent speech of his life. Unfortunately for the cause which had become the paramount passion of his soul, he died a little more than a month thereafter, on June 3, at his home in Chicago. Even measured by his few weeks of service, his place is secure in American history as the first and greatest of "War Democrats."

The governors of all the free States responded to the call for troops with enthusiasm, offering more men than were required or could be armed. The governors of the border States, however, indignantly refused the call. Governor Jackson of Missouri said, "Not one man will Missouri furnish to carry on such an unholy crusade." Governor Magoffin of Kentucky said, "I say emphatically, Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States," and Governor Harris of Tennessee said, "Tennessee will not furnish a man for coercion, but 50,000 for the defence of our Southern brothers."

Military Movements of the Confederacy

As an answer to Lincoln's call for troops, Jefferson Davis, President of the Southern Confederacy, issued a proclamation on April 17, offering letters of marque and reprisal to privateers desiring to prey upon the commerce of the United States. Two days later President Lincoln replied by proclaiming a blockade of all the Confederate ports, and giving notice that privateering would be treated as piracy.

General Beauregard was ordered by President Davis into northern Virginia to assume command of the forces gathering there from the Gulf States.

Military Movements of the Union

On May 3 the President issued a proclamation calling for 42,034 more volunteers from the several States, and an increase in the regular army of 22,714 men, and in the navy of 18,000.

The first efforts of the Government were to hold the border States in the Union. Major Robert Anderson, the hero of Fort Sumter, was sent to his native State of Kentucky to recruit volunteers. Captain Nathaniel Lyon, an ardent anti-slavery man, who was in charge of the St. Louis arsenal, was ordered to enlist 10,000 loyal Missourians, and, if necessary, to proclaim martial law in the State. Later, he was put in charge of the military department in which Missouri was situated, replacing General William H. Harney, a conservative, who had been cajoled into making a compact with the State government, which was attempting to take Missouri into the Confederacy, to refrain from military movements, since these were apt to "create excitements and jealousy." General Lyon at once went into action, and on June 17 defeated the State (really Confederate) troops under General Sterling Price at Booneville. The governor, Claiborne F. Jackson, was forced to flee from place to place in the State while keeping up the pretence of a government. Missouri, under Jackson, was recognized as a part of the Confederacy by the Davis Government.

General George B. McClellan entered West Virginia from Ohio and occupied it for the Union. A Michigan regiment under Colonel Elmer E. Ellsworth entered Virginia from Washington and occupied Alexandria. Ellsworth, as he was cutting down a rebel flag on a hotel there, was assassinated by the proprietor.

The capture of Alexandria inaugurated open conflict between the Confederacy and the Union in Virginia. General Pierre G. T. Beauregard, who was looked upon by the South as the hero of Fort Sumter, was sent on May 31 to command the Confederate forces centering about Manassas. General Joseph E. Johnston was in command at Winchester, having fallen back from Harper's Ferry before a superior Union force under General Robert Patterson. On June 19 President Lincoln called his Cabinet and the leading generals to a council of war, at which it was decided that General Irvin McDowell should lead the Union forces against Beauregard, while Patterson should remain confronting Johnston in the Shenandoah Valley, following him in a rear attack if he should attempt to join Beauregard.

This was the situation when Congress met in special session July 4 and listened to the President's message.

The message was in effect an answer to Senator Bayard's speech on the right of secession.

The Sophistry of Secession

First Message of President Lincoln to Congress

In his message President Lincoln described the state of affairs at the time of his inauguration; the suspension of all functions of the Federal Government, save those of the postoffice, in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida; the seizure by the several governments of these States of forts and other Federal property, and the organization of these States into a Confederation which "was already invoking recognition, aid, and intervention from foreign powers." The President recounted his forbearance in pursuing the policy expressed in his inaugural address of exhausting all peaceful measures before resorting to stronger ones.

He then lucidly recited the story of the assault upon Fort Sumter by South Carolina, demonstrating that it was in no sense an act of defence, but on the contrary of deliberate aggression, designed to force the hand of the Federal Government.

> That this was their object the Executive well understood; and having said to them, in the inaugural address, "You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors," he took pains not only to keep this declaration good, but also to keep the case so free from the power of ingenious sophistry that the world should not be able to misunderstand it. By the affair at Fort Sumter, with its surrounding circumstances, that point was reached. In this act, discarding all else, they have forced upon the country the distinct issue, "immediate dissolution or blood."
> And this issue embraces more than the fate of the United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy—a government of the people by the same people—can or cannot maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes. It presents the question whether discontented individuals, too few in numbers to control administration according to organic law in any case, can always, upon the pretences made in this case, or on any other pretences, or arbitrarily without any pretence, break up their government, and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth. It forces us to ask: "Is there, in all republics, this inherent and fatal weakness?" "Must a government, of necessity, be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?"
>
> So viewing the issue, no choice was left but to call out the war power of the Government; and so to resist force employed for its destruction by force for its preservation.

The President then discussed the action of the border States, particularly Virginia, pursuant to the attack on Sumter.

> The course taken in Virginia was the most remarkable—perhaps the most important. A convention elected by the people of that State to consider the very question of disrupting the Federal Union was in session at the capital of Virginia when Fort Sumter fell. To this body the people had chosen a large majority of professed Union men. Almost immediately after the fall of Sumter, many members of that majority went over to the original disunion minority, and with them adopted an ordinance for withdrawing the State from the Union. Whether this change was wrought by their great approval of the assault upon Sumter or their great resentment at the Government's resistance to that assault is not definitely known. Although they submitted the ordinance for ratification to a vote of the people, to be taken on a day then somewhat more than a month distant, the convention and the legislature (which was also in session at the same time and place), with leading men of the State not members of either, immediately commenced acting as if the State were already out of the Union. They pushed military preparations vigorously forward all over the State. They seized the United States armory at Harper's Ferry, and the navy yard at Gosport, near Norfolk. They received—perhaps invited—into their State large bodies of troops, with their warlike appointments, from the so-called seceded States. They formally entered into a treaty of temporary alliance and coöperation with the so-called "Confederate States," and sent members to their congress at Montgomery. And, finally, they permitted the insurrectionary government to be transferred to their capital at Richmond.

The people of Virginia have thus allowed this giant insurrection to make its nest within her borders; and this Government has no choice left but to deal with it where it finds it. And it has the less regret as the loyal citizens have, in due form, claimed its protection. Those loyal citizens this Government is bound to recognize and protect, as being Virginia.

The attitude of "armed neutrality" adopted by Kentucky the President characterized as "disunion completed."

Figuratively speaking, it would be the building of an impassable wall along the line of separation—and yet not quite an impassable one, for under the guise of neutrality it would tie the hands of Union men and freely pass supplies from among them to the insurrectionists, which it could not do as an open enemy. . . . It recognizes no fidelity to the Constitution, no obligation to maintain the Union; and, while very many who have favored it are doubtless loyal citizens, it is, nevertheless, very injurious in effect.

The President proceeded to justify his orders to Lieutenant-General Scott authorizing him at discretion to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, an order which had been harshly criticised as arbitrary and unconstitutional.

The provision of the Constitution that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it," is equivalent to a provision—is a provision—that such privilege may be suspended when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety does require it. It was decided that we have a case of rebellion, and that the public safety does require the qualified suspension of the privilege of the writ which was authorized to be made. Now it is insisted that Congress, and not the Executive, is vested wth this power. But the Constitution itself is silent as to which or who is to exercise the power; and, as the provision was plainly made for a dangerous emergency, it cannot be believed the framers of the instrument intended that in every case the danger should run its course until Congress could be called together, the very assembling of which might be prevented, as was intended in this case, by the rebellion.

The President concluded his message proper with an appeal to Congress to pass those measures which would enable him to suppress the rebellion quickly and decisively:

It is now recommended that you give the legal means for making this contest a short and decisive one: that you place at the control of the Government for the work at least four hundred thousand men and $400,000,000. That number of men is about one-tenth of those of proper ages within the regions where, apparently, all are willing to engage; and the sum is less than a twenty-third part of the money value owned by the men who seem ready to devote the whole. A debt of $600,000,000 now is a less sum per head than was the debt of our Revolution when we came out of that struggle; and the money value in the country now bears even a greater proportion to what it was then than does the population. Surely each man has as strong a motive now to preserve our liberties as each had then to establish them.

A right result at this time will be worth more to the world than ten times the men and ten times the money. The evidence reaching us from the country leaves no doubt that the material for the work is abundant, and that it needs only the hand of legislation to give it legal sanction, and the hand of the Executive to give it practical shape and efficiency. One of the greatest perplexities of the Government is to avoid receiving troops faster than it can provide for them. In a word, the people will save their Government if the Government itself will do its part only indifferently well.

The latter half of the message was in its nature an address to the country upon the fallacies of secession and the constitutional duty imposed upon the President to suppress it by arms. The movers of secession, said Mr. Lincoln, in order to undermine the loyalty of the South to the Union, "invented an ingenious sophism, which, if conceded, was followed by perfectly logical steps through all the incidents to the complete destruction of the Union. The sophism itself is that any State in the Union may, consistently with the national Constitution, withdraw from the Union without the consent of the Union or of any other State. The little disguise that the supposed right is to be exercised only for just cause, themselves to be the sole judges of its justice, is too thin to merit any notice."

This sophism, said Mr. Lincoln, is based upon the false doctrine of State sovereignty. "Our States," he said, "have neither more nor less power than that reserved to them in the Union by the Constitution—no one of them ever having been a State out of the Union. . . . The States have their status in the Union, and they have no other legal status. If they break from this, they can only do so against law and by revolution. The Union, and not themselves separately, procured their independence. . . . The Union is older than any of the States, and, in fact, it created them as States."

The rights of the States reserved to them by the Constitution, argued Mr. Lincoln, are obviously administrative powers, and certainly do not include a power to destroy the Government itself. "This relative matter of national power and State rights, as a principle, is no other than the principle of generality and locality. Whatever concerns the whole should be confined to the whole—to the general Government, while whatever concerns only the State should be left exclusively to the State.

"The nation purchased with money," continued Mr. Lincoln, "the countries out of which several of these States were formed; is it just that they shall go off without leave and without refunding? . . . The nation is now in debt for money applied to the benefit of these so-called seceding States in common with the rest; is it just that . . . the remaining States pay the whole? . . . Again, if one State may secede, so may another, and when all shall have seceded none is left to pay the debts. . . . The principle itself is one of disintegration, and upon which no government can possibly endure."

It may be affirmed, without extravagance, that the free institutions we enjoy have developed the powers and improved the condition of our whole people beyond any example in the world. Of this we now have a striking and an impressive illustration. So large an army as the Government has now on foot was never before known without a soldier in it but who had taken his place there of his own free choice. But, more than this, there are many single regiments whose members, one and another, possess full practical knowledge of all the arts, sciences, professions, and whatever else, whether useful or elegant, is known in the world; and there is scarcely one from which there could not be selected a President, a Cabinet, a Congress, and perhaps a Court, abundantly competent to administer the Government itself. Nor do I say this is not true also in the army of our late friends, now adversaries in this contest; but if it is, so much better the reason why the Government which has conferred such benefits on both them and us should not be broken up. Whoever, in any section, proposes to abandon such a government, would do well to consider in deference to what principle it is that he does it; what better he is likely to get in its stead; whether the substitute will give, or be intended to give, so much of good to the people? There are some foreshadowings on this subject. Our adversaries have adopted some declarations of independence, in which, unlike the good old one, penned by Jefferson, they omit the words, "all men are created equal." Why? They have adopted a temporary national constitution, in the preamble of which unlike our good old one, signed by Washington, they omit, "We, the people," and substitute, "We, the deputies of the sovereign and independent States." Why? Why this deliberate pressing out of view the rights of men and the authority of the people?

This is essentially a people's contest. On the side of the Union it is a struggle for maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men; to lift artificial weights from all shoulders; to clear the paths of laudable pursuits for all; to afford all an unfettered start and a fair chance in the race of life. Yielding to partial and temporary departures, from necessity, this is the leading object of the Government for whose existence we contend.

I am most happy to believe that the plain people understand and appreciate this. It is worthy of note that, while in this, the Government's, hour of trial, large numbers of those in the army and navy who have been favored with the offices have resigned and proved false to the hand which had pampered them, not one common soldier or common sailor is known to have deserted his flag.

Great honor is due to those officers who remained true, despite the example of their treacherous associates; but the greatest honor, and most important fact of all, is the unanimous firmness of the common soldiers and common sailors. To the last man, so far as known, they have successfully resisted the traitorous efforts of those whose commands but an hour before they obeyed as absolute law. This is the patriotic instinct of plain people. They understand, without an argument, that the destroying the Government which was made by Washington means no good to them.

Our popular Government has often been called an experiment. Two points in it our people have already settled—the successful establishing and the successful administering of it. One still remains—its successful maintenance against a formidable internal attempt to overthrow it. It is now for them to demonstrate to the world that those who can fairly carry an election can also suppress a rebellion; that ballots are the rightful and peaceful successors of bullets; and that, when ballots have fairly and constitutionally decided, there can be no successful peal back to bullets; that there can be no successful appeal, except to ballots themselves, at succeeding elections. Such will be a great lesson of peace; teaching men that what they cannot take by an election neither can they take by a war; teaching all the folly of being the beginners of a war.

It was with the deepest regret that the Executive found the duty of employing the war power in defence of the Government forced upon him. He could but perform this duty or surrender the existence of the Government. No compromise by public servants could, in this case, be a cure; not that compromises are not often proper, but no popular government can long survive a marked precedent that those who carry an election can save the government from immediate destruction only by giving up the main point upon which the people gave the election. The people themselves, and not their servants, can safely reverse their own deliberate decisions.

As a private citizen the Executive could not have consented that these institutions shall perish; much less could he, in betrayal of so vast and so sacred a trust as the free people have confided to him. He felt that he had no moral right to shrink, nor even to count the chances of his own life in what might follow. In full view of his great responsibility he has, so far, done what he has deemed his duty. You will now, according to your own judgment, perform yours. He sincerely hopes that your views and your actions may so accord with his as to assure all faithful citizens who have been disturbed in their rights of a certain and speedy restoration to them, under the Constitution and the laws.

And having thus chosen our course without guile and with pure purpose, let us renew our trust in God, and go forward without fear and with manly hearts.

CHAPTER III

The War-making Power: Does It Lie in the President or Congress?

TEN days after the President had promulgated his enheartening message, Congress, as well as the Northern people, were rejoiced by the victories of General McClellan at Rich Mountain and Carrick's Ford, whereby western Virginia was secured to the Union. A week later, however, their joyful anticipation of an early and complete conquest of the seceded States was turned into dismay; instead of this easy victory perhaps it was the North which would be invaded; the national capital might fall, and the Southern Confederacy dictate from the halls of Congress terms for its recognition as a separate republic, and, indeed, the dominant one on the continent.

Battle of Bull Run [Manassas]

On July 21 the Confederate troops under Generals P. G. T. Beauregard and Joseph Johnston defeated the Union troops under General Irwin McDowell at Manassas [Bull Run] Va. The Union retreat became a disorderly flight back to Washington. Many civilians had gone to see the battle, and these, mingling with the retreating soldiers, contributed to the confusion. One Congressman was captured by the rebels—a salutary lesson to his colleagues of the evil effects of over-confidence.

The entire country was thrown into a panic, from which it was some time in recovering. On July 29, "after seven sleepless nights," Horace Greeley wrote a despairing letter to Lincoln, in which he advised the President that, if, in his opinion, the recent disaster was fatal, he should not shrink even from making peace with the rebels at once, and on their own terms.

Lincoln had spent sleepless nights, not in selfish nursing of grief, but in planning for the salvation of the Republic. He placed General McClellan in chief command at Washington, with power to organize a new army out of the three years' regiments beginning to pour in upon the capital, and he devised plans for a vigorous offensive campaign in the West.

Congress, which, during the days of victory, had upheld the President in granting him the legislation he asked, did not falter in the days of defeat, but was, if anything, more whole-hearted in its support, passing more drastic measures than it otherwise might have done, to exert the full military power of the Republic in order to preserve its honor and integrity.

War Acts of Congress

It authorized a loan of $250,000,000; it passed laws to define and punish treason; it superseded the "Morrill Tariff," enacted during the previous session, by a "War Tariff" in which increases of rate of duty were made wherever these would result in increases of revenue; it passed an income tax; it authorized the President to close Southern ports in cases where collection of duties was impossible, to call out 500,000 volunteers if necessary, and to confiscate the property of secessionists, including slaves (where these were employed against the Government), and, in a section of the act of August 6 to increase the pay of the army, it validated all the President's preceding acts to suppress the rebellion, such as calling out troops, blockading Southern ports, and suspending the writ of habeas corpus.

In the discussion upon the President's message and the acts passed by Congress in accordance with his recommendations, strenuous opposition was manifested by "State Rights" Democrats to what they considered to be "executive usurpation."

On July 10, 1861, Clement L. Vallandigham [Dem.], of Ohio, replied in the House to the President's message. On July 16 William S. Holman [Dem.], of Indiana, replied to him.

Constitutionality of the President's Acts

House of Representatives, July 10-16, 1861

Mr. Vallandigham.—Holding up the shield of the Constitution, and standing here in the place and with the manhood of a representative of the people, I propose to myself to-day the ancient freedom of speech used within these walls.

Mr. Chairman, the President, in the message before us, demands the extraordinary loan of $400,000,000—an amount nearly ten times greater than the entire public debt, State and Federal, at the close of the Revolution in 1783, and four times as much as the total expenditures during the three years' war with Great Britain, in 1812.

Sir, that same Constitution which I hold up, and to which I give my whole heart and my utmost loyalty, commits to Congress alone the power to borrow money and to fix the purposes to which it shall be applied, and expressly limits army appropriations to the term of two years. Whenever this House shall have become but a mere office wherein to register the decrees of the Executive, it will be high time to abolish it.

Sir, it has been the misfortune of the President from the beginning that he has totally and wholly underestimated the magnitude and character of the revolution with which he had to deal, or surely he never would have ventured upon the wicked and hazardous experiment of calling thirty millions of people to arms among themselves, without the counsel and authority of Congress. But when at last he found himself hemmed in by the revolution, and this city in danger, as he declares, and waked up thus, as the proclamation of the 15th of April proves him to have waked up, to the reality and significance of the movement, why did he not forthwith assemble Congress, and throw himself upon the wisdom and patriotism of the representatives of the States and of the people, instead of usurping powers which the Constitution has expressly conferred upon us? aye, sir, and powers which Congress had, but a little while before, repeatedly and emphatically refused to exercise, or to permit him to exercise?

At twelve o'clock on the 4th of March last, from the eastern portico of this Capitol, and, in the presence of twenty thousand of his countrymen, but enveloped in a cloud of soldiery which no other American President ever saw, Abraham Lincoln took the oath of office to support the Constitution, and delivered his inaugural—a message, I regret to say, not written in the direct and straightforward language which becomes an American President and an American statesman, and which was expected from the plain, blunt, honest man of the Northwest, but with the forked tongue and crooked counsel of the New York politician [Secretary Seward], leaving thirty millions of people in doubt whether it meant peace or war. But, whatever may have been the secret purpose and meaning of the inaugural, practically for six weeks the policy of peace prevailed; and they were weeks of happiness to the patriot and prosperity to the country. Business revived; trade returned; commerce flourished. Never was there a fairer prospect before any people. Secession in the past languished and was spiritless and harmless; secession in the future was arrested and perished. By overwhelming majorities, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Missouri all declared for the old Union, and every heart beat high with hope that, in due course of time, and through faith and patience and peace, and by ultimate and adequate compromise, every State would be restored to it.

Mr. Vallandigham then claimed that party necessity caused the change from this pacific policy to one of coercion.

The peace policy was crushing out the Republican party. Under that policy, sir, it was melting away like snow before the sun. The general elections in Rhode Island and Connecticut, and municipal elections in New York and in the Western States, gave abundant evidence that the people were resolved upon the most ample and satisfactory constitutional guaranties to the South as the price of a restoration of Union. And then it was, sir, that the long and agonizing howl of defeated and disappointed politicians came up before the Administration. The newspaper press teemed with appeals and threats to the President. The mails groaned under the weight of letters demanding a change of policy; while a secret conclave of the Governors of Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and other States assembled here promised men and money to support the President in the irrepressible conflict which they now invoked. And thus it was, sir, that the necessities of a party in the pangs of dissolution, in the very hour and article of death, demanding vigorous measures, which could result in nothing but civil war, renewed secession, and absolute and eternal disunion, were preferred and hearkened to before the peace and harmony and prosperity of the whole country.

Another cause for the change of policy, said Mr. Vallandigham, was "the passage of an obscure, ill-considered, ill-digested, and unstatesmanlike high protective tariff act, known as the Morrill tariff." The Confederate Government had adopted the old United States revenue tariff of 1857, the lower duties of which began to turn trade southward.

Political association and union, it was well known, must soon follow the direction of trade and interest. The City of New York, the great commercial emporium of the Union, and the Northwest, the chief granary of the Union, began to clamor now loudly for a repeal of the pernicious and ruinous tariff. Threatened thus with the loss of both political power and wealth or the repeal of the tariff, and at last of both, New England—and Pennsylvania, too, the land of Penn, cradled in peace—demanded now coercion and civil war, with all its horrors, as the price of preserving either from destruction. And, sir, when once this policy was begun, these self-same motives of waning commerce and threatened loss of trade impelled the great City of New York, her merchants and her politicians and her press, with here and there an honorable exception, to place herself in the very front rank among the worshipers of Moloch. Much, indeed, of that outburst and uprising in the North which followed the proclamation of the 15th of April, as well, perhaps, as the proclamation itself, was called forth, not so much by the fall of Sumter—an event long anticipated—as by the notion that the "insurrection," as it was called, might be crushed out in a few weeks, if not by the display, certainly, at least, by the presence of an overwhelming force.

I will not venture now to assert, what may yet some day be made to appear, that the subsequent acts of the Administration, and its enormous and persistent infractions of the Constitution, its high-handed usurpations of power, formed any part of a deliberate conspiracy to overthrow the present form of Federal republican government, and to establish a strong centralized government in its stead. No, sir; whatever their purposes now, I rather think that, in the beginning, they rushed heedlessly and headlong into the gulf, believing that, as the seat of war was then far distant and difficult of access, the display of vigor in reinforcing Sumter and Pickens, and in calling out seventy-five thousand militia upon the firing of the first gun, and, above all, in that exceedingly happy and original conceit of commanding the insurgent States to "disperse in twenty days," would not, on the one hand, precipitate a crisis, while, upon the other, it would satisfy its own violent partisans, and thus revive and restore the falling fortunes of the Republican party.

I can hardly conceive, sir, that the President and his advisers could be guilty of the exceeding folly of expecting to carry on a general civil war by a mere posse comitatus of three months' militia. It may be, indeed, that, with wicked and most desperate cunning, the President meant all this as a mere entering wedge to that which was to rive the oak asunder; or possibly as a test, to learn the public sentiment of the North and West. But, however that may be, the rapid secession and movements of Virginia, North Carolina, Arkansas, and Tennesseee, taking with them, as I have said elsewhere, four millions and a half of people, immense wealth, inexhaustible resources, five hundred thousand fighting men, and the graves of Washington and Jackson, and bringing up, too, in one single day the frontier from the Gulf to the Ohio and the Potomac, together with the abandonment by the one side and the occupation by the other of Harper's Ferry and the Norfolk navy yard, and the fierce gust and whirlwind of passion in the North, compelled either a sudden waking up of the President and his advisers to the frightful significancy of the act which they had committed in heedlessly breaking the vase which imprisoned the slumbering demon of civil war, or else a premature but most rapid development of the daring plot to foster and promote secession, and then to set up a new and strong form of government in the States which might remain in the Union.

But, whatever may have been the purpose, I assert here today, as a Representative, that every principal act of the Administration since has been a glaring usurpation of power and a palpable and dangerous violation of that very Constitution which this civil war is professedly waged to support. Sir, I pass by the proclamation of the 15th of April summoning the militia—not to defend this capital; there is not a word about the capital in the proclamation, and there was then no possible danger to it from any quarter; but to retake and occupy forts and property a thousand miles away. The militia thus called out, with a shadow, at least, of authority, were amply sufficient to protect the capital against any force which was then likely to be sent against it—and the event has proved it—and ample enough also to suppress the outbreak in Maryland. Every other principal act of the Administration might well have been postponed, and ought to have been postponed, until the meeting of Congress; or, if the exigencies of the occasion demanded it, Congress should forthwith have been assembled.

But, sir, Congress was not assembled. The entire responsibility of the whole work was boldly assumed by the Executive, and all the powers required for the purposes in hand were boldly usurped from either the States or the people, or from the legislative department; while the voice of the judiciary, that last refuge and hope of liberty, was turned away from with contempt.

Sir, the right of blockade—and I begin with it—is a belligerent right, incident to a state of war, and it cannot be exercised until war has been declared or recognized; and Congress alone can declare or recognize war. But Congress had not declared or recognized war. On the contrary, they had but a little while before expressly refused to declare it, or to arm the President with the power to make it. And thus the President, in declaring a blockade of certain ports in the States of the South, and in applying to it the rules governing blockades as between independent powers, violated the Constitution.

But if, on the other hand, he meant to deal with these States as still in the Union, and subject to Federal authority, then he usurped a power which belongs to Congress alone—the power to abolish and close up ports of entry; a power, too, which Congress had also but a few weeks before refused to exercise. And yet, without the repeal or abolition of ports of entry, any attempt by either Congress or the President to blockade these ports is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

Jackson, sir! the great Jackson! did not dare to do this without authority of Congress; but the mimic Jackson of today blockades not only Charleston harbor, but the whole Southern coast, three thousand miles in extent, by a single stroke of the pen.

Next after the blockade, sir, in the catalogue of daring executive usurpations, comes the proclamation of the 3d of May, and the orders of the War and Navy Departments in pursuance of it—a proclamation and usurpation which would have cost any English sovereign his head at any time within the last two hundred years. Sir, the Constitution not only confines to Congress the right to declare war, but expressly provides that "Congress (not the President) shall have power to raise and support armies"; and to "provide and maintain a navy." And yet the President, of his own mere will and authority, and without the shadow of right, has proceeded to increase, and has increased, the standing army by twenty-five thousand men; the navy by eighteen thousand; and has called for and accepted the services of forty regiments of volunteers for three years, numbering forty-two thousand men, and making thus a grand army or military force, raised by executive proclamation alone, without the sanction of Congress, without warrant of law, and in direct violation of the Constitution and of his oath of office, of eighty-five thousand soldiers enlisted for three and five years, and already in the field. And yet the President now asks us to support the army which he has thus raised; to ratify his usurpations by a law ex post facto, and thus to make ourselves parties to our own degradation and to his infractions of the Constitution. Meanwhile, however, he has taken good care not only to enlist the men, organize the regiments, and muster them into service, but to provide in advance for a horde of forlorn, wornout, and broken-down politicians of his own party, by appointing, either by himself or through the governors of the States, major-generals, brigadier-generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, adjutants, quartermasters, and surgeons, without any limit as to numbers, and without so much as once saying to Congress, "By your leave, gentlemen."

Beginning with this wide breach of the Constitution, this enormous usurpation of the most dangerous of all powers—the power of the sword—other infractions and assumptions were easy; and, after public liberty, private right soon fell. The privacy of the telegraph was invaded in the search after treason and traitors; although it turns out, significantly enough, that the only victim, so far, is one of the appointees and especial pets of the Administration. The telegraphic dispatches, preserved under every pledge of secrecy for the protection and safety of the telegraph companies, were seized and carried away without search warrant, without probable cause, without oath, and without description of the places to be searched or of the things to be seized, and in plain violation of the right of the people to be secure in their houses, persons, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures. One step more, sir, will bring upon us search and seizure of the public mails; and finally, as in the worst days of English oppression—as in the times of the Russells and the Sydneys of English martyrdom—of the drawers and secretaries of the private citizen; though even then tyrants had the grace to look to the forms of the law, and the execution was judicial murder, not military slaughter.

But who shall say that the future Tiberius of America shall have the modesty of his Roman predecessor, in extenuation of whose character it is written by the great historian, avertit oculos, jussitque scelera non spectavit![1]

Sir, the rights of property having been thus wantonly violated, it needed but a little stretch of usurpation to invade the sanctity of the person; and a victim was not long wanting. A private citizen of Maryland, not subject to the rules and articles of war—not in a case arising in the land or naval forces, nor in the militia when in actual service—is seized in his own house, in the dead hour of night, not by any civil officer nor upon any civil process, but by a band of armed soldiers, under the verbal orders of a military chief, and is ruthlessly torn from his wife and his children and hurried off to a fortress of the United States—and that fortress, as if in mockery, the very one over whose ramparts had floated that star-spangled banner immortalized in song by the patriot prisoner who,

"By the dawn's early light," saw its folds gleaming amid the wreck of battle, and invoked the blessings of Heaven upon it, and prayed that it might long wave—

"O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

And, sir, when the highest judicial officer of the land, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, upon whose shoulders, "when the judicial ermine" fell, it touched nothing not as spotless as itself, the aged, the venerable, the gentle and pure-minded Taney, who but a little while before had administered to the President the oath to support the Constitution and to execute the laws, issued, as by law it was his sworn duty to issue, the high prerogative writ of habeas corpus—that great writ of right, that main bulwark of personal liberty, commanding the body of the accused to be brought before him that justice and right might be done by due course of law, and without denial or delay; the gates of the fortress, its cannon turned toward and in plain sight of the city where the court sat, and frowning from the ramparts, were closed against the officer of the law, and the answer returned that the officer in command has, by the authority of the President, suspended the writ of habeas corpus. And thus it is, sir, that the accused has ever since been held a prisoner without due process of law; without bail; without presentment by a grand jury; without speedy or public trial by a petit jury of his own State or district, or any trial at all; without information of the nature and cause of the accusation; without being confronted with the witnesses against him; without compulsory process to obtain witnesses in his favor; and without the assistance of counsel for his defence.[1] And this is our boasted American liberty? And thus it is, too, sir, that here, here, in America, in the seventy-third year of the Republic, that great writ and security of personal freedom which it cost the patriots and freemen of England six hundred years of labor and toil and blood to extort and to hold fast from venal judges and tyrant kings; written in the great charter at Runnymede by the iron barons, who made the simple Latin and uncouth words of the times, nullus liber homo,[2] in the language of Chatham, worth all the classics; recovered and confirmed a hundred times afterward, as often as violated and stolen away, and finally and firmly secured at last by the great act of Charles II, and transferred thence to our own Constitution and laws, has been wantonly and ruthlessly trampled in the dust. Ay, sir, that great writ, which no English judge, no English minister, no king or queen of England, dare disobey; that writ brought over by our fathers and cherished by them as a priceless inheritance of liberty, an American President has contemptuously set at defiance. Nay, more, he has ordered his subordinate military chiefs to suspend it at their discretion! And yet, after all this, he coolly comes before this House and the Senate and the country, and pleads that he is only preserving and protecting the Constitution; and demands and expects of this House and of the Senate and the country their thanks for his usurpations of power; while outside of this Capitol his myrmidons are clamoring for impeachment of the Chief Justice, as engaged in a conspiracy to break down the Federal Government!

[1] This case is known as ex parte Merryman, and is found in 9 Amer. Law Reg. 524; 1 Taney's, Dec. 246.

[2] "No free man."

Sir, however much necessity—the tyrant's plea—may be urged in extenuation of the usurpations and infractions of the President in regard to public liberty, there can be no such apology or defence for his invasions of private right. What overruling necessity required the violation of the sanctity of private property and private confidence? What great public danger demanded the arrest and imprisonment, without trial by common law, of one single private citizen, for an act done weeks before, openly, and by authority of his State? If guilty of treason, was not the judicial power ample enough and strong enough for his conviction and punishment? What, then, was needed in his case but the precedent under which other men, in other places, might become the victims of executive suspicion and displeasure?

As to the pretence, sir, that the President has the constitutional right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, I will not waste time in arguing it. The case is as plain as words can make it. It is a legislative power; it is found only in the legislative article; it belongs to Congress only to do it. Subordinate officers have disobeyed it; General Wilkinson disobeyed it, but he sent his prisoners on for judicial trial; General Jackson disobeyed it and was reprimanded by James Madison; but no President, no body but Congress, ever before assumed the right to suspend it. And, sir, that other pretence, of necessity, I repeat, cannot be allowed. It had no existence in fact. The Constitution cannot be preserved by violating it. It is an offence to the intelligence of this House and of the country to pretend that all this, and the other gross and multiplied infractions of the Constitution and usurpations of power, were done by the President and his advisers out of pure love and devotion to the Constitution. But if so, sir, then they have but one step further to take, and declare, in the language of Sir Boyle Roche in the Irish House of Commons, that such is the depth of their attachment to it that they are prepared to give up, not merely a part, but the whole of the Constitution, to preserve the remainder. And yet, if indeed this pretext of necessity be well founded, then let me say that a cause which demands the sacrifice of the Constitution and of the dearest securities of property, liberty, and life cannot be just; at least, it is not worth the sacrifice.

Sir, the power and rights of the States and the people, and of their Representatives, have been usurped; the sanctity of the private house and of private property has been invaded; and the liberty of the person wantonly and wickedly stricken down; free speech, too, has been repeatedly denied; and all this under the plea of necessity. Sir, the right of petition will follow next—nay, it has already been shaken; the freedom of the press will soon fall after it; and let me whisper in your ear that there will be few to mourn over its loss, unless, indeed, its ancient high and honorable character shall be rescued and redeemed from its present reckless mendacity and degradation. Freedom of religion will yield too, at last, amid the exultant shouts of millions, who have seen its holy temples defiled and its white robes of a former innocency trampled now under the polluting hoofs of an ambitious and faithless or fanatical clergy. Meantime national banks, bankrupt laws, a vast and permanent public debt, high tariffs, heavy direct taxation, enormous expenditure, gigantic and stupendous peculation, anarchy first and a strong government afterward, no more State lines, no more State governments, and a consolidated monarchy or vast centralized military despotism, must all follow in the history of the future, as in the history of the past they have, centuries ago, been written.

Sir, I have spoken freely and fearlessly to-day, as became an American Representative and an American citizen; one firmly resolved, come what may, not to lose his own constitutional liberties, nor to surrender his own constitutional rights in the vain effort to impose these rights and liberties upon ten millions of unwilling people. I have spoken earnestly, too, but yet not as one unmindful of the solemnity of the scenes which surround us upon every side to-day. Sir, when the Congress of the United States assembled here on the 3d of December, 1860, just seven months ago, the Senate was composed of sixty-six Senators, representing the thirty-three States of the Union, and this House of two hundred and thirty-seven members—every State being present. It was a grand and solemn spectacle; the embassadors of three and thirty sovereignties and of thirty-one million people, the mightiest republic on earth, in general Congress assembled. The new wings of the Capitol had then but just recently been finished, in all their gorgeous magnificence, and, except a hundred marines at the navy yard, not a soldier was within forty miles of Washington.

Sir, the Congress of the United States meets here again to-day; but how changed the scene. Instead of thirty-four States, twenty-three only, one less than the number forty years ago, are here or in the other wing of the Capitol. Forty-six Senators and a hundred and seventy-three Representatives constitute the Congress of the now United States. And of these, eight Senators and twenty-four Representatives, from four States only, linger here yet as deputies from that great South which, from the beginning of the Government, contributed so much to mold its policy, to build up its greatness, and to control its destinies. The vacant seats are, indeed, still here; and the escutcheons of their respective States look down now solemnly and sadly from these vaulted ceilings. But the Virginia of Washington and Henry and Madison, of Marshall and Jefferson, of Randolph and Monroe, the birthplace of Clay, the mother of States and of Presidents; the Carolinas of Pinckney and Sumter and Marion, of Calhoun and Macon; and Tennessee, the home and burial place of Jackson; and other States, too, once most loyal and true, are no longer here. The voices and the footsteps of the great dead of the past two ages of the Republic linger still, it may be in echo, along the stately corridors of this Capitol; but their descendants from nearly one-half of the States of the Republic will meet with us no more within these marble halls. But in the parks and lawns, and upon the broad avenues of this spacious city, seventy thousand soldiers have supplied their places; and the morning drumbeat from a score of encampments within sight of this beleaguered capital gives melancholy warning to the Representatives of the States and of the people that AMID ARMS LAWS ARE SILENT.

Sir, some years hence, I would fain hope some months hence, the present generation will demand to know the cause of all this; and some ages hereafter the grand and impartial tribunal of history will make solemn and diligent inquest of the authors of this terrible revolution.

At the close of his speech Mr. Vallandigham, merely to record his position, presented a resolution to the effect that the Federal Government, being the agent of the States, should be sustained by the people in the exercise of its constitutional powers for the preservation of the Union.

Mr. Holman, in his reply to Mr. Vallandigham, declared that a pacific policy could no longer be pursued by the Government; indeed at no time since the secession of the Confederate States would it have availed.

South Carolina, Florida, and Mississippi declared the separation to be eternal. It was not an apprehension of encroachment on their constitutional rights that induced secession; for, from the very beginning of this Administration the opposition would have controlled every measure of its policy. No, sir; the triumph of the Republican party was not the cause, but the pretence and the occasion, for dissolving the Union.

Thus, by the intemperate ambition of the leaders of public opinion in the South, war became inevitable; for upon the part of the secession leaders it is war—war with all its violence and hatred and malignity and bitterness. What, then, sir, on the part of the loyal men of the nation, is the object of the war?

It is not vengeance; for, in the midst of these vast preparations, the public indignation at the wanton wickedness of this attempt to overthrow the Constitution is softened by shame and sorrow, and the very bitterness of grief. It is not for the purpose of conquest or subjugation; not to enlarge the powers of the Government or increase its territorial limits; not to establish the supremacy of the one section of the Union, or to diminish the social or political rights of the other. But I say, sir, here in my place, in the presence of the Representatives of the people, on the authority of a well-defined public opinion, that the sole and only purpose of the people of the United States in this appeal to arms IS TO MAINTAIN THE UNION UNDER THE COMPACTS AND SAFEGUARDS OF THE CONSTITUTION. The popular instincts are not to be deceived. But for this high purpose, not a farmer would have left his field or a mechanic his shop; not a sword would have been withdrawn from its scabbard. Not only has this single purpose summoned your army into the field, but if it were possible that any other purpose should be developed—as the invasion of any constitutional right or the usurpation of political power—your army would either, with irresistible fury, hew down the new enemies of the Constitution or, overwhelmed with grief, abandon the tented field in despair. I tell you, sir, that, for purity of purpose, unselfishness of patriotism, intelligence, and cultivation, the army of the Republic may challenge the history of the world for a parallel.

A generation unaccustomed to arms, and in the enjoyment of unexampled blessings of peace, trampling on every selfish consideration, is almost in a moment transformed into a nation of soldiers; peaceful cities and towns and villages and the scenes of rural life, unused to even the tones of martial music, except in celebrating the achievement of a past generation, became the camps of gathering armies. The hereditary feuds of party, bitter as they may have been, are silenced, and the landmarks of political opinion, apparently indelible in the growth of more than half a century, are, at least for the moment, swept away. One sentiment animates every bosom: "The Union must be preserved."

No people have ever so clearly comprehended the necessity of an appeal to arms. The whole people understand the origin and immediate cause of our misfortunes. The unbridled ambition of a few men, unfortunately too great in the confidence of the South, indulging in the delusive hope of a great Southern empire, and, by new commercial relations, making the cities of Charleston and Savannah and New Orleans the commercial rivals of New York and Philadelphia and Boston, suggested the policy of a Southern Confederacy; and the leading statesmen, whose power was to be increased, seizing upon the intemperate opinions of a few fanatical men of the North on the question of slavery, inspired the Southern mind with the belief that the North meditated an assault on the domestic policy of the South and an invasion of their constitutional rights, and thus ensnared the Southern people into the whirlpool of revolution, and aroused such a storm of public rage as might only be satiated by overturning a Union which they themselves and their fathers, for more than three generations, had believed to be the very palladium of their safety.

To recognize secession or acquiesce in the right of peaceful revolution is an end of the Government, destroying the foundation of public faith on which it rests. What State would aid in the construction of forts and arsenals, or other works of national necessity, within the limits of other States, with the right of secession or acquiescence in revolution the established policy of the Government? To maintain the Union by an appeal to arms, or submit to total national ruin, is the only alternative. Could a brave and free people, controlled by sentiments of justice and honor, hesitate in their choice?

In my judgment an overwhelming majority of the people of the free States would not only have defended the constitutional rights of the South while in the Union, but would have made sacrifice upon sacrifice, even of opinion, to preserve the old fraternal relations and save us from the horrors of civil war, but secession has left us no alternative. It has appealed to the sword; and bitter as may be our grief, dark and gloomy as may be the future, we cannot escape the issue. The sword must decide the contest. A generation, twelve months ago the most happy and peaceful and prosperous that the world has ever seen, may be sacrificed by the mad ambition of the hour. But, if public liberty shall be upheld, the sacrifices of this generation, its shame and sorrow and tears, may redound to the stability and enduring honor of the Republic. As generations of the past have been, so ours may be sacrificed for the happiness and prosperity of the future.

But, sir, I cannot suppress my astonishment that a Representative of any part of the people of the great West, whose interests are so indissolubly united with the free navigation of the Mississippi River, should doubt the overwhelming necessity of maintaining the Union at every hazard.

Recognize the Southern Confederacy, and you place the navigation of the Mississippi, and with it the prosperity of the whole West, at the mercy of a foreign government. It may be said that mutual interests will produce treaties of mutual advantage. But a right existing in nature, sustained by every consideration of justice, and sanctioned by national compacts, cannot be the further subject of treaty. It is a right which the brave men of the West, following the example of their fathers, will hold, if it must be, by the tenure of the sword, and not by the arts of diplomacy. They will not pay one cent for the right to navigate the Mississippi River or any of its tributaries. If the South persists in the obstruction of this right, as she must do if she would maintain her separate nationality, the universal sentiment will be, "millions for war, but not one cent for tribute." If the Government shall hesitate in the vindication of this right, the people will vindicate it for themselves, and will never desist until the great river of the West, from its springs to the Gulf, shall be as free to their commerce as the ocean is to the commerce of the world.

So far, then, as the great West is concerned, there can be but one sentiment—there can be no compromise at the expense of the Union; there can be no settlement of pending difficulties except on the basis of the Constitution and the union of the States. The constitutional rights of no loyal citizen are to be impaired. The domestic and social policy of no State is to be invaded. The constitutional powers of the general Government are to be sustained, not to be enlarged. It is war for the Union, and not for the subjugation of States. As a Democrat and a citizen of the dominant section, I would hail with joy any proposition for compromise and peace coming from the people of the States the wild ambition of whose leaders has plunged the nation into the horrors of civil war, and for the time crushed the Union sentiment of the South. I would insist that the Government should meet such propositions, springing from a returning sense of patriotism and honor, in a spirit of magnanimity, of conciliation, and kindness. I would only demand, sir, that the misguided people of the South should submit, not to the supremacy of the North, or to the force of military power, or to new forms of government, but to the majesty of the Constitution—the Constitution as it was made by their and our fathers; and until that auspicious hour shall come, sir, the army of the Union, following the flag of the Republic wherever it shall be unfurled, cannot with honor return their swords to their scabbards or turn their thoughts upon the sweet blessings of peace.

In the Senate on July 16 John C. Breckinridge [Ky.] attacked the acts of the President as unconstitutional and denied the power of Congress to validate them. Edward D. Baker [Ore.], Kinsley S. Bingham [Mich.], and Henry S. Lane [Ind.] replied to him.

Constitutionality of the President's Acts

Senate, July 16, 1861

Senator Breckinridge.—I deny, Mr. President, that one branch of this Government can indemnify any other branch of the Government for a violation of the Constitution or the laws. The powers conferred upon the general Government by the people of the States are the measure of its authority. Those powers have been confided to the different departments and the boundaries of those departments determined with perfect exactitude, and I deny that one can encroach upon another, or can indemnify it for a usurpation of powers not confided to it by the Constitution. Sir, Congress, by a joint resolution, has no more right, in my opinion, to make valid a violation of the Constitution and the laws by the President than the President would have by an entry upon the executive journal to make valid a usurpation of the executive power by the legislative department. Congress has no more right to make valid an unconstitutional act of the President than the President would have to make valid an act of the Supreme Court of the United States encroaching upon executive power; or than the Supreme Court would have the right to make valid an act of the Executive encroaching upon the judicial power.

On the contrary, I think that the acts of the President were usurpations, and that, so far from a resolution being passed ratifying and approving them, I think the Chief Magistrate of the country—and I have a right in my place to say it—should be rebuked by the vote of both Houses of Congress.

The President of the United States, first, has established a blockade of the whole Southern coast and an interior blockade of the chief rivers. By what authority has he done it? Where is the clause of the Constitution that authorized him? An attempt was made at the last session of Congress to confer the authority by bill. It did not pass. Congress refused to grant this authority by law in face of the fact that seven States had then withdrawn from the Federal Union. Will any Senator say that the power exists, under the Constitution, upon the part of the President to establish a blockade? It is an incident of war, sir; it is the exercise of the war power; and the Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall pass an act to declare war, or exercise that power.

In this connection the speaker quoted from remarks made by Daniel Webster during the troubles in South Carolina in 1832-33, when it was suggested that President Jackson would blockade the port of Charleston.

"For one, I raise my voice beforehand against the unauthorized employment of military power, against superseding the authority of the laws by an armed force, under pretence of putting down nullification. The President has no authority to blockade Charleston; the President has no authority to employ military force, till he shall be duly required so to do, by law, and by the civil authorities. His duty is to cause the laws to be executed. His duty is to support the civil authority."

It is proposed, continued the speaker, to make valid the act of the President in enlisting men for three and five years. I ask you by what authority of Constitution or law he has done this act? The power is not conferred in the Constitution; it has not been granted by the law. It is, therefore, an unconstitutional and illegal act of Executive power. The President, of his own will—and that is one of the acts enumerated in this joint resolution which it is proposed to approve and ratify—has added immensely to the force of the regular army. The Constitution says that Congress shall raise armies, and a law now upon your statute book limits the number of the regular force, officers and men. Hence, sir, that is an act in derogation both of the Constitution and of the laws.

The President has added immensely to the navy of the United States. The Constitution says that Congress shall provide and maintain a navy, and there is now a law upon the statute book limiting the number of men to be employed in the navy. That, like the rest, sir, will not bear argument.

Mr. President, it needs no elaborate argument to show that the Executive authority of the United States has no right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. I content myself here, unless some defence be offered upon this floor, with referring to the fact that the privilege to suspend the writ in case of rebellion or invasion is classed among the legislative powers of the Constitution. That article of the Constitution which refers to the powers of the President, executive powers, touches not the question. I may add that upon no occasion has it ever been asserted in the Congress of the United States, as far as I recollect our history, that this power exists upon the part of the Executive. On one memorable occasion in our history, Jefferson thought a period had arrived when, perhaps, that writ might properly be suspended. He did not undertake to do it himself. He submitted the question to Congress. He did not even recommend that it should be done; and in the long debates that occurred in this and the other branch of Congress upon the question of suspending the writ, which finally was not suspended, not one intimation was given by any speaker in either House, as far as I remember, that the power existed on the part of the President.

What part of the Constitution is it, sir, which confers upon the President the right to do this act more than upon any other officer, executive or judicial, of the Government? Surely it is not that portion of the Constitution which declares that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The most eminent commentators on the Constitution of the United States concur in saying that it is purely a legislative act. Justice Story, one of the most eminent judicial lights of New England, in his "Commentaries on the Constitution," declares it to belong to the legislature and not to the Executive. The Supreme Court of the United States have determined that Congress alone can suspend the privilege of the writ. Upon a recent occasion, in a case which arose in Maryland,[1] the present Chief Justice [Roger B. Taney], in an opinion which has never been answered, and which never will be answered, exhausts the argument, and makes all other reference to the subject idle and superfluous.

You propose to make valid the President's suspension of the writ, without making a defence of his act either upon constitutional or legal grounds. What will be the effect, sir? In approving what the President has done in this regard in the past, you invite him to do the like in the future; and the whole country will lie prostrate at the feet of executive power when, in the opinion of the President, the time shall have come to suspend the rights of individuals and to have substituted military power for judicial authority.

I enumerate what I regard as usurpations of the Executive to go upon the record as a protest of those of us who are not willing to see the Constitution subverted and the public liberty trampled under foot, under whatever pretext of necessity or otherwise.

The Constitution declares that Congress alone shall have power "to declare war." The President has made war. Congress alone shall have power "to raise and support armies." The President has raised and supported armies on his own authority. Congress shall have power "to provide and maintain a navy." The President has provided an immense navy and maintains it without authority of law. The Constitution declares that no money shall be taken from the treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. The President has taken money from the treasury without appropriations made by law for the purpose of carrying out the preceding unconstitutional acts. One of the amendments to the Constitution declares that—

"A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

They have been disarmed, and disarmed without criminal charge and without warrant. One of the amendments to the Constitution declares that—

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

The people have not been exempt from unreasonable searches and seizures. Their property has been taken from them; their houses have been searched without authority of law, and by a pure military authority.

"No person"—

says one of the amendments to the Constitution—

"shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury."

Many persons have been held to answer for infamous crimes without presentment or indictment, and without warrant, by military authority. The same amendment continues:

"Nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Citizens have, by military authority, been deprived of liberty and property without due process of law.

These great and fundamental rights, sir, the sanctity of which is the measure of progress and of civilization, which have been carefully guarded and locked up in your Constitution, have been trampled under foot by military power, are being now every day trampled under foot by military power here and hereabouts in the presence of the two Houses of Congress; and yet, so great upon the one side is the passion of the hour, and so astonishing the stupid amazement on the other, that we receive it as natural, as right, as of course. We are rushing, and with rapid strides, from a constitutional government to a military despotism.

The Constitution says the freedom of speech and of the press shall not be abridged. Three days ago, in the city of St. Louis, a military officer, with four hundred soldiers—that was his warrant—went into a newspaper office of that city, removed the types, and declared that it should no longer be published, giving, among other reasons, that it was fabricating reports injurious to the United States soldiers in Missouri. We are told in the same dispatch that the proprietors of the paper submitted, and intended to make their appeal—where, and to whom? To the judicial authorities? No, sir; but to Major-General Frémont when he should reach St. Louis; to appeal from General Lyon to General Frémont. The civil authorities of the country are paralyzed, and a practical martial law is being established all over the land. The like never happened in this country before, and would not be tolerated in any country in Europe which pretends to the elements of civilization and regulated liberty. George Washington carried the thirteen colonies through the war of the Revolution without martial law. The President of the United States cannot conduct the Government three months without resorting to it.

Then, Mr. President, the Executive of the United States has assumed legislative powers. The Executive of the United States has assumed judicial powers. The executive power belongs to him by the Constitution. He has, therefore, concentrated in his own hands executive, legislative, and judicial powers, which, in every age of the world, has been the very definition of despotism, and exercises them to-day, while we sit in the Senate Chamber and the other branch of the legislative authority at the other end of the Capitol. What is the excuse; what is the justification; what is the plea? Necessity. Necessity? I answer, first, there was no necessity. Was it necessary, to preserve the visible emblems of Federal authority here, that the Southern coast should have been blockaded? Did not the same necessity exist when Congress, at its last session, refused to pass the force bill, that existed at the time the President assumed these powers? Was it necessary, until Congress should meet, to the existence of the Union of these States, and of its Constitution, that powers not conferred by the instrument should be assumed? Was there any necessity for overrunning the State of Missouri? Was there a necessity for raising the largest armies ever assembled upon the American continent, and fitting out the largest fleets ever seen in an American harbor? Will any Senator point out the necessity for the occurrences which are now taking place every day of arresting individuals without warrant of law? If that be a necessity in the present condition of affairs, and when Congress is in session here, what a long necessity we have before us and impending over us! Sir, let Congress adjourn, approving and ratifying these acts, and the same character of necessity precisely, even stronger, perhaps, will justify the President in superseding the laws in every State of this Union where, in his opinion, it should be done; and, sir, there will not be a vestige of civil authority left to rise after the passing tread of military power.

But, Mr. President, I deny this doctrine of necessity. I deny that the President of the United States may violate the Constitution upon the ground of necessity. The doctrine is utterly subversive of the Constitution; it is utterly subversive of all written limitations of government; and it substitutes, especially where you make him the ultimate judge of that necessity, and his decision not to be appealed from, the will of one man for a written constitution. Mr. President, the Government of the United States, which draws its life from the Constitution, and which was made by that instrument, does not rest, as does the constitution in many other countries, upon usage or upon implied consent. It rests upon express written consent. The Government of the United States may exercise such powers, and such only, as are given in this written form of government and bond which unites the States; none others. The people of the States conferred upon this agent of theirs just such powers as they deemed necessary, and no more; all others they retained. That Constitution was made for all contingencies; for peace and for war.

Mr. President, is this contest to preserve the Constitution? If so, then it should be waged in a constitutional manner. Is the doctrine to obtain that the provisions of the Federal Constitution are to be entirely subordinated to the idea of political unity? Shall the rallying cry be, "the Constitution and the Union," or are we prepared to say, "the Constitution is gone, but the Union survives"? What sort of Union would it be? Let this principle be announced, let us carry on this contest with this spirit, and wink at or approve violations of this sacred instrument, and, sir, the people will soon begin to inquire what will become of their liberties at the end of the strife. The pregnant question, Mr. President, for us to decide is whether the Constitution is to be respected in this struggle; whether we are to be called upon to follow the flag over the ruins of the Constitution. Without questioning the motives of any, I believe that the whole tendency of the present proceedings is to establish a government without limitations of powers, and to change radically our frame and character of government.

Sir, in proof of my statement that the disposition is to conduct this contest without regard to the Constitution, witness the remarks that fell the other day from the able and very eloquent Senator from Oregon [Edward D. Baker]. He is a constitutional lawyer; he knows what the Constitution of his country is—no man better. He declared, in the presence of the Senate and the country, that he meant direct war, and that for that purpose nothing was so good as a dictator; he therefore was for conferring upon the President of the United States almost unlimited powers. I heard no rebuke administered to that eminent gentleman. Upon the contrary, I saw warm congratulations from more than one Senator, apparently upon the sentiments and the character of the address.

In the course of the same speech to which I have referred that eminent Senator declared that not only must that country be ravaged by armies, but that unless the people of those States paid willing and loyal obedience to the Federal Government, their State form must be changed, and they must be reduced to the condition of Territories; to be governed by governors sent from Massachusetts and Illinois.

Senator Baker.—On the contrary, I spoke against giving too much power to the President. I was occupying my usual constitution guarded position against the increase of a standing army. I gave, as an excuse for voting for an army at all, the present condition of public affairs; and, in that light and with that purpose, I did say that, in order to save the Union, I would take some risk of despotism. I repeat that now: I will risk a little to save all.

Again: I expressed my sincere hope—perhaps I may have added my conviction—that in a better and not a very distant day the Southern States would not only return to their allegiance, but would become loyal in sentiment as well as opinion. But I declared then what no comment of his will drive me from, that if, contrary to that hope, they did not do it, if they would not send members here to govern them, it was better, for the sake of ultimate peace, for freedom, civilization, humanity, that they should be governed as Territories are governed, rather than permit perpetual anarchy, confusion, discord, and civil war. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] I did say that and I do believe that now; and I think the events of the next six months will show that it would be better for the country and the world and the Senator himself if he believed it. [Applause in the galleries.]

stand the position of the Senator from Oregon, and I think that I stated it in substance as he has stated it himself. The Senator reaffirms upon this floor that, if it should become necessary in the opinion of Congress, he would be in favor of reducing these States to a territorial condition. Well, sir, if they are out of the Union, I suppose we have the power to make war on them under that general power which exists in all people to make war, and conquer them and do as we please with them; but, if they are regarded as still being States in this Union, and to be treated according to the provisions and the powers conferred by the Federal Constitution, there is no pretence of argument, none will be made, that the instrument contains any authority to reduce them to the territorial condition. It is an additional proof of the statement I made that the Constitution of the United States is put aside in this contest. I want the people to know it. Let them determine. They will determine as they think best for their own interest and their own destiny. Perhaps, sir, they will pause and consider what is likely to become of their own liberties after this spirit shall have worked out itself.

I consider it not only subversive of the Constitution, but I consider it subversive of the public liberty, to clothe any man with dictatorial powers, and to undertake, under a republican form of government, to govern ten million people as if they were in a territorial condition.

Mr. President, as a further proof, I will accumulate two or three more. The excellent Senator from Connecticut [James Dixon], heretofore always regarded as one of the most moderate and conservative in the political organization to which he is attached, said in substance that, if the institution of African slavery stood in the way of the Union, it must be abolished.

Let us pause one moment, Mr. President, and consider to what that leads. Men who love the Constitution and the Union of the States as sincerely and cordially as the Senator himself could possibly do consider the Union not an end, but a means—a means by which, under the terms of the Constitution, liberty may be maintained, property and personal rights protected, and general happiness secured. The substance of what is declared by the Senator is that the unity of the Government shall survive not only the Constitution, but all rights both of persons and of property.

The institutions of the Southern States existed before the Constitution was formed, and were intended to be secured by it. Their property of any other description is no more sacred in view of the Constitution, or of their own laws, than the description of property to which the Senator referred. To declare that this contest shall be prosecuted, if necessary, to the abolition of slavery in the Southern States is in principle to declare that, if it becomes necessary, it shall be prosecuted to the total subversion of all State authority, to the total overthrow of all rights, personal and political, and to the entire subversion of their liberties, possibly of ours. The conclusions are not too large which I draw from the principle announced by the Senator; and taken in connection with the declaration of the Senator from Oregon, taken in connection with the acts which are treated in this joint resolution, and the other acts which I have enumerated, it proves what I fear, and what I desire the country to understand, that the Constitution of the United States is no longer to be held as the measure of power on one side and of obedience on the other, but that it is to be put aside to carry out the purposes of the majority.

OPPONENTS OF THE "UNNATURAL AND FRATRICIDAL WAR."
[Satire on Breckinridge's Petition]

I hold, sir, that it is no legitimate mode to preserve the Union of the States by trampling the Constitution under foot; and I do not believe that the people of the adhering States are willing to go into this strife with vast armies, make war, abolish institutions and political communities themselves, struggling simply for the idea of territorial integrity and national unity, and finding, when they come out of the contest, the Constitution gone and themselves at sea as to the character of the institutions with which they shall emerge from it.

Mr. President, I regret to say that what may be called the more extreme, violent, and resolute men of the Republican organization appear to have control of its destiny at this time, and all efforts are being made for the purpose of preventing any return to peace, and of inflaming the public passions against the institutions of the South. I heard a bill read at that table this morning by its title, "A bill to suppress the slaveholders' rebellion."[1] If it had had a title, "A bill to provide for the execution of the laws," or any other parliamentary title known heretofore in American legislative proceedings, of course I should not have been astonished; but when I see in a deliberative body an attempt made, through the very heading of a bill, to create odium and prejudice against a particular interest, which is equally protected with others under the Constitution of your country, it shows a frame of mind which leads all thoughtful men to despair both of the Constitution and the country, if such a spirit can prevail.

[1] Introduced by Samuel C. Pomeroy [Kan.].

Senator Bingham.—I wish to ask the Senator if he denies that the present rebellion is a slaveholders' rebellion?

Senator Breckinridge.—I do, sir. I have no doubt that the question of slavery, and their rights as connected with that institution, as they understand them, had a great deal to do first with the controversies which preceded the separation, and then with the act of separation itself; but it is perfectly manifest that, whereas the proportion of slaveholders to non-slaveholders is very small in the seceded States, the sentiments of the population are almost unanimous. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Does he approve the title of that bill?

Senator Bingham.—I do.

Senator Breckinridge.—I regret to hear that answer; but it serves to bring the mind of the country to consider the actual condition of affairs, and the danger which is impending over us.

My colleague has this moment handed me the bill referred to. The enacting clause, as might have been anticipated from the title, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be no slavery or involuntary servitude in any of the States of this Union that claim to have seceded from the Government and are in open and armed resistance to the execution of the laws and the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

I believe that is to be carried out by a proclamation of the President.

And be it further enacted, That immediately after the passage of this act, the President of the United States shall cause his proclamation to be issued, setting forth the immediate and unconditional emancipation of all persons held as slaves in any of the aforesaid States under the laws thereof, and also ordering all officers to give protection to all such emancipated slaves, and to accept the services of all who may tender them in behalf of the Government, if, in the judgment of such officers, such services shall be useful or necessary to the prosecution of this war.

It is not only a congressional act of emancipation, but it is intended to arm the slaves against the masters. It is not only to confiscate the whole property, but it is to foment a servile war. That is a proposition offered in the Senate of the United States! Sir, I shall find myself denounced in the newspapers to-morrow morning as a man who was uttering treason here for speaking a word in favor of the Constitution; but not one word will be uttered against a Senator who deliberately proposes to trample that Constitution under his feet, and to plunge the country into all the horrors of civil and of servile war.

I shall trouble the Senate no longer. I know that argument and appeal are all in vain. The Senate pants for action. I am quite aware that, in the present temper of Congress, one might as well oppose his uplifted hand to the descending waters of Niagara as to reason or to appeal against the contemplated proceedings. The few of us left here who are faithful to our convictions can only look with sadness upon the melancholy drama that is being enacted before us. We can only hope that this flash of frenzy may not assume the form of chronic madness, and that in any event Divine Providence may preserve for us and for posterity, out of the wreck of a broken Union, the priceless principles of constitutional liberty and of self-government. [Applause in the galleries.]

SENATOR LANE.—Gentlemen take a technical objection against the action of the President, and say that he has violated the Constitution of the United States. I remember an incident, I think in Roman history, where an African pro-consul was required to swear that he had not violated the laws of Rome; instead of which, with uplifted hand, he swore that he had saved the Roman republic. And, whatsoever differences of opinion may this day exist in reference to the action of the President, I take it for granted that every intelligent patriot in the land not only believes but knows that the President has saved the Republic by his energetic and patriotic action since the 4th of March. I sanction and approve everything that the President has done during the recess of Congress, and the people sanction and approve it, and there is no power this side of Heaven that can reverse that decision of the American people. I not only sanction all that they have done, but I sanction all that they are soon to do. When your victorious and conquering columns shall sweep treason out of old Virginia; when they shall make that old commonwealth a fit residence for the patriotic descendants of her revolutionary fathers, I shall sanction and approve that. I sanction and approve the use of force now, at once, immediately; and I would shake that traitorous commonwealth as with an earthquake tread of a hundred thousand armed men.

What is it that the President has done since the last meeting of Congress? First, he has declared a blockade of the Southern ports, and gentlemen tell us there is no constitutional authority for that. It is the first duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. We have a tariff law imposing duties upon foreign importations. That has been disregarded by the seceding States; they have assumed to pass a tariff act different from ours. That law of Congress cannot be enforced by the ordinary course of procedure under your collections of revenue at the proper ports established by law. There is no higher power in the Constitution of the United States delegated to the President than the power to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." These high and extraordinary powers, although not perhaps technically granted in the Constitution, result as an incident to the war power, which is invoked, and constitutionally invoked, under that provision of the Constitution which authorizes the President to use force to suppress insurrection and to put down rebellion. I sanction, then, the proclamation establishing a blockade.

The next objection is to the declaration of martial law, by which the writ of habeas corpus was suspended. I only regret that when the writ was suspended the corpus of Baltimore treason was not "suspended" too. It is necessary to the enforcement of the laws and to the preservation of the Union that this writ of habeas corpus should be suspended; and the Constitution of the United States says, in express terms, it may be suspended in case of rebellion and insurrection. Then the whole question comes to this: Who is to judge? Where is the discretion lodged? Clearly with the President of the United States; and it can be safely lodged nowhere else. Suppose an insurrection breaks out during the recess of Congress: the President is sworn to uphold the law and the Constitution; he finds armed rebellion; has he no power to put it down? May he not use all proper power to put down armed rebellion? I approve, then, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

What more does the honorable Senator from Kentucky say? That General Washington prosecuted the Revolutionary War to a successful termination without ever suspending the writ of habeas corpus. That is true. He was in a contest with a foreign foe. Here we are engaged in entirely a different war, where our enemies are in our midst. What would gentlemen have the President do? Suppose my distinguished friend from Kentucky had been elected President, and seven States had seceded and levied war against the United States, and were with an embattled host threatening to take and capture the capital: what would have been his action? Would he have folded his arms? No, no. He, I doubt not, would have made a blow to defend the Union and the Constitution of the United States. Then what else could he have done than President Lincoln has done? If, as I suppose he does, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky echoes public opinion in Kentucky or intends to echo public opinion there, I have no doubt that that proud commonwealth would have sanctioned and approved and advised the very step the President has taken to vindicate the laws and to defend the Constitution of the United States.

But another charge which he made against this Administration—that private papers were seized. I suppose the honorable and distinguished Senator from Kentucky refers to telegraphic dispatches. They were seized, but not quite soon enough, as I think; and still they have proven a California placer of treason. It was right and proper to seize them. It was right to seize the dispatches to vindicate the character of honorable Senators on this floor.

Another count in this indictment is that citizens have been imprisoned without any authority of law, which amounts to precisely the former charge that martial law has been declared under the proclamation of the President in some few localities where it was eminently necessary. Citizens of Baltimore have been imprisoned under military authority, and, as I believe, have been rightfully imprisoned. When a New England regiment cannot march through the city of Baltimore to defend the capital without being attacked and shot down by a mob, it is time that the military authority should do what the civil authority was not able to do—suppress and put down that unauthorized mob. I sympathize with the true and loyal citizens of Baltimore. I sympathize with the patriotic soldiery of Massachusetts who were coming to defend the capital. I have no sympathy to waste upon armed traitors and rebels. I leave others to pronounce their eulogy and to show them sympathy.

Another charge is that the President has violated the Constitution of the United States in this: that he has disarmed citizens; refused them the privilege, under the Constitution, of bearing arms. Sir, it is true that he has refused traitors the privilege of using arms against the Government of the country. General Lyon, of Missouri, and the gallant Frank Blair, and their associates, did disarm some fifteen hundred rebels at Camp Jackson, near St. Louis; and for that we are told they are violators of the Constitution. The President has not only guaranteed by his action the right to bear arms, but he has invited the patriotic citizens of the United States to bear arms for the only noble purpose for which men can take arms—in defence of the Constitution and liberties of the people. Is the right to bear arms in Kentucky so sacred that it may never be violated? Then why do you not bear arms in defence of the Constitution and liberties of the Republic? There is a right to bear arms that is worth something. Does Kentucky stand upon the right to bear arms? Why is she not bearing arms upon the battlefield to-day, beside Massachusetts and Indiana and Ohio, and the loyal States? Why does she not insist upon her right to bear arms, when traitors are seeking to tear down the Government under which we live? The right to bear arms, forsooth, is a forgotten right in the chivalric old commonwealth of Kentucky. I have listened for her voice in this war; I have heard it not; and why? Because her action is, as I believe, paralyzed by the course of her State authorities; but on the first Monday of next August the true voice of old Kentucky will be heard, and you will have a two-thirds majority in favor of loyalty to the Union, and the places that know her distinguished governor now will soon know him no more forever.

Another count in this indictment against the Administration is that they have put down treasonable newspapers. The Administration have shown a forbearance beyond all parallel in history. There is no government of constituted authority upon earth that would have tolerated either the treasonable utterance or publications of these traitors. I say that I not only approve of the destruction of that St. Louis paper, but I rejoice at it as an evidence of returning common sense in those who are to defend the Government of the country.

One word, before I forget it, on the subject of this war and the object of the war. There is no war levied against any State, or against any State institutions. The President has called out troops to suppress insurrection and put down rebellion. These are the objects for which your troops have been called into the field. The abolition of slavery is no object contemplated for which this war is to be prosecuted. But let me tell gentlemen that, although the abolition of slavery is not an object of the war, they may, in their madness and folly and treason, make the abolition of slavery one of the results of this war. That is what I understand to be precisely the position of the Administration upon the subject of this war.

The gentleman closes his very able and eloquent speech with the assumption of a position and doctrine that I do not for one moment admit; and that is that the States made this National Union of ours. I have read wrongfully, and to little purpose, the history of the convention that formed the Constitution if that is historically corect. I understand the people of the United States to have made this Constitution; and so Webster understood it.

This doctrine of State rights, as opposed to the rights of the general Government, under the Federal Constitution, is a most dangerous and pestilent heresy, which underlies this whole controversy. Out of that idea, and one other idea, the present disastrous state of things has been brought upon the country. The idea of social, political inequality among the respective members of the Confederacy underlies this war at its very foundation. We are to teach them, I hope, a lesson of respect for the North; we are to teach them a lesson of equality. Whatever else this war may do, it will teach a lesson of equality for a thousand years; nay, more, it will add a thousand years to the glorious lifetime of this, the only republic upon the earth.

So much for these objections to what the President of the United States has done. But the closing argument, after all, and that upon which the gentleman places most stress, is that an effort was made at the last session of Congress to give to the President this very power, and that the Congress of the United States refused to pass that bill. That is true; and why? Because the vacant seats around us were then filled by traitors, many of whom are now in arms against the Republic. For that reason, and that alone, we failed to confer this power upon the President of the United States.

But the gentleman says he is glad that the people have their attention now directed to the true posture of American politics. I am glad that the people have their eye turned in the same direction. In the last sixty days four hundred thousand troops have volunteered to defend the Stars and Stripes and to defend the Constitution. There is no parallel in all human history to the widespread enthusiasm which has pervaded the whole people. The nearest parallel is when Peter the Hermit preached a crusade for the recovery of the Holy Sepulcher; and our cause is little less sacred than that for the recovery of the grave of the Savior of mankind, for we propose a crusade in defence of the Constitution, the rights of man, and the liberties of the American people.

I understand by coercion a right to march troops wheresoever the Government desires to march them. You hear much said about the invasion of a sovereign State. Who can invade a State? The home government or a foreign government? Virginia is to-day as much a part of the United States as Indiana, and the President has as much right to march troops there, and I hope is now engaged in marching troops there for the purpose of crushing out rebellion. Let us stand by the compromises of the Constitution. Let us hereafter send all our pacific messages to traitors at the mouth of the cannon. Let the politicians reflect honestly the will of the people, and your volunteer soldiers will crush out this rebellion without leaders and without officers. They have determined to do this very thing.

But gentlemen say how, from the ruins, will you reconstruct the Republic? We do not contemplate any destruction of the Republic which involves a reconstruction. We intend to protect the Union men of the border States, to foster the Union sentiment, to get up a counter revolution, which will lay all secession and treason in ruins. We expect soon to readmit Tennessee into the Union, as we have recently readmitted old Virginia; we expect soon to readmit North Carolina; and we expect to present in six months an unbroken front to all foreign powers, no single star erased, the light of no star obliterated by treason in any part of the country. When we get the seceding States properly represented upon the floor of the Congress of the United States, then we shall have nothing to do but to punish the last remains and remnants of this most disgraceful rebellion; and the remedy, after all, is a Kentucky remedy; we propose—hemp. That is the remedy for treason; not under mob law, but under indictments in courts. We propose to have courts and judges sworn to support the law, and who will abide by that sacred oath. When this is done, I promise you that treason and rebellion will be buried forever.

Anti-Secession Resolutions

The day after the Union defeat at Bull Run, John J. Crittenden [Ky.], who had retired from the Senate to enter the House of Representatives, introduced in the House a resolution confirming the President's theory of secession, namely, that war had been forced on the Government by the Southern disunionists; that it was waged by the Government not for subjugating the seceded States, nor interfering with their rights and institutions, but to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, the dignity and integrity of the Union, and the equality of all the States; and that, so soon as these objects were accomplished, the war ought to cease.

This was passed by the House on July 22 with only two dissenting votes, those of Henry C. Burnett [Ky.] and John W. Reid [Mo.], other opponents of the measure, such as Clement L. Vallandigham [O.], not voting. On July 24 the Senate passed a resolution to the same effect (introduced by Andrew Jackson of Tennessee) with only five dissenting votes, John C. Breckinridge [Ky.] being among the number.

On July 17 Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] introduced in the Senate a bill to suppress insurrection in places proclaimed by the President, by giving the military authorities power in their respective districts to suspend the writ of habeas corpus by proclamation, arrest persons on the charge of sedition and try them by court-martial, compel suspected persons to take the oath of allegiance, etc. This came up for discussion on July 30.

Martial Law by Legislative Enactment

Senate, July 30-August 1, 1861

Senator Trumbull supported his resolution. He said:

I wish to premise by saying that I am as much for standing by the Constitution of the country and for putting down this rebellion in a constitutional and legal way as any gentleman here. I will not yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Breckinridge] or any other Senator in my veneration for the Constitution of the United States. I believe that that instrument was intended by its framers to be perpetual. I believe it contains all the power necessary to suppress even this gigantic rebellion; and the object of this bill is to confer the necessary power on the military authorities, in cases of insurrection and rebellion, to suppress them, and to regulate, as far as practicable, by law the exercise of those powers. The object of the bill is to provide for putting down rebellion in a constitutional and legal manner.

When the Constitution gives authority to call forth the militia for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the Union it is not a meaningless authority, and whatever authority it may be necessary to exercise to accomplish that object I say your militia and your army may lawfully exercise. If it be necessary to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, if it be necessary to ravage the country and plunder towns, if it be necessary to slay persons, to search houses, to do anything that men in time of war may do, then that authority is given in the Constitution.

You will find, by reference to the works upon international law, that it is laid down by all writers that whenever an insurrection assumes such formidable proportions as to be recognized by the Government, and whenever the civil authority is unable to put it down and the military is called out, then all the incidents which, according to the laws of nations, may be done by an army follow your army called out for that purpose.

The Supreme Court of the United States has so decided this very question [Luther vs. Borden and others, in 1849, reported in 7 Howard]. Judge Woodbury dissented from the opinion of the court, and placed his dissent chiefly upon the ground that a State had not this power, admitting that the Government of the United States might exercise it.

Here is an express decision that the military power may interfere in a case where the civil authorities are overborne, and may arrest anyone when they have reasonable grounds to believe that he is engaged in the insurrection, and may enter houses for that purpose; and the court say that, if this were not so, the military array of the Government would be mere parade, and rather encourage than repel attack. Shall it then be said, when express power is given by the Constitution of the United States to call out the militia to enforce the laws of the country, that they are merely to make a parade? What more has your military power done in this instance than was done in the State of Rhode Island? Have they done anything more in Baltimore than to arrest persons suspected of favoring this insurrection? Nothing. The writ of habeas corpus cannot relieve them; the courts cannot interfere; and this power, the court say, is essential to the preservation of order and free institutions and the existence of every government, and they would draw the power from the nature of government itself if it were not expressly given in the Constitution.

That case covers, in my judgment, every feature of the bill now under consideration.

James A. Bayard, Jr. [Del.], considered the bill "exceedingly dangerous to the personal liberties and rights of every citizen of the United States, and also entirely unnecessary for the purpose of carrying on this war with the seceded States." In order that it might have grave consideration he moved its postponement until next day.

William P. Fessenden [Me.] wished the bill settled at once, or to be postponed indefinitely; with his present impressions he would vote against it.

John C. Breckinridge [Ky.] concurred with the Senator from Maine. He said:

If there is a serious intention to pass it, at some time before the vote is taken I may briefly express my opposition to it. I content myself now with saying that it appears to me to combine in eleven sections everything most atrocious which has been resisted, fought against, and trampled down by a free people for the last five hundred years; and that I think the introduction of such a bill into the American Senate is the most gloomy commentary we could have upon the degenerate character of the times.

After some discussion the bill was postponed until next day, and, when it then came up, until the day following (August 1).

Jacob Collamer [Vt.] opposed the bill as a usurpation by Congress of the powers of the President.

Mr. President, it is quite useless for men to talk about Congress having the war-making power. All there is in that argument is this: Among the powers enumerated in the Constitution is that Congress shall have power to declare war; that is to say that that department of the Government which can initiate a war in this country is Congress; but that has nothing to do with a war made upon us. If a war be waged and declared by another nation upon this nation, I take it, it needs no declaration of Congress about it; it is a state of war. The difficulty that arose in my mind was this: War has been declared by those whom we do not recognize as a sovereign power. We do not regard it as a regularly declared war. Therefore, in order to avoid all doubt about the fact that an insurrection existed, in order to give to that insurrection in this country, by whatever name called, a local and legal existence, recognized by us, we passed a law in the early part of this session by which we authorized the President, wherever the insurrection existed in a State, and especially if it claimed to do so by State authority, and the State authority did not disclaim it, to declare the people of that State, or any section of it, where the insurrection existed, in a state of war. This is what we have done in order to give it all formal sanction.

Now, Mr. President, the war, I take it, exists. It has been suggested by some gentlemen here that that war cannot be legally prosecuted after Congress meets; that though it might be, from the necessity of the case, prosecuted by the President, in the exercise of the powers that ordinarily belong to the prosecution of war, until Congress met, yet when Congress did meet he could do nothing but what Congress authorized. I utterly disclaim any such principle in our Government. Why, sir, since we have met and during the three or four weeks we have been sitting here, the President, or those acting under him, have sent down twenty, thirty, or forty thousand of our own citizens into Virginia, and have killed hundreds of people. Is this murder? Where is your law to authorize it? Look through your acts and through all your statutes, and where do you find any authority of that kind? Has it been done by any action of Congress? Not at all. Sir, we may as well come to it first as last: the power to prosecute war and the manner of carrying on that war is entirely executive—it is so in every country everywhere—and the laws that govern those who thus prosecute that war are the laws of war, not the laws of municipalities.

They are not the laws of Congress, nor of Parliament, nor of the National Assembly of France: they are the laws of war; and no war can be prosecuted in any other way. The President, or the general of our armies, in the prosecution of this war, is to conduct it just the same as any other. I desire no resentments or irritations about it; but they do not derive their authority from Congress. Not only do they not derive their authority from that source, but they cannot. The laws of war are laws between the belligerents. When you capture a spy you can execute him, according to the laws of war. Those laws are recognized, and do not come out of legislation by anybody.

Again, Mr. President, the mere powers which are absolutely necessary to the prosecution of a war are many of them powers which Congress, in the express words of the Constitution, is forbidden to adopt. Now, take one feature of the bill before us which recognizes the trying of people and punishing them capitally, executing them, by court-martial. The Constitution provides expressly that all crimes shall be tried by a jury, unless they are offences committed by those who are members either of the army or navy. That is the provision of the Constitution. Now it is not with that clause as it may be with the habeas corpus. That clause may be suspended; but the provision in regard to trial by jury Congress has no power to suspend anywhere.

I mention that as one illustration. I can find a number of others similar to it, wherein the prohibitions of the Constitution—prohibitions upon the action of Congress—are of that character that shows it is not possible to give, by any action of Congress, those powers which everybody recognizes as the rights of war, under the laws of war. Therefore, without occupying any further time about it, the war now being in legal existence, and, if any more particular locality should be given to it, it is by presidential proclamation, under the statute we have already passed; my idea is that the rights of war, the power of prosecuting it, and the mode of carrying it on, with all its limitations, are to be derived from what are known in the world as the laws of war. They are entirely in the executive administration, not derived from Congress, and, I think, ought not to be undertaken to be legislated about in Congress, because, as I before said, the very attempt to legislate upon them is to negative the idea that they have any other power; and we should want more time and more forethought and foresight to provide for the various exigencies which may present themselves in war than we should ever be able to give to the subject. Therefore, I think it better to leave it to the laws of war, where it properly belongs.

Senator Trumbull.—The Senator from Vermont asserts that this is war; that you cannot regulate a war by Congress; it is the law of nations that regulates war; and he wants to know, if this is a bill providing for war, why you do not provide for spies, and why you do not make other provisions? He goes on to say that it is directly against the Constitution of the United States to try a man by court-martial, because a man is entitled to a jury trial. Why, sir, did the learned Senator from Vermont never read the acts of Congress? It is provided by the act of 1806, in force to-day, that—

"Whoever shall be convicted of holding correspondence with, or giving intelligence to, the enemy, either directly or indirectly, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of a court-martial."

The Senator says we cannot regulate the proceedings during a time of war; that Congress has no power over them. The statute is full of regulations of the army in time of war; and this very act, the very case he puts, provides the punishment for a spy.

The statute is full of provisions controlling and governing the army in time of war. Express authority is given to Congress by the very words of the Constitution to make the rules and regulations for the government of the army; and yet, forsooth, we are told by the Senator from Vermont Congress cannot make any laws at all; war is declared, and the President can carry on the war just as he pleases. Now, sir, I deny his very premises. I deny that this is a war in the sense in which he speaks. There is a rebellion. We have treated it as a rebellion. The Executive has treated it as a rebellion. The Senator wants to know if it was murder when our army went over to Virginia a few days ago and killed several hundred persons? Certainly not. It was not necessary to write down in the statute book that our army should have authority to go into Virginia and shoot men; but what has Congress done? Congress has recognized this existing state of things. It has voted hundreds of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of men to put down the rebellion. It has authorized the calling out of the militia for the purpose of enforcing the laws; and the courts have decided that when the militia are called out for that purpose they may use all the means necessary to accomplish the object; and the provision of the Constitution which provides for trial by jury has no application. When the military authority is called out to enforce the laws and suppress rebellion, they have all the authority necessary to accomplish the end for which that power is given; and if it be necessary to level houses, to ravage the country, and to shoot men, they have the authority. The military power is not called out as a display. Nor is this a war in the sense the Senator from Vermont would intimate. His doctrine would recognize these Southern rebels as a government. He wants to provide for an exchange of prisoners, and he asks why that is not in the bill.

Senator Collamer.—I disclaimed that they were a government. I said the reason we passed a law to authorize the President to issue his proclamation was because we did not recognize such a power on earth.

Senator Trumbull.—Then, if he does not recognize this as a war in that sense, why undertake to apply to it the rules of war? Is a war existing in my State? By virtue of the military authority men in the State of Illinois have been arrested. Is war existing in Baltimore? By what authority are you arresting men in the city of Baltimore and holding them in custody? Is the Senator from Vermont, or is anybody in this country, for leaving the power in the hands of the President, or, rather, in the hands of your commanding general, just when he pleases, without proclamation, to march to any locality, arrest men, put them in prison, and do what he pleases with them? Shall we be told that Congress has no power, although the express authority to make rules and regulations for the government of every officer is vested here in Congress and nowhere else? Our power is omnipotent over this army; and they ought to have rules and regulations by which to be governed. And, let me tell Senators, it is no new feature for courts-martial, in time of rebellion, insurrection, and civil war, to bring men before them and try them, sentence them, and shoot them without the intervention of any grand or petit jurors.

Senator Breckinridge.—I endeavored, Mr. President, to demonstrate a short time ago that the whole tendency of our proceedings was to trample the Constitution under our feet and to conduct this contest without the slightest regard to its provisions. Everything that has occurred since demonstrates that the view I took of the conduct and tendency of public affairs was correct. Already both Houses of Congress have passed a bill virtually to confiscate all the property in the States that have withdrawn. Nothing can be more apparent than that that is a general act of emancipation.

Again, sir: to show that all these proceedings are characterized by an utter disregard of the Federal Constitution, what is happening around us every day?

The police commissioners of Baltimore were arrested by military authority without any charges whatever. In vain they have asked for a specification. In vain they have sent a respectful protest to the Congress of the United States. In vain the House of Representatives, by resolution, requested the President to furnish the Representatives of the people with the grounds of their arrest. He answers the House of Representatives that, in his judgment, the public interest does not permit him to say why they were arrested, on what charges, or what he has done with them—and you call this liberty and law and proceedings for the preservation of the Constitution! They have been spirited off from one fortress to another, their locality unknown, and the President of the United States refuses, upon the application of the most numerous branch of the national legislature, to furnish them with the grounds of their arrest, or to inform them what he has done with them.

Well might the Senator from Delaware [Willard Saulsbury] say that this bill contains provisions conferring authority which never was exercised in the worst days of Rome, by the worst of her dictators. I have wondered why the bill was introduced. I have sometimes thought that possibly it was introduced for the purpose of preventing the expression of that reaction which is now evidently going on in the public mind against these procedures so fatal to constitutional liberty. The army may be thus used, perhaps, to collect the enormous direct taxes for which preparation is now being made by Congress; and, if in any part of Illinois, or Indiana, or New York, or any State, North or South, there shall be difficulty or resistance the President, in his discretion, may declare it to be in a state of insurrection, all the civil authorities may be overthrown, and his military commander may make rules and regulations, collect taxes, and execute the laws at his pleasure.

Mr. President, gentlemen talk about the Union as if it was an end instead of a means. They talk about it as if it was the union of these States which alone had brought into life the principles of public and of personal liberty. Sir, they existed before, and they may survive it. Take care that in pursuing one idea you do not destroy, not only the Constitution of your country, but sever what remains of the Federal Union. These eternal and sacred principles of public and of personal liberty, which lived before the Union and will live forever and ever somewhere, must be respected; they cannot with impunity be overthrown; and, if you force the people to the issue between any form of government and these priceless principles, that form of government will perish; they will tear it asunder as the irrepressible forces of nature rend whatever opposes them.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Collamer] says that all these proceedings are to be conducted according to the laws of war; he adds that these laws require many things to be done which are absolutely forbidden in the Constitution; which Congress is prohibited from doing, and all other departments of the Government are forbidden from doing by the Constitution; but that they are proper under the laws of war, which must alone be the measure of our action now. I desire the country, then, to know this fact: that it is openly avowed upon this floor that constitutional limitations are no longer to be regarded; but that you are acting just as if there were two nations upon this continent, one arrayed against the other; some eighteen or twenty millions on one side and some ten or twelve millions on the other, as to whom the Constitution is nought, and the laws of war alone apply.

Sir, if the Constitution is really to be put aside, if the laws of war alone are to govern, and whatever may be done by one independent nation at war with another is to be done, why not act upon that practically? I do not hold that the clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to declare war applies to any internal difficulties. I do not believe it applies to any of the political communities bound together under the Constitution in political association. I regard it as applying to external enemies. Nor do I believe that the Constitution of the United States ever contemplated the preservation of the Union of these States by one half the States warring on the other half. It details particularly how military force shall be employed in this Federal system of government, and it can be employed properly in no other way; it can be employed in aid of the civil tribunals. If there are no civil tribunals, if there is no mode by which the laws of the United States may be enforced in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, what follows? The remaining States may, if they choose, make war, but they do it outside of the Constitution; and the Federal system, as determined by the principles and terms of that instrument, does not provide for the case. It does provide for putting down insurrections—illegal uprisings of individuals—but it does not provide, in my opinion, either in its spirit or in its terms, for raising armies by one half of the political communities that compose the Union for the purpose of subjugating the other half; and the very fact that it does not is shown by the fact that you have to avow on the floor of the Senate the necessity for putting the Constitution aside and conducting the whole contest without regard to it and in obedience solely to the laws of war.

Then, if we are at war, if it is a case of war, treat it like war. Practically it is being treated like war. The prisoners whom the United States have taken are not hung as traitors. The prisoners which the other States have taken are not hung as traitors. Is it war? The Senator is right in saying it is war; but, in my opinion, it is not only an unhappy but an unconstitutional war. Why, then, all these proceedings upon the part of the Administration, refusing to send or to receive flags of truce; refusing to recognize the actual condition of affairs; refusing to do those acts which, if they do not terminate, may at least ameliorate the unhappy condition in which we find ourselves placed?

So much, then, we know. We know that admitted violations of the Constitution have been made and are justified. We know that we have conferred by legislation, and are, perhaps, still further by legislation to confer, authority to do acts not warranted by the Constitution of the United States. We have it openly avowed that the Constitution of the Union, which is the bond of association, at least, between those States that still adhere to the Federal Union, is no longer to be regarded. It is not enough to tell me that it has been violated by those communities that have seceded. Other States have not seceded; Kentucky has not seceded; Illinois has not seceded; some twenty States yet compose the Federal Union, nominally under this Constitution. As to them, that instrument, in its terms and in its spirit, is the bond of their connection under the Federal system. They have a right, as between themselves and their comembers of the Union, to insist upon its being respected. If, indeed, it is to be put aside, and we are to go into a great continental struggle, they may pause to inquire what is to become of their liberties and what their political connections are to be in a contest made without constitutional warrant and in derogation of all the terms of the instrument? How can this be successfully controverted? Though you may have a right to trample under foot the Constitution and to make war (as every power has a right to make war) against the States that have seceded, have you a right to violate it as to any of the adhering States who insist upon fidelity to its provisions? No, sir.

EDWARD D. BAKER [Ore.].—Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell me what single particular provision there is in this bill which is in violation of the Constitution of the United States?

SENATOR BRECKINRIDGE.—They are all, in my opinion, so equally atrocious that I dislike to discriminate. The Senator can select which he pleases.

SENATOR BAKER.—Let me try, then, if I must generalize as the Senator does, to see if I can get the scope and meaning of this bill. It is a bill providing that the President of the United States may declare, by proclamation, in a certain given state of fact, certain territory within the United States to be in a condition of insurrection and war; which proclamation shall be extensively published within the district to which it relates. That is the first proposition. I ask him if that is unconstitutional? He will not dare to say it is.

SENATOR BRECKINRIDGE.—The State of Illinois, I believe, is a military district. The State of Kentucky is a military district. In my judgment, the President has no authority, and, in my judgment, Congress has no right to confer upon the President authority, to declare a State in a condition of insurrection or rebellion.

SENATOR BAKER.—The bill does not say a word about States.

SENATOR BRECKINRIDGE.—Does not the Senator know, in fact, that those States compose military districts? It might as well have said "States" as to describe what is a State.

SENATOR BAKER.—The objection certainly ought not to be that the President can declare a part of a State in insurrection and not the whole of it. In point of fact, the Constitution of the United States, and the Congress of the United States acting upon it, are not treating of States, but of the territory comprising the United States; and I submit once more to his better judgment that it cannot be unconstitutional to allow the President to declare a county or a part of a county, or a town or a part of a town, or part of a State or the whole of a State, or two States, or five States in a condition of insurrection, if, in his judgment, that be the fact.

In the next place the bill provides that, that being so, the military commander in that district may make and publish such police rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to suppress the rebellion and restore order and preserve the lives and property of citizens. I submit to him, if the President of the United States has power, or ought to have power, to suppress insurrection and rebellion, is there any better way to do it, or is there any other? The gentleman says do it by the civil power. Look at the fact. The civil power is utterly overwhelmed; the courts are closed; the judges banished. Is the President not to execute the law? Is he to do it in person, or by his military commanders? Are they to do it with regulation, or without it? That is the only question.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator agrees with the Senator from Vermont that there is a state of war. What then? There is a state of public war; none the less war because it is urged from the other side; not the less war because it is unjust; not the less war because it is a war of insurrection and rebellion. It is still war; and I am willing to say it is public war—public as contradistinguished from private war. What then? Shall we carry that war on? Is it his duty as a Senator to carry it on? If so, how? By armies, under command; by military organization and authority, advancing to suppress insurrection and rebellion. Is that wrong? Is that unconstitutional? Are we not bound to do with whoever levies war against us as we would do if he was a foreigner? There is no distinction as to the mode of carrying on war; we carry on war against an advancing army just the same, whether it be from Russia or from South Carolina. Will the honorable Senator tell me it is our duty to stay here, within fifteen miles of the enemy seeking to advance upon us every hour, and talk about nice questions of constitutional construction as to whether it is war or merely insurrection? No, sir. It is our duty to advance, if we can; to suppress insurrection; to put down rebellion; to dissipate the rising; to scatter the enemy; and, when we have done so, to preserve, in the terms of the bill, the liberty, lives, and property of the people of the country by just and fair police regulations. When we took Mexico did we not do it there? Is it not a part, a necessary, an indispensable part of war itself, that there shall be military regulations over the country conquered and held? Is that unconstitutional?

It is true that the Constitution of the United States does adopt the laws of war as a part of the instrument itself during the continuance of war. The Constitution does not provide that spies shall be hung. Is it unconstitutional to hang a spy? There is no provision for it in terms in the Constitution; but nobody denies the right, the power, the justice. Why? Because it is part of the law of war. The Constitution does not provide for the exchange of prisoners; yet it may be done under the law of war. Indeed the Constitution does not provide that a prisoner may be taken at all; yet his captivity is perfectly just and constitutional. It seems to me that the Senator does not, will not, take that view of the subject.

Again, sir, when a military commander advances, as I trust, if there are no more unexpected great reverses, he will advance, through Virginia, and occupies the country, there, perhaps, as here, the civil law may be silent; there perhaps the civil officers may flee as ours have been compelled to flee. What then? If the civil law is silent, who shall control and regulate the conquered district—who but the military commander? As the Senator from Illinois has well said, shall it be done by regulation or without regulation? Shall the general, or the colonel, or the captain be supreme, or shall he be regulated and ordered by the President of the United States? That is the sole question. The Senator has put it well.

I agree that we ought to do all we can to limit, to restrain, to fetter the abuse of military power. Bayonets are at best illogical arguments. I am not willing, except as a case of sheerest necessity, ever to permit a military commander to exercise authority over life, liberty, and property. But, sir, it is part of the law of war; you cannot carry in the rear of your army your courts; you cannot organize juries; you cannot have trials according to the forms and ceremonial of the common law amid the clangor of arms, and somebody must enforce police regulations in a conquered or occupied district. I ask the Senator from Kentucky again respectfully, is that unconstitutional; or, if, in the nature of war, it must exist, even if there be no law passed by us to allow it, is it unconstitutional to regulate it? That is the question, to which I do not think he will make a clear and distinct reply.

I would ask the Senator what would you have us do now—a Confederate army within twenty miles of us, advancing, or threatening to advance, to overwhelm your Government; to shake the pillars of the Union; to bring it around your head, if you stay here, in ruins? Are we to predict evil and retire from what we predict? Is it not the manly part to go on as we have begun, to raise money and levy armies, to organize them, to prepare to advance; when we do advance, to regulate that advance by all the laws and regulations that civilization and humanity will allow in time of battle? Can we do anything more? To talk to us about stopping is idle; we will never stop. Will the Senator yield to rebellion? Will he shrink from armed insurrection? Will his State justify it? Will its better public opinion allow it? Shall we send a flag of truce? What would he have? Or would he conduct this war so feebly that the whole world would smile at us in derision? What would he have? These speeches of his, sown broadcast over the land, what clear, distinct meaning have they? Are they not intended for disorganization in our very midst? Are they not intended to dull our weapons? Are they not intended to destroy our zeal? Are they not intended to animate our enemies? Sir, are they not words of brilliant, polished treason, even in the very Capitol of the Confederacy? [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

What would have been thought if, in another capitol, in another republic, in a yet more martial age, a Senator as grave, not more eloquent or dignified than the Senator from Kentucky, yet with the Roman purple flowing over his shoulders, had risen in his place, surrounded by all the illustrations of Roman glory, and declared that advancing Hannibal was just and that Carthage ought to be dealt with in terms of peace? What would have been thought if, after the battle of Cannæ, a Senator there had risen in his place and denounced every levy of the Roman people, every expenditure of its treasure, and every appeal to the old recollections and the old glories? Sir, a Senator, himself learned far more than myself in such lore [Mr. Fessenden], tells me, in a voice that I am glad is audible, that he would have been hurled from the Tarpeian rock. It is a grand commentary upon the American Constitution that we permit these words to be uttered. I ask the Senator to recollect, too, what, save to send aid and comfort to the enemy, do these predictions of his amount to? Every word thus uttered falls as a note of inspiration upon every Confederate ear. Every sound thus uttered is a word (and falling from his lips, a mighty word) of kindling and triumph to a foe that determines to advance. For me, I have no such word as a Senator to utter. For me, amid temporary defeat, disaster, disgrace, it seems that my duty calls me to utter another word, and that word is: bold, sudden, forward, determined war, according to the laws of war, by armies, by military commanders clothed with full power, advancing with all the past glories of the Republic urging them on to conquest.

I do not stop to consider whether it is subjugation or not. It is compulsory obedience, not to my will, not to yours, sir, not to the will of any one man, not to the will of any one Senate; but compulsory obedience to the Constitution of the whole country. When we subjugate South Carolina what shall we do? We shall compel its obedience to the Constitution of the United States; that is all. We do not mean, we have never said, any more. If it be slavery that men should obey the Constitution their fathers fought for, let it be so. If it be freedom, it is freedom equally for them and for us. We propose to subjugate rebellion into loyalty; we propose to subjugate insurrection into peace; we propose to subjugate Confederate anarchy into constitutional Union liberty. When the Confederate armies are scattered; when their leaders are banished from power; when the people return to a late repentant sense of the wrong they have done to a Government they never felt but in benignancy and blessing, then the Constitution made for all will be felt by all, like the descending rains from heaven which bless all alike. Is that subjugation? To restore what was as it was for the benefit of the whole country and of the whole human race is all we desire and all we can have.

Sir, how can we retreat? Sir, how can we make peace? Who shall treat? What commissioners? Who would go? Upon what terms? Where is to be your boundary line? Where the end of the principles we shall have to give up? What will become of constitutional government? What will become of public liberty? What of past glories? What of future hopes? Shall we sink into the insignificance of the grave—a degraded, defeated, emasculated people, frightened by the results of one battle and scared at the visions raised by the imagination of the Senator from Kentucky upon this floor? No, sir; a thousand times, no, sir! We will rally—if, indeed, our words be necessary—we will rally the people, the loyal people, of the whole country. They will pour forth their treasure, their money, their men, without stint, without measure. The most peaceable man in this body may stamp his foot upon this Senate chamber floor, as of old a warrior and a Senator did, and from that single tramp there will spring forth armed legions. Shall one battle determine the fate of empire, or a dozen? the loss of one thousand men or twenty thousand, or $100,000,000 or $500,000,000? In a year's peace, in ten years, at most, of peaceful progress, we can restore them all. There will be some graves reeking with blood, watered by the tears of affection. There will be some privation; there will be some loss of luxury; their will be somewhat more need for labor to procure the necessaries of life. When that is said, all is said. If we have the country, the whole country, the Union, the Constitution, free government—with these there will return all the blessings of well-ordered civilization; the path of the country will be a career of greatness and of glory such as, in the olden time, our fathers saw in the dim visions of years yet to come, and such as would have been ours now, to-day, if it had not been for the treason for which the Senator too often seeks to apologize.

Senator Breckinridge.—The Senator asks me: "What would you have us do?" I would have us stop the war. We can do it. I have tried to show that there is none of that inexorable necessity to continue this war which the Senator seems to suppose. I do not hold that constitutional liberty on this continent is bound up in this fratricidal, devastating, horrible contest. Upon the contrary, I fear it will find its grave in it. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that we can reunite these States by war. He is mistaken in supposing that eighteen or twenty million upon the one side can subjugate ten or twelve million upon the other; or, if they do subjugate them, that you can restore constitutional government as our fathers made it. You will have to govern them as Territories, as suggested by the Senator, if ever they are reduced to the dominion of the United States. Sir, I would prefer to see these States all reunited upon true constitutional principles to any other object that could be offered me in life; and to restore, upon the principles of our fathers, the Union of these States, to me the sacrifice of one unimportant life would be nothing; nothing, sir. But I infinitely prefer to see a peaceful separation of these States than to see endless, aimless, devastating war, at the end of which I see the grave of public liberty and of personal freedom.

The Senator asked if a Senator of Rome had uttered these things in the war between Carthage and that power, how would he have been treated? Sir, the war between Carthage and Rome was altogether different from the war now waged between the United States and the Confederate States. I would have said —rather than avow the principle that one or the other must be subjugated, or perhaps both destroyed—let Carthage live and let Rome live, each pursuing its own course of policy and civilization.

The Senator says that these opinions which I thus expressed, and have heretofore expressed, are but brilliant treason; and that it is a tribute to the character of our institutions that I am allowed to utter them upon the Senate floor. Mr. President, if I am speaking treason I am not aware of it. I am speaking what I believe to be for the good of my country. If I am speaking treason, I am speaking it in my place in the Senate, By whose indulgence am I speaking? Not by any man's indulgence. I am speaking by the guaranties of that Constitution which seems to be here now so little respected. And, sir, when he asked what would have been done with a Roman Senator who had uttered such words, another Senator on this floor replies in audible tones: "He would have been hurled from the Tarpeian rock." Since, in ancient Rome, (while the defenders of the public liberty were sometimes torn to pieces by the people, yet their memories were cherished in grateful remembrance,) to be hurled from the Tarpeian rock was ever the fate of usurpers and tyrants, this remark is an insult which ought not to be offered on the floor of the Senate chamber to a Senator who is speaking in his place.

Senator Trumbull's bill was not brought to a vote, owing to the opposition of such influential Republicans as Senators Fessenden and Collamer, who thought it both unnecessary and of doubtful constitutionality.

Senator Breckinridge soon after left the Senate to become a general in the Confederate army. Senator Baker also shortly resigned his seat to become a Union officer. He was killed while gallantly leading his regiment in a hopeless charge at the battle of Ball's Bluff, Va., on October 21, 1861.

CHAPTER IV

Military Emancipation

Gen. Benjamin F. Butler Declares Slaves Employed on Confederate Works "Contraband of War"; the Doctrine Is Upheld by the President and Congress—Gen. John C. Frémont Issues an Order of Military Emancipation; It Is Revoked by the President, Who Is Criticized Therefor by Anti-Slavery Radicals–His Reply to Sen. Orville H. Browning [Ill.]—Frémont Is Removed—Gen. Henry W. Halleck Is Put in Charge of Department of Missouri—He Excludes Fugitive Slaves from the Army—Henry Wilson [Mass.] Introduces in the Senate a Bill to Punish Army Officers for Returning Fugitives—Debate: in Favor, Jacob Collamer [Vt.], Sen. Wilson; Amendment to Punish Officers for Enticing Slaves to Run Away, Supported by Willard Saulsbury [Del.], James A. Pearce [Md.]—Francis P. Blair, Jr. [Mo.] Makes a Similar Proposition in the House—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Blair, John A. Bingham [O.]; Opposed, Robert Mallory [Ky.), Charles A. Wickliffe [Ky.], Henry Grider [Ky.]—Bill Passed by House and Senate—Gen. David Hunter's Proclamation of Military Emancipation; It Is Revoked by the President.

SLAVES employed on the earthworks of General John B. Magruder [Conf.], in May, 1861, ran away to Fortress Monroe, Va., which was held by Union troops under Benjamin F. Butler, and General Butler refused to give them up to their owners on the ground that, Virginia claiming to be a foreign State, its citizens who endorsed this claim (as did the owners) could not assert as their right a duty of the Federal Government which extended only to its citizens.

This reasoning led to an even more advanced position which was concisely summed up in a single phrase, viz., that negroes employed in aid of rebellion were "contraband of war, and so subject to confiscation." Since the Southerners regarded slaves as chattels they could not consistently except to this conclusion.

The Government heartily approved General Butler's course. On May 30 Secretary Cameron of the War Department gave him a formal order authorizing him to pursue the policy he had adopted. Even the border-State Union men did not voice any objections, for to do so would impeach their loyalty. The public generally applauded Butler.

Congress, as we have seen (page 70), declared that all negroes employed upon fortifications, etc., by the Confederates, should not, if taken by the Union troops, be returned to their owners, and in this it was supported by public opinion in the North and even in the border States.

When, however, Major-General John C. Frémont, in command of the Western Department, consisting of

"CONTRABANDS"

An envelope cut during the Civil War

Illinois and all the region between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, attempted to gain a similar popular acclaim by issuing on his own responsibility a proclamation confiscating all property of persons in rebellion, and emancipating their slaves, neither the Administration nor the country as a whole supported him, although the Abolitionists hailed it as the most important act thus far of the war.

To President Lincoln and his military advisers the previous course of General Frémont had been most disappointing. His neglect to reënforce the brave General Lyon, isolated at Springfield in southwestern Missouri among gathering rebel forces, had led to the defeat and death of Lyon at Wilson's Creek on August 10, and his egotism in refusing to consult with the civil authorities and his subordinate officers had thoroughly demoralized his entire department.

President Lincoln therefore was watching for danger in that quarter, and, as soon as he was informed of Frémont's proclamation on August 30 of military emancipation, wrote him on September 2 to modify it so that it should conform to the act of Congress confiscating property used for insurrection, giving as a reason for his objection that the liberation of slaves would alarm Southern Unionists, and perhaps precipitate Kentucky into the Confederacy.

Before Lincoln received a reply to this he wrote to General David Hunter a letter full of shrewd foresight and delicate diplomacy:

September 9, 1861.

My dear Sir: General Frémont needs to have by his side a man of large experience. Will you not, for me, take that place? Your rank is one grade too high to be ordered to it; but will you not serve the country and oblige me by taking it voluntarily?

Two days later he received an answer from Frémont to his letter of September 2. It was full of excuses and self-justification. Mrs. Frémont brought it in person. She adopted a hostile attitude toward the President, and, insinuating that there was a conspiracy against her husband, demanded a copy of the President's Missouri correspondence. Lincoln courteously but firmly replied:

I do not feel authorized to furnish you with copies of letters in my possession, without the consent of the writers. No impression has been made on my mind against the honor or integrity of General Frémont, and I now enter my protest against being understood as acting in any hostility toward him.

The situation precipitated by General Frémont's proclamation was most critical. The border States, for whose adherence to the Union Lincoln had thus far most successfully played, seemed about to escape from his control. Besides, soldiers from the Northern States, who had enlisted to save the Union and not to free the negro, were greatly disaffected by Frémont's proclamation. On the other hand events had rapidly developed many conservative Northerners into anti-slavery radicals, and these, together with the original Abolitionists, made a hero of General Frémont. Such persons had to be treated with utmost consideration.

One of these was an old friend and adviser of Lincoln, Orville H. Browning, who had succeeded Stephen A. Douglas in the Senate. On September 17 he wrote to the President objecting to his attitude toward Frémont's proclamation. To this letter Lincoln replied on the 22d:

My dear Sir: Yours of the 17th is just received; and, coming from you, I confess it astonishes me. That you should object to my adhering to a law which you had assisted in making and presenting to me less than a month before is odd enough. But this is a very small part. General Frémont's proclamation as to confiscation of property and the liberation of slaves is purely political and not within the range of military law or necessity. If a commanding general finds a necessity to seize the farm of a private owner for a pasture, an encampment, or a fortification he has the right to do so, and to so hold it as long as the necessity lasts; and this is within military law, because within military necessity. But, to say the farm shall no longer belong to the owner, or his heirs forever, and this as well when the farm is not needed for military purposes as when it is, is purely political, without the savor of military law about it. And the same is true of slaves. If the general needs them, he can seize them and use them; but, when the need is past, it is not for him to fix their permanent future condition. That must be settled according to laws made by law-makers, and not by military proclamations. The proclamation on the point in question is simply "dictatorship." It assumes that the general may do anything he pleases—confiscate the lands and free the slaves of loyal people as well as of disloyal ones. And, going the whole figure, I have no doubt, would be more popular with some thoughtless people than that which has been done! But I cannot assume this reckless position, nor allow others to assume it on my responsibility.

You speak of it as being the only means of saving the Government. On the contrary, it is itself the surrender of the Government. Can it be pretended that it is any longer the Government of the United States—any government of constitution and laws—wherein a general or a president may make permanent rules of property by proclamation? I do not say Congress might not with propriety pass a law on the point just such as General Frémont proclaimed. I do not say I might not, as a member of Congress, vote for it. What I object to is, that I, as President, shall expressly or impliedly seize and exercise the permanent legislative functions of the Government.

So much as to principle. Now as to policy. No doubt the thing was popular in some quarters, and would have been more so if it had been a general declaration of emancipation. The Kentucky legislature would not budge till that proclamation was modified; and General Anderson telegraphed me that, on the news of General Frémont having actually issued deeds of manumission, a whole company of our volunteers threw down their arms and disbanded. I was so assured as to think it probable that the very arms we had furnished Kentucky would be turned against us. I think to lose Kentucky is nearly the same as to lose the whole game. Kentucky gone, we cannot hold Missouri, nor, as I think, Maryland. These all against us, and the job on our hands is too large for us. We would as well consent to separation at once, including the surrender of this capital. On the contrary, if you will give up your restlessness for new positions, and back me manfully on the grounds upon which you and other kind friends gave me the election and have approved in my public documents, we shall go through triumphantly. You must understand I took my course on the proclamation because of Kentucky. I took the same ground in a private letter to General Frémont before I heard from Kentucky.

There has been no thought of removing General Frémont on any ground connected with his proclamation. . . . I hope no real necessity for it exists on any ground.

Frémont's continued inaction, however, compelled the President at last to supersede him with General David Hunter. A few months later Frémont was placed in charge of the Mountain Department [western Virginia and eastern Kentucky and Tennessee].

On November 9, 1861, General Henry W. Halleck was placed in charge of the Department of Missouri [Missouri, Arkansas, western Kentucky, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois], and Hunter put in command of the Department of Kansas [Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, and Indian Territory].

General Halleck set himself at once to settle the vexatious problem of the relation of the army to fugitive slaves. Contrary to Frémont's policy he issued an order on November 20 excluding these fugitives from the army lines on the ground that they conveyed information to the enemy. For this order he was violently attacked by the anti-slave press and Congressmen, who averred that, on the contrary, the fugitives brought in valuable information about the enemy.

During the session of December, 1861–July, 1862, several bills were proposed in both the Senate and the House to punish officers and privates of the army and navy for aiding owners to recover fugitive slaves. That of Henry Wilson [Mass.] was reported on January 6, 1862, in the Senate. On January 17 it came up for discussion.

Return of Fugitive Slaves by Army Officers

Congress, January 6-March 10, 1862

Jacob Collamer [Vt.] said:

It is a perversion entirely to undertake to use soldiers as a mere posse comitatus, or as a mere police force, or to use them in any way in the enforcement of the laws of any particular section into which they may be marched. They have nothing to do with that; their business is to suppress the rebellion, and disperse the insurgents wherever they may be found in arms. I believe we are generally agreed that there is great impropriety in military men exercising military authority within the States in relation to their internal and municipal affairs; it is very likely to produce collisions that ought to be avoided.

Willard Saulsbury [Del.] moved to amend the resolution by making it punish soldiers for enticing slaves from their masters or harboring them. This amendment was amended by limiting the cases to slaves of loyal masters.

Senator Wilson was opposed to any amendment. James A. Pearce [Md.] supported the amendment.

The bill without it is an invitation to all slaves in the vicinity to resort to the lines of the army as a harbor of refuge where they can be safe from the operation of the undoubted legal rights of the owner. It is an invitation to the whole body of such people within a loyal State, such as Maryland, to accomplish their freedom by indirection. It is not an act of emancipation in its terms; but, so far as it can operate and does operate, it leads directly to that result. I know that fact that the slaves of masters whose titles are undoubted and their loyalty unquestioned have resorted to camps, and the officers sometimes have been very unwilling and have positively refused to take any step whatever in the matter? What is the result of that? A great many of these soldiers come from States where they hold this whole system of domestic servitude in such dislike that they will not permit the master to exercise his undoubted, valid rights, even though he goes accompanied by an officer of the law. He cannot exercise his rights except at the peril of personal ill treatment from these soldiers, who are not to be restrained by a military officer and who, therefore, will make their will the law of the case. Sir, I do not think that is right. I think that is making a camp of the United States army a refuge for runaway negroes. I think we are violating the rights of loyal masters in loyal States.

As for its operation in seceded States the bill will have no operation there anyway. Its effect is to take away the property of the people of Maryland, and of the loyal people of Maryland too. If it does not have that effect it will have none. I think, therefore, the amendment ought to be retained and that equal justice demands it. If it is not retained we of Maryland shall have to consider that our rights in this species of property are set aside, so far as this Government can set them aside by such an act.

The bill was kept from a vote by the tactics of the Democrats aided by a few conservative Republicans.

In the House, however, Francis P. Blair, Jr. [Mo.], of the Military Committee, on February 25, reported the substance of the Wilson resolution in an additional Article of War. The article was strongly opposed by Robert Mallory [Ky.], who argued with great ability that the army was intended to aid the Government in enforcing its laws, of which the Fugitive Slave Act was one, and, if the articles were not intended to repeal this act, it was a denial to the State where that law was sought to be enforced by the aid of the general Government in its enforcement.

"If it be the intention to repeal that law I wish gentlemen of the House to say so candidly and at once, and to let us know what we are to expect in regard to this matter."

Mr. Blair refused to decide whether his bill was a virtual repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, contenting himself with saying that in common with a great many others he believed that "the army of the United States has a great deal better business than returning fugitive slaves."

John A. Bingham [O.], however, took it upon himself to declare that:

"it is impossible by any fair construction to make the bill imply any interference with the administration of civil justice in this country, either under the legislation of 1850 or under any act that has ever been passed by this Government. Sir, the bill simply provides that your officers in the army and navy, and those under them, shall not exercise in the future, as in the past, the functions which belong alone and exclusively to the civil magistrates of the country, upon the penalty of being tried by a court-martial, and, upon conviction, of being dismissed from the service thus abused and disgraced."

Mr. Mallory, while granting the high legal attainments of the gentleman from Ohio, was "very suspicious of the accuracy of the working of his mind upon questions of this character. [Laughter.] Upon this question, at any rate, I cannot concur with him in opinion upon the construction he gives to this bill."

Charles A. Wickliffe [Ky.], referring to General Grant's return to their owners of slaves captured at Fort Donelson [February 16, 1862], asked the gentleman from Ohio if the bill would prevent a military commander from the exercise of such a power hereafter?

Henry Grider [Ky.], stating that the Rebel army had run off with $300,000 worth of slaves in three counties of Kentucky, asked the gentleman if the bill proposed that these should not be intercepted and returned, and whether he would make the military power paramount to every other consideration, even of constitutional obligation, and turn these negroes free.

Mr. Bingham replied that the prevalent practice of officers in the army returning without trial slaves to those claiming to be their owners was in direct violation of the carefully guarded provisions of the Fugitive Slave act, and this practice the bill was intended to prevent.

This practice is a military despotism that the American people should not tolerate for a moment, nor lose a moment in ending by the enactment of this bill into a law. Mr. Speaker, if I had my way, instead of having this bill provide, as it does simply provide, that persons in the United States military or naval service thus offending should, upon conviction by court-martial, be dismissed from the service, I would have the bill provide that such offenders should, by the sentence of a court-martial, be shot as kidnappers and as invaders of the rights of persons, as violators of justice and of the very sanctuary of justice.

Mr. Mallory said that he did not ask that slaves be returned where there was doubt as to their ownership. The laws of his State, indeed, forbade it.

Mr. Bingham replied:

There is always a doubt, a doubt imposed by law upon the conscience of every civil magistrate, in favor of the party brought before him and attempted to be deprived of his liberty—a doubt which should bind the magistrate to stand by the party who is thus sought to be deprived of his liberty until that doubt is overcome by lawful evidence. But, sir, no man in the military or naval service of this country has the right to hear evidence or to determine that question of doubt. I go further. The presumption of law is that every man in this land is entitled to his liberty until the contrary shall be made to appear. I want to know by what authority any officer in the naval or military service of the United States has the right to assume for himself to hear evidence and to determine against that presumption?

Mr. Mallory.—I understand my friend from Ohio to admit in a case where there is no doubt either in law or in fact, where the officer knows the party is the slave of the loyal master who claims him, that he is willing that the slave should be restored to the master by the United States officer.

Mr. Bingham.—The gentleman will pardon me; I admit no such thing.

Mr. Mallory.—Does the gentleman deny that in that case it becomes the duty of the officer to restore the slave to his loyal master?

Mr. Bingham.—I do deny it. I deny that he has the right to entertain the question. I deny that he has the right, where no offence is charged, to clothe himself with authority to sit upon the right of any human being in this land to his liberty. One of the strongest utterances of the Declaration of Independence may be repeated upon this floor this day in favor of the enactment of this very bill. That utterance was: that "the King," whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, "has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power."

That is what is so offensive in this practice which has obtained in your camps, from the shores of the Potomac to the shores of the Mississippi—the attempt by the military power to assume and exercise civil authority in contempt of the civil power of the land. Some of your military officers of high and low degree have been detailing their men for the purpose of seizing, and have seized, persons not accused of crime, but suspected of the virtue of preferring liberty to bondage. Are we to revive here in this land the hated rule of the Athenian ostracism, by which men were condemned, not because they were charged with crime or proved guilty of crime, but because they were suspected to possess and practice the virtues of justice and patriotism in such degree as rendered their presence in the state dangerous to republican equality? Aristides was condemned because he was just, and Themistocles because he was the savior of the city.

These alleged fugitive slaves, who are subjected to this intolerable military despotism, are seized, not upon the charge or the proof that they have stolen anybody's goods, not that they have invaded anybody's rights, but upon the suspicion that they have been guilty of asserting their right of personal liberty, and of running away from a cruel and unjust bondage. Some of your officers, according to the practice of late, assume the right to sit in judgment upon the delicate question of the liberty of these suspected persons, to seize them, to condemn them as slaves, and to surrender them over to stripes and punishment.

I have read in the papers, and I believe it is true, that one of these persons suspected of escaping from bondage to liberty swam across the Ohio River, making for an encampment upon the Indiana shore, where he saw the banner of liberty flying which he fondly looked upon as consecrating that place, at least, as sacred to the rights of person, and where even the rights of a hunted bondman would be respected. After having been beaten about, bruised, and mangled against the rocks in the channel of the river, to whose rushing waters he committed his life that he might regain his liberty, he reached the opposite shore. Somebody went into the camp and reported that this man was suspected of the crime of having run away from chains and slavery. A company of soldiers, it is said, were detailed to seize him, and did seize and return him as a slave to the man who claimed him. If that practice is to be pursued by the army and navy under the American flag it ought to cover with midnight blackness every star that burns upon its field of azure, and with everlasting infamy the men who dare to desecrate it to such base uses.

What are we fighting for in this land? For the supremacy of the laws; for the administration of justice according to law; for liberty regulated and sheltered by law. We are fighting for the principle, among others, that no man shall be deprived of his liberty in this land without a hearing before the only tribunals authorized by law to hear and determine the question. The bill now under consideration proposes to provide against interfering with that right, sacred as any other, guarded and protected by the very letter and spirit of the Constitution. And it surprises me that any gentleman should stand here to-day objecting to the enactment of such a law.

The bill was passed by a substantially party vote—yeas, 83; nays, 44. Coming before the Senate on March 4 it was vehemently opposed by the Democrats, and as stoutly supported by the Republicans, and on March 10 was passed by 29 yeas to 9 nays—a party vote, with the exception that James A. McDougall [Dem.] of California voted for it.

The capture of Port Royal, S. C., on November 7, 1861, opened the way to the Federal occupation of the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, which was formed into the military department of the South, General Hunter being called from Kansas to command it.

General Hunter's Emancipation Proclamation

On May 9, 1862, General David Hunter issued a proclamation on the ground that, martial law having been declared in it (on April 25), slavery and martial law were "altogether incompatible in a free country."

On May 19 the President revoked the order, saying that he "had no knowledge, information, or belief" of an intention on General Hunter's part to issue it, nor had the general nor any other commander or person authority from the Government to declare the slaves of any State free.

I further made known that, whether it be competent for me, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, to declare the slaves of any State or States free, and whether, at any time, in any case, it shall have become a necessity indispensable to the maintenance of the government to exercise such supposed power, are questions which, under my responsibility, I reserve to myself, and which I cannot feel justified in leaving to the decision of commanders in the field. These are totally different questions from those of police regulations in armies and camps.

CHAPTER V

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia

Sen. Wilson Introduces Bill in Senate for Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia—Debate: in Favor, John P. Hale [N. H.], Sen. Wilson, James Harlan [Ia.], Charles Sumner [Mass.]; Opposed, Garrett Davis [Ky.], Waitman T. Willey [Va.], Anthony Kennedy [Md.], Willard Saulsbury [Del.]; Bill Is Passed in Senate and House—Points Made by Representative Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.]—The President Signs the Bill, with Remarks.

IN his first annual message (December 2, 1861) President Lincoln recommended that steps be taken to colonize the "contraband" freedmen and other free negroes in a congenial climate.

To carry out the plan of colonization may involve the acquiring of territory and also the appropriation of money beyond that to be expended in the territorial acquisition. Having practiced the acquisition of territory for nearly sixty years, the question of constitutional power to do so is no longer an open one with us. The power was questioned at first by Mr. Jefferson, who, however, in the purchase of Louisiana, yielded his scruples on the plea of great expediency. If it be said that the only legitimate object of acquiring territory is to furnish homes for white men, this measure effects that object; for the emigration of colored men leaves additional room for white men remaining or coming here. Mr. Jefferson, however, placed the importance of procuring Louisiana more on political and commercial grounds than on providing room for population.

On this whole proposition, including the appropriation of money with the acquisition of territory, does not the expediency amount to absolute necessity—that, without which the Government itself cannot be perpetuated?

On February 13, 1862, a bill drawn by Henry Wilson [Mass.] was reported in the Senate from the Committee on the District of Columbia abolishing slavery in the District. It provided for compensation to the owners, which was fixed by commissioners appointed by that purpose, but with limitation of an average of $300 per slave to each owner, for the punishment of kidnapping of such freedmen and other negroes as felony, and appropriated $100,000 to be expended under direction of the President for colonizing these and other negroes of the District, if they so desired, in tropic countries outside of the United States.

The bill came up for discussion on March 12, six days after the receipt of a special message from the President proposing compensated emancipation in any State so desiring it (see page 163).

Senate, March 12-April 3, 1862

Garrett Davis [Ky.] objected to the bill; he first attacked the voluntary colonization feature as impracticable.

Not one slave in a hundred will consent to be colonized when liberated. The liberation of the slaves in this District, and in any State of the Union, will be just equivalent to settling them in the country where they live; and whenever that policy is inaugurated, especially in the States where there are many slaves, it will inevitably and immediately introduce a war of extermination between the two races. Free negroes are notoriously worthless. A negro's idea of freedom is freedom from work as a general rule. Where you have a few free negroes in a white community, and the negroes have but a small association and the examples all around them are the examples of diligence, industry, and thrift, this outward influence will force them to a modicum of labor and of thrift, too. But whenever you settle negroes in large numbers, or liberate them in large numbers, and they become a society to themselves, you will have a thriftless, worthless, indolent, inefficient population.

The negroes that are now liberated, and that remain in this city, will become a sore and a burden and a charge upon the white population. They will be criminals; they will become paupers. They will be engaged in crimes and in petty misdemeanors. They will become a charge and a pest upon this society, and the power which undertakes to liberate them ought to relieve the white community in which they reside, and in which they will become a pest, from their presence.

Mr. President, whenever any power, constitutional or unconstitutional, assumes the responsibility of liberating slaves where slaves are numerous they establish as inexorably as fate a conflict between the races that will result in the exile or the extermination of the one race or the other. I know it. We have now about two hundred and twenty-five thousand slaves in Kentucky. Think you, sir, that we should ever submit to have those slaves manumitted and left among us? No, sir; no, never; nor will any white people in the United States of America where the slaves are numerous. If, by unconstitutional legislation, you should, by laws which you shrink from submitting to the test of constitutionality in your courts of justice, liberate them, without the intervention of the courts, the moment you reorganize the white inhabitants of those States as States of the Union, they will reduce those slaves again to a state of slavery, or they will expel them and drive them upon you, or south of you, or they will hunt them down like beasts and exterminate them. They will not do this from choice, but they will do it from necessity. Emancipation will produce such a conflict between the races as will render extermination inevitable, and there will be no escape from it.

I maintain that it is a matter of humanity to the negro in this city, and of justice to the white population of this city, that, when you turn three or four thousand negroes who are now in a state of slavery free, you should relieve them from the curse of such a population, from its expense, from its burdens upon this community in every form; you ought to assume the philanthropy and the justice—the philanthropy to the negro race and the justice to the white race—to remove these people from the District. You may refuse to do it. If you do, a few years' experience will tell you what a mistake you made. I shall speak, though, on this subject at more length on another occasion. I will only say now that, when the negroes are liberated in the cotton States, it is giving up the cotton States to the negro race. and it is expelling, in a very short time, by inevitable necessity, the white population from that country, or it is introducing war between the two races that will result in the exile or expulsion of one or the other.

I know what I talk about. Mr. President, the loyal people of the slave States are as true to this Union as any man in the Senate chamber, or in any of the free States; but never, never will they submit by unconstitutional laws to have their slaves liberated and to remain domiciled among them; and the policy that attempts it will establish a bloody La Vendée in the whole of the slave States, my own included. If, at the time you commenced this war, you had announced as the national policy that was to prevail the measures and visionary schemes and ideas of some gentlemen on this floor, you would not have had a solitary man from the slave States to support you. Whenever you seek to carry those measures into operation you unite the slave States as one man. They will tell you that in resisting such schemes they are fighting for the Union and the Constitution; and they will tell you so truly. They will tell you that your system of policy is no less aggressive and destructive upon the Union and the Constitution than that of the rebels of Secescia themselves; and they will tell you so truly. They will feel it as incumbent on them as men and as freemen to resist your unconstitutional policy, by which you will overturn and trample under your feet the principles of the Constitution, as they feel it to be their duty to resist the war which the secessionists have made upon the Union.

On March 18 John P. Hale [N. H.] replied to Senator Davis.

Of all the forms skepticism ever assumed the most insidious and the most fatal is that which suggests that it is unsafe to perform plain and simple duty for fear that disastrous consequences may result therefrom.

This question of emancipation, wherever it has been raised in this country, has rarely ever been argued upon the great and fundamental principles of right, but upon what are to be the consequences. Men entirely forget to look at the objects that are to be effected by the bill, in view of the inherent rights of their manhood, in view of the great questions of humanity, of Christianity, and of duty; but what is to be its effect upon the price of sugar, tobacco, cotton, and other necessaries and luxuries of life? The honorable Senator from Kentucky looks upon it in that point of view entirely. Now, it does not become me to venture my opinions against the opinions of that Senator who has lived among the population of which he speaks; but it is as much my prerogative as it is the honorable Senator's to read a little of history, and to know what is its teaching upon this question, and by that test to compare the predictions of the honorable Senator with some other predictions of a different character that have been made elsewhere on other occasions.

The Senator here discussed the situation of Jamaica. He admitted that a steady decline had occurred there in its staple industries, particularly sugar, but showed from official British statistics that this deterioration had begun long before emancipation [1838], and was therefore due to other causes, the chief of which, he declared, was the system of great estates operated not by the owners, but by overseers.

But, sir, since emancipation the island has been divided into small proprietorships, and the proprietors of these estates have got up a system of exports of other things, such as cocoanuts, etc., which now amount to a very considerable sum.

But, sir, Jamaica is almost the only island that shows a comparative decrease of wealth from the effect of emancipation. It is different in the island of Barbadoes. That island has increased in its exports, in its value, in its wealth more than double since emancipation. Similar progress has been made in the Leeward Islands, Antigua, Dominica, Nevis, Montserrat, and St. Kitts.

I hope that it will be gratifying to the humane feelings of the honorable Senator from Kentucky to find that he is altogether mistaken as to the effects that emancipation will produce upon this laboring class of population. I hope that it will do something to expel from his mind that skepticism which makes him shrink from looking at this measure in the light in which an enlightened and philanthropic statesman ought to look at it, and that is in regard to its bearings upon the great question of human rights.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in the good providence of God He presents to this nation to-day an opportunity never presented before. If the rebellion which is now rending this Republic, and which is strewing our plains with the dead of our young men who have gone out to do battle on the field, has horrors, if it has miseries, if it has everything or almost everything to make humanity weep, it is not without some aspects that relieve the dark shade of the picture. If this rebellion—I trust ere long to be crushed out—shall, in the progress of the great injury that it is doing, afford this Republic, these United States, the opportunity of trying here, in this little District of less than ten miles square, the experiment which other nations are trying upon a great scale; and if we are enabled to show to the world that it is sometimes safe to do right, and not always inexpedient; then, sir, we shall have achieved something at which humanity will rejoice and something for which our posterity, to the latest generations, will bless us.

Sir, the governments of the world the world over are trying this experiment. The Emperor of Russia [Alexander II] over his vast dominions is now striking the bands of oppression from his long trodden down millions of serfs. The ameliorating influences of better principles and purer Christianity than have yet prevailed in the monarchies of the Old World are melting those iron despotisms and carrying into practical effect that great lesson of Christianity: "to loose the bands of wickedness" and "let the oppressed go free"; and it would be a reproach that ought to mantle the cheek of every citizen of this Republic with burning shame, if, at this day and this hour, when the monarchies of the earth are waking up to the great questions of human rights and making Christianity, instead of being a barren speculation, a practical and efficient principle of their government, this nation, at a time when the providence of God presents this opportunity to it, should, from any skepticism or fear of consequences, fail to meet the question and do justice by the oppressed.

Sir, I do not ask that the Government of the United States should trample upon the Constitution in any one of its provisions. I believe that, up to a very late period in our history, it was the conceded doctrine of this Republic, by statesmen North and South, that the constitutional power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in this District existed in Congress. I know that in late years that has been questioned and even denied. I know that within the last ten or twelve years this nation has been rent upon a new dogma, which denied the constitutional power of Congress to legislate for the Territories; and, while that question was rending the country, while it was tearing political parties in twain, dividing churches, bringing itself home to the hearts and consciences of this people, the Supreme Court of the United States undertook, with their puny efforts, to throw themselves in the way of the great question by the Dred Scott decision, and to say to the surging waves of humanity that, while washing out the stains of oppression from our history, they should go thus far and no further. The Supreme Court will find out ere long how much that has effected. Whether it has done more to wipe out the controversies that they wanted to crush out, or to obliterate whatever of respect there was remaining in the public heart for themselves, they will find out before the issue is settled.

But, sir, while by this decision the Territories of the United States were taken theoretically from the management of the Federal Government, I believe, though I never read the Dred Scott decision in reference to that particular view of it, it did not go to the extent of saying that Congress had no constitutional power to legislate in the District of Columbia. I am glad they did not. I think they would if they had thought of it. [Laughter.] But, sir, that is left to us. Over this little spot of ten miles square, or what there is left of it after the retrocession of the part ceded by Virginia, we have confessedly the right of legislation; and here in our midst, and by our laws, this system of human slavery exists, and we are called upon to-day to abolish it, to repeal the laws upon which it rests, and to the most limited extent to try what will be the effect of emancipation upon the few slaves that are in this District.

When the midnight clock ushered in the 1st of August, 1838, the last manacle fell from the last slave in the British West India Islands. This population knew it, and what was the aspect they exhibited? Riots, drinking, acts of degradation and crime; such scenes as you might expect from what the Senator from Kentucky said when he predicted that they would become pests to society? Was there anything of that kind exhibited? No, sir; but on the preceding night almost the whole population gathered themselves together in their churches, in their places of worship, and when the hour of twelve struck, which told them that the slaves had been converted into British freemen, they rose and sent up one united shout of thanksgiving to Almighty God for the great boon He had conferred upon them; and the conduct that these emancipated slaves have exhibited in most, if not all, the islands since has been such as indicates not only the wisdom and the justice but the expediency of this measure.

Mr. President, there is nothing on earth that is more unjust, nothing more unkind, than for this boasted white Caucasian race to enslave the colored race, to keep them in a state of ignorance, to keep them in a state where it is a penal offence to teach them to read so much out of the Bible as that they may learn that God made them and Christ died to redeem them; I say it is cruel and unjust to such a people, denied the right of bringing a suit in court, denied the right of testifying as to their own personal rights and wrongs, the whole intelligence of the world shut out by the bar of an inexorable penal statute from enlightening their understandings; to pronounce them as degraded, ignorant, incapable of representation, because under the crushing weight of all these disabilities they have not made such progress as to enable them to step at once on an equality into a condition which their masters have enjoyed for many years. It is cruel. The injustice of it cannot be winked out of sight. It is as unjust as it would be to put out the eyes of a man and then taunt him with his blindness, as unjust as it would be to reproach any man with a personal deformity. It is as unjust as it is possible for perverted human intellect to be. Take off these burdens, give them a fair chance, let the light of science shine into their minds, make it no longer a crime punishable with imprisonment to open to them the pages of God's eternal truth, let them read something of the world that is about them, and something of the hope which leads to the world beyond them, give them the elevating influence of some of the motives that have elevated you, and then, if against all that, they fail to rise and fail to improve, then, and not till then, will it be time to reproach them with their inability to cope and contend with their white masters.

On March 20 Waitman T. Willey [Va.] opposed the measure.

Sir, this bill is a part of a series of measures, already initiated, all looking to the same ultimate result—the universal abolition of slavery by Congress. The consequences, in my judgment, involve the lives of thousands of my fellow-citizens and the happiness of all the loyal people of all the border slaveholding States. Perhaps I should be justified in saying that they involved in most serious peril the restoration of the Union and the Constitution.

Mr. President, I shall not trouble the Senate with any argument respecting the constitutional power of Congress to pass laws emancipating slaves. The arguments already made against this power by Congress in the States where slavery exists have not been answered, and, I believe, they never will be. But I do not think the argument against the expediency and practicability of such laws has been exhausted. Sir, I admit that the rebels, especially the leaders of the rebellion, should be punished. They ought, in some manner, to be made to bear the burdens of the war they have forced upon the country, as far as is possible, and to indemnify loyal men for the injuries inflicted upon them by the rebellion. But this punishment should be according to law. To punish treason by unconstitutional penalties is to be guilty of virtual treason ourselves, to say nothing of the inconsistency and danger of such a procedure. And it is worthy of remark, that no measure of emancipation yet proposed contains any indemnity for injuries received by the Government or individuals. Simply to emancipate the slave of the rebel may be a punishment to him, but it affords no relief to the loyal man who has suffered by the rebellion. Nay, one of the fundamental provisions of the confiscation bill of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Trumbull] is to make the loyal people of the Union contribute of their means to transport and colonize the emancipated slaves of rebels. I cannot understand either the justice or expediency of such a policy. It seems to me to involve a manifest inconsistency. It punishes the traitor, indeed, but it only increases the burdens and taxes of the loyal people.

The agitation of these questions, under existing circumstances, must be positively mischievous. Will it not create strife and divisions here? Will it not disturb the country? Above all, will it not afford aid and comfort to the enemy? I am sure it will. It will be used by the leaders of the rebellion to "fire the Southern heart." The people of the South have been taught to believe that the object and design of the Republican party are to abolish slavery in all the States. These propositions will be seized upon as evidence of this intention. They will say: "Look at their unconstitutional confiscation laws, making no safe nor practical discrimination between Union men and secessionists. Look at the bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; it is a stepping-stone to further encroachments." Especially will they point to the sweeping resolutions of the great apostle of abolition, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner], which, by one dash of the pen, deprive every Southern man of his slaves. No recruiting officer will have such power to replenish the thinned ranks of the rebel army as these propositions. No financial skill of Southern statesmen will have such power to replenish the depleted treasury of the rebel Government. Thus will these measures advance the cause of rebellion in the South; and so, consequently, will they prolong the horrors of war on our part, increase our expenditures, and augment the burdens of taxation. Worse than all, they will destroy that Union settlement in the South on which we hope to reorganize the State governments and restore the authority of the Constitution. They will not only encourage our enemies in the South, but they will dishearten our friends there. Thus do the claims of our common humanity, deprecating the evils of war, suggest the impolicy of such legislation at this time.

There is no necessity for driving the secessionists to such desperate extremities. Justice, moderation, generosity will meet a joyful response in many a Southern heart. They love the old flag; they love the old Union. Show them that their rights under the Constitution—their prejudices of education and habit, if you please to say so—are to be respected, and you will strike a blow more fatal to the rebel cause than a score of such victories as that at Fort Donelson. And this will be a victory without bloodshed. It destroys no valuable lives. It wastes no resources of the country's wealth. It makes no widows nor orphans. It desolates no homes. Why should not the North be generous and forbearing? Are not moderation and forbearance the invariable characteristics of a great people?

I understand Mr. Lincoln himself to be actuated by such principles. I understand that, in reference to this very matter of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, he was in 1858, and I hope is still, governed by the same considerations of expediency. If in 1858 considerations of expediency were enough to cause the Republican party to pause in their course at that day, now with the storm and tempest of war upon us, and an accumulating debt pressing down the people, should we not also hearken to the suggestions of expediency?

Why may we not to-day conquer a peace, and, after that, in the language of Mr. Douglas just before he died, settle all these difficulties? I will quote his words:

> "When we shall have rescued the Government and country from its perils, and seen its flag floating in triumph over every inch of American soil, it will then be time enough to inquire as to who and what has brought these troubles upon us. Let him be marked as no true patriot who will not abandon all such issues in times like these."

Again, I ask Senators to consider what may be the effect of these extreme measures upon the public sentiment of the loyal States. There is but one sentiment there now, but one mind, one purpose. Therein consist our strength and the surest guaranty of our success. But this unity of sentiment and purpose is predicated on the distinctly declared purpose of the war, to wit, the suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of the Constitution and the Government as they were prior to the rebellion, without change or modification. Sir, let it be understood that there is a different object to be accomplished—such as is indicated by some, if not all, of the measures to which I have alluded—and that unity and harmony of public sentiment will be instantly destroyed. We shall thereafter in the loyal States be "a house divided against itself." Distraction will disturb our proceedings here, division will enter the army, and the cause of constitutional liberty will be imperiled with defeat and disgrace. Already are there indications of dissatisfaction in the public mind lest Congress should depart from the avowed purpose hitherto announced as the only object of the war.

Mr. President, what must be the practical effects of these measures of emancipation upon the welfare of the slave? You cannot enact the slave into a freeman by bill in Congress. A charter of his liberty may be engrossed, enrolled, and passed into a law, with all the formalities of legislation, and still he must remain, virtually, a slave. The servile nature of centuries cannot be eradicated by the rhetoric of Senators, nor by an act of Congress. You may call "spirits from the vasty deep," but they will not come. A freeman has the right of locomotion; he has the right of going into any State and of becoming the citizen of any State. Let me ask the Senators from Illinois and Indiana whether, if I set my slave free, they will allow him to come to these States. Sir, the constitutions of both of those States prohibit free negroes from becoming citizens of those States, or even residents thereof; and that is the liberty which you propose for the slave. Other States are agitating the question whether they will enact similar interdicts.

In how many States is the free negro entitled to the right of suffrage or to be a juror, or a judge, or to a seat in the legislature; to make, interpret, or execute the laws of the State in which he lives? I understand there are some negroes living in the North who possess large estates, are well educated, and of good morals and manners. Do you receive them into your families on terms of equality? Do you give them your daughters in marriage?

We must take things as they actually exist and, legislating for the slave, we must conform to his actually existing character and condition—moral, intellectual, and physical. We shall not deserve the name of statesmen if we do not; nor shall we entitle ourselves to the character of philanthropists if we disregard such considerations. Sir, would you recommend the Chinese to adopt a republican form of government? Would you advise the native Africans, cannibals and all, to organize a government on the model of the Constitution of the United States? The idea is preposterous.

And now, sir, candidly considering the ignorance, degradation, and helplessness of the slaves in the South, can you desire their immediate emancipation? Think of four millions of these degraded, helpless beings, without a dollar of money, without an acre of land or an implement of trade or husbandry, without house or home, thrust out upon the community to maintain themselves! Sir, they would starve to death, or they would steal, or they would murder and rob. Better drive them into the Gulf of Mexico and end their sufferings at once than perpetrate such a monstrous cruelty as this upon them.

We heard from the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hale] in regard to the prosperity of the British West Indies and of the French West Indies. I shall rejoice in the perfect success of those efforts to elevate the African race. But did not the Senator know how different was the position of the slaves in those states from that of the slaves in the United States? There were but few white men in those islands; the soil was all their own; implements of husbandry were put into their hands; and, with the moral influence and watchfulness of great Christian nations standing beside them and breathing upon them encouragement and words of good will, affording them moral and physical aid and protection; and yet, with all these advantages; with a soil all their own; with no white men to overshadow them; with a government of their own; with the moral influence and aid of these Christian patrons that had set them free, it is to-day, after so many years, a question whether it will not be a failure rather than a success. God grant that it may be a perfect success!

And now you, men of the North, I beg to ask, what would be the consequences of this wholesale emancipation on your own communities? How long would it be until this miserable population, like the frogs of Egypt, would be infesting your kitchens, squatting in your gates, and filling your almshouses? Sir, are you willing to receive them? If you set them free you must receive them. Will your operatives extend to them the right hand of fellowship and receive them as coequals and colaborers in your fields and shops? Meantime, what will become of the cotton fields of the South, and the cotton factories of the North? While you are increasing the number of your laborers, you will be destroying the sources of their employment. You will ruin the industrial interests of the South and bring serious detriment on the labor of the North.

The answer to all this is: transport and colonize the emancipated slaves in some tropical country. What then? Whither shall they be sent? Where shall we find a tropical territory for four millions of inhabitants? And where shall we find the money to pay for a territory sufficient to settle four millions of inhabitants? How much will it cost? I say nothing of constitutional difficulties in the way. Let them pass, along with the suspension of the habeas corpus, et id omne genus.[1] Where is the money to come from? Rhetoric and philanthropic platitudes will not purchase territory nor furnish the cost of transportation and the cost of the outfit and the cost of houses to be built for the reception of four millions of people, and the cost of implements of husbandry and tools of trade, and the cost of food and clothing for the first year, at the least. And then, sir, our task is just commenced. We must provide for their continued supervision, direction, and protection. And how long must all this continue? How long will it be before this mass of ignorant and servile population will become capable of self-government and self-subsistence? How many generations will it require to divest the slave of his servility and to clothe him with the independence of the freeman? Who can pay the debt? The accumulating millions of the current war debt, now rising mountain high, and resting with the weight of mountains upon the people, sink into mole-hills before the Atlas-like dimensions of the sum that will be required for the accomplishment of this stupendous scheme of philanthropy.

Mr. President, if slavery shall suffer from the incidental and necessary effects upon it of this war, let it be so; I shall not regret it. I am no pro-slavery man. I wish there were no slavery. I believe that slavery is doomed. I believe the time is coming when it will be abolished. Heaven hasten the day when, under the regenerating and reforming influences of Christian civilization, the slave shall be qualified for the enjoyment of freedom, and when it shall be practicable and humane to strike the fetters from the limbs of the last bondman of our race. But let us abide the appointed time of divine Providence. Let us not, in our eagerness to avenge the wrongs, real or imaginary, of the slave, repeat the folly of Samson, and in the frenzy of an indiscreet zeal pull down the pillars of the Constitution and involve both the slave and ourselves in the ruins of our country.

On March 4 Senator Davis spoke again upon the bill.

An honorable member of the other House has proclaimed, audaciously proclaimed, that he has attended and harangued negro meetings here, that he has told them they had the same right to their masters' labor that the masters had to theirs; that they had the same right to sell their masters as their masters had to sell them; that they had the same right to sell their masters' children as the masters had to sell their children. Are these the dogmas, destructive to society, that you intend to preach and establish in this District? Was there anything in British oppression upon the colonial inhabitants of this country at all comparable in grievance, in real wrong and outrage, to what you are endeavoring now to force upon the people of this District? Have they not as much right to say they will have slaves as you to say that you will not have slaves? If you will not allow them that privilege, will you not allow them the poor privilege of voting whether free negroes shall stay here among them or not, a curse to the soil, a blight upon this small and poverty-stricken society?

If you are so humane, so benevolent, buy the slaves of the poor helpless widows in this city at fair prices with your money and take them to your homes, and there make them your neighbors, if you choose, your equals in politics and in the social circle. When you do this the world will give you credit for benevolence and philanthropy, but now it is all cant, it is all ambition. You and the men in the South are trying to make the same use of the slavery question. The business of both parties is to agitate, agitate, and never cease to agitate, because it becomes an element of political power by which individuals or parties may vault into office. Out, out with such benevolence and philanthropy as that!

It is not for the advantage of the white man in the agricultural States that slavery exists. It is expensive labor; it would be better for the country if it had never been there. I am no friend to slavery as an abstract question. If now I could decide whether slavery should exist or not, or whether it should cease with the colonization of all the negroes, I would colonize them all. If my own will could prevail I would put into operation in my own State a system of gradual emancipation that it would take about a hundred years to consummate and the thing should die out so gradually that nobody would be injured by it. But I say, in relation to this District and these people, give them a fair compensation for their slaves, and, when you get them, remove them from the country; let the races be separated; let the negro go to a land where, when he is buried, memory may raise some trophies over his tomb. None, none can ever be raised over his tomb in this land.

On March 25 Senator Wilson spoke in defence of his bill. He referred to certain laws in regard to slavery in the District as barbarous in the extreme, such as the act of May 31, 1827, that all negroes, except they proved the contrary, were presumed to be absconding slaves, and were to be committed to jail as such.

In what age of the world, in what land under the whole heavens, can you find any enactment of equal atrocity to this iniquitous and profligate statute—this "legal presumption" that color is evidence that man, made in the image of God, is an "absconding slave"?

This monstrous doctrine, abhorrent to every manly impulse of the heart, to every Christian sentiment of the soul, to every deduction of human reason which the refined, humane, and Christian people of America have upheld for two generations, which the corporation of Washington enacted into an imperative ordinance has borne its legitimate fruits of injustice and inhumanity, of dishonor and shame. Crimes against man, in the name of this abhorred doctrine, have been annually perpetrated in this national capital which should make the people of America hang their heads in shame before the nations, and in abasement before that Being who keeps watch and ward over the humblest of the children of men. Men and women of African descent, no matter in what State they were born, no matter what rights and privileges they possessed under the laws and institutions of the States from whence they came, have annually been seized, imprisoned, fined, and sometimes sold into perpetual servitude.

This doctrine, that color is presumptive evidence of slavery—this ordinance, consigning its victims to imprisonment, offers a tempting bribe to the base, the selfish, the unprincipled, to become men-stealers and kidnappers. This bribe has converted Government officials, justices of the peace, constables, and police officers into manufacturers of slaves. This bribe has annually filled your jail with its victims, making it the workshop where the selfish, the base, the ignoble have plied their trade in the souls and bodies of men. Hundreds, aye, thousands of men of African descent have been seized, arrested, imprisoned since the District of Columbia became the seat of the national capital.

The men of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania of that generation were responsible before God for these deeds of inhumanity.

But, sir, we of this age in America are not guiltless of like enormities.

Here the Senator referred to the numerous negroes, many of them claiming to be free, that were incarcerated as fugitive slaves in Washington jails as late as the foregoing December.

In this national capital lurks a race of official and unofficial man-hunters, greedy, active, vigilant, dexterous, ever ready by falsehood, trickery, or violence to clutch the hapless black man who carries not with him a title-deed to freedom. Only a few days ago these harpies of the land, more merciless than the wreckers of the seas, pounced upon and hurried to your jail two men your officers in the field had sent to Washington to give important intelligence to your generals. For these deeds of inhumanity and injustice the intelligent, patriotic, and Christian freemen of America are responsible before man and before God! And if we, their representatives, who now for the first time have the power, do not end these crimes against man forever, the guilt and shame will rest upon our souls, and we shall be consigned to the moral indignation of Christendom.

Justice to a wronged and oppressed race demands that this corrupt and corrupting doctrine, that color is presumptive evidence of slavery in the capital of the Republic, shall be condemned, disowned, repudiated by the Government of the United States. For two generations it has pressed with merciless force upon a race who mingled their blood with the blood of our fathers on the stricken fields of the war of independence. In those days of trial black men, animated by the same mighty impulse, fought side by side with our fathers to win for America a place among the nations. They rallied at the tap of the drum on the morning of the 19th of April, 1775, to meet the shock of the first battle of the Revolution. They poured their unerring shots into the bosom of the veteran troops of England as they moved up the slopes of Bunker Hill. They met, and three times, by their steady valor repulsed the charges of British veterans on the battlefield of Rhode Island, which La Fayette pronounced "the best fought battle of the Revolution." They fought and fell by the side of Ledyard at Fort Griswold. They shared in the glorious defence and victory of Red Bank, which will live in our history as long as the Delaware shall flow by the spot made immortal by their valor. They endured with our fathers uncomplainingly the toils and privations of the battlefields and bivouacks of the seven years' campaigns of the Revolution, from Lexington to Yorktown, to found in America a Government which should recognize the rights of human nature. For more than sixty years, unmindful of their rights and ungrateful for their services in our hour of weakness, we have recognized in the capital of the nation the wicked and insulting dogma which writes "slave" on the brow of all who inherit their blood. Let us of this age hasten to atone for this great wrong by erasing that word from the brow of this proscribed race here, and making manhood, here at least, forever hereafter presumptive evidence of freedom.

What wrongs, what outrages may not be perpetrated upon a race of men where "color is legal presumption of slavery," where they "may be arrested as absconding slaves," where their oath cannot be received as "good and valid evidence in law," where "every person seizing and taking up runaways shall receive two hundred pounds of tobacco or the value thereof," where, "if any slave strikes a white person, he may, upon the oath of the person so struck, have one of his ears cropped"? What wrongs, what outrages may not be perpetrated upon a race where, upon "information to any justice of the peace that any free negro or mulatto is going at large without any visible means of subsistence such justice is required to issue his warrant to any constable directing him to apprehend such free negro or mulatto; and, if such free negro or mulatto shall fail to give security for his good behavior, or to leave the State within five days, or if, after leaving the State, he shall return again within six months, such justice may commit said free negro or mulatto to the common jail; and, if such offender so committed shall not, within twenty days thereafter, pay his or her prison charges, the sheriff, with the approbation of any two justices of the peace, may sell such free negro or mulatto to serve six calendar months?"

The speaker here enumerated other oppressive laws against free negroes in the District, such as the punishment by whipping, fine, or imprisonment of frequenters of night assemblies and the fine or imprisonment of negroes found in the streets after 10 p. m.

Since I have held a seat in the Senate I have known colored men, trusted and employed by the Government, while quietly hastening to their homes after ten o'clock from their duties in the public service, to be arrested under color of this ordinance. An ordinance so oppressive, so barbarous should be annulled by the Congress of the United States.

Another act requires every free colored person to furnish the mayor of the city of Washington evidence of his or her title to freedom, and to give bonds annually for his or her orderly conduct, and, failing so to do, to be sent to the workhouse; this places ten thousand free persons of color at the mercy of the corporation officials of this city, who may exercise, under color of this law, the most oppressive acts of petty tyranny.

Another act fines frequenters of religious meetings after 10 p. m.

The Christian men of New England, of the central States, of the West, must not forget that they are not free from responsibility for the existence, in their national capital, of a statute which imposes a fine of five dollars upon Christian men and women who may be found in a religious meeting after the hour of ten o'clock at night; that in the capital of this Christian Republic it is made the duty of police constables, under penalties of fine and disfranchisement, to enter a religious meeting after the hour of ten at night and disperse Christian men and women listening to the story of salvation, or offering up to Him who made the humblest of the race in His own image the praises and gratitude of contrite hearts.

The corporation of the city of Washington, from 1829 to 1841, enacted cruel and brutal laws for the punishment of slaves within the limits of the city by whipping on the bare back for breaking street lamps, exploding fire-crackers, etc.

Do Senators believe that there can be in the laws and ordinances of any Christian nation on the globe enactments so brutal, degrading, inhuman, indecent? It is time these bloody statutes for lashing men and lashing women should be obliterated from the laws and ordinances of the capital city of the Republic.

In spite, however, of these oppressive and cruel enactments which have pressed with merciless force upon the black race, bond and free, slavery, for more than half a century has grown weaker, and the free colored stronger, at every decade. Within the last half century the free colored population of the District of Columbia has increased from four to twelve thousand. In spite of the degrading influences of oppressive statutes, and a perverted public sentiment, this free colored population, as it has increased in numbers, has increased also in property, in churches, schools, and all the means of social, intellectual, and moral development. This despised race, upon which we are wont to look down with emotions of pity, if not of contempt or of hate, are industrious and law-abiding, loyal to the Government and its institutions. To-day the free colored men of the District of Columbia possess hundreds of thousands of dollars of property, the fruits of years of honest toil; they have twelve churches, costing some $75,000, and eight schools for the instruction of their children. They are compelled to pay for the support of public schools for the instruction of the white children from which their own children are excluded by law, custom, and public opinion. Some of these free colored men are distinguished for intelligence, business capacity, and the virtues that grace and adorn men of every race. Some of these men have in possession considerable property, real and personal. The passage of this bill by the Congress of the United States will not, cannot, disturb for a moment the peace, the order, the security of society. Its passage will excite in the bosoms of the enfranchised, not wrath nor hatred nor revenge, but love, joy, and gratitude. These enfranchised bondmen will be welcomed by the free colored population with bounding hearts, throbbing with gratitude to God for inspiring the nation with the justice and the courage to strike the chains from the limbs of their neighbors, friends, relatives, brothers, and lifting from their own shoulders the burdens imposed upon them by the necessities, the passions, and the pride of slaveholding society.

This bill, to give liberty to the bondman, deals justly, ay, generously, by the master. The American people, whose moral sense has been outraged by slavery and the black codes enacted in the interests of slavery in the District of Columbia, whose fame has been soiled and dimmed by the deeds of cruelty perpetrated in their national capital, would stand justified in the forum of nations if they should smite the fetter from the bondman, regardless of the desires or interests of the master. With generous magnanimity this bill tenders compensation to the master out of the earnings of the toiling freemen of America. In the present condition of the country the proposed compensation is full, ample, equitable.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] raises his warning voice against the passage of this measure of justice and beneficence. He assumes to speak like one having authority. He is positive, dogmatic, emphatic, and prophetic. The Senator predicted, in excited, if not angry, tones, that the passage of this bill, giving freedom to three thousand bondmen, will bring into this District beggary and crime, that the "liberated negroes will become a sore, a burden, and a charge"; that they "will be criminals"; that "they will become paupers"; that "they will be engaged in crimes and petty misdemeanors"; that "they will become a charge and a pest upon this society." Assured, confident, defiant, the Senator asserts that "a negro's idea of freedom is freedom from work"; that after they acquire their freedom they become "lazy," "indolent," "thriftless," "worthless," "inefficient," "vicious," "vagabonds."

The Senator from Kentucky, who speaks with so much assurance, may have the right to speak in these terms of emancipated slaves in Kentucky; but he has no authority so to speak of the twelve thousand free colored men of the District of Columbia. Under the weight of oppressive laws and a public opinion poisoned by slavery they have by their industry, their obedience to law, their kindly charities to each other, established a character above such reproaches as the Senator from Kentucky applies to emancipated bondmen.

But the Senator from Kentucky, upon this simple proposition to emancipate in the national capital three thousand bondmen, with compensation to loyal masters, chooses to indulge in the vague talk about "aggressive and destructive schemes," "unconstitutional policy," the "horrors of the French Revolution," the "heroic struggle of the peasants of La Vendée," and the "deadly resistance" which the "whole white population of the slaveholding States, men, women, and children, would make to unconstitutional encroachments." Why, sir, does the Senator indulge in such allusions? Have not the American people the constitutional right to relieve themselves from the guilt and shame of upholding slavery in their national capital? Would not the exercise of that right be sanctioned by justice, humanity, and religion? Does the Senator suppose that we, the representatives of American freemen, will cowardly shrink from the performance of the duties of the hour before these dogmatic avowals of what the men and the women of the slaveholding States will do? Sir, I tell the Senator from Kentucky that the day has passed by in the Senate of the United States for intimidation, threat, or menace, from the champions of slavery.

I would remind the Senator from Kentucky that the people, whose representatives we are, now realize in the storms of battle that slavery is, and must ever be, the relentless and unappeasable enemy of free institutions in America, of the unity and perpetuity of the Republic. Slavery—perverting the reason, blinding the conscience, extinguishing the patriotism of vast masses of its supporters, plunged the nation into the fire and blood of rebellion. The loyal people of America have seen hundreds of thousands of brave men abandon their peaceful avocations, leave their quiet homes and their loved ones, and follow the flag of their country to the field, to do a soldier's duties, and fill, if need be, soldiers' graves, in defence of their periled country; they have seen them fall on fields of bloody strife beneath the folds of the national flag; they have seen them suffering, tortured by wounds or disease, in camps and hospitals; they have seen them return home maimed by shot or shell, or bowed with disease; they have looked with sorrowful hearts upon their passing coffins, and gazed sadly upon their graves among their kindred, or in the land of the stranger; and they know—yes, sir, they know—that slavery has caused all this blood, disease, agony, and death. Realizing all this—ay, sir, knowing all this, they are in no temper to listen to the threats or menaces of apologists or defenders of the wicked and guilty criminal that now stands with uplifted hand to strike a death blow to the national life. While the brave and loyal men of the Republic are facing its shots and shells on the bloody fields their representatives will hardly quail before the frowns and menaces of its champions in these Chambers.

Anthony Kennedy [Md.] opposed the bill on the ground that it would tend to make his State, already containing the highest ratio of free negroes to population of any State in the Union," the great free negro colony of the country."

What must be the embittered state of feeling in Maryland when they find that this Congress, departing from every principle of good faith and of constitutional obligation to the compact of the Union, interferes to throw more of this class of free negroes in direct competition with the white labor of our own State?

Speaking of the proposition of the President for gradual compensated emancipation in Maryland he said that "it would produce an exodus of such of the slaveholding population from my State as can leave, and would force those who cannot emigrate either to manumit or to take the little pittance that is proposed."

But, sir, the worst of it all is that you will produce an exodus of that class of people upon whom the State of Maryland has rested more than all others for her great material prosperity —I mean her great mechanical and manufacturing class. Instead of the city of Baltimore being, as she has been heretofore, the third commercial emporium of this country, I fear that the day is to come when the grass may grow in her streets and her vessels lie rotting at her wharves.

This Government was created to promote domestic tranquility and to insure the general welfare. The passage of this bill does not promote either the general welfare or insure the domestic tranquility of my State; it will create strife in our borders as a forerunner of that other question, which is shortly to become a leading and important question in the future discussions and organizations of parties, and that is the emancipation policy of the President. You can show me no possible way by which emancipation can be effected without colonization. If you do not carry with emancipation colonization at the same time, if you emancipate these eighty-seven thousand slaves in the State of Maryland, making one hundred and seventy-five thousand colored people to remain there, one race or the other will ultimately perish; and scenes of blood and carnage that we have little idea of will result from it.

Sir, I am constrained to submit to the people of Maryland, if this measure passes, how far good faith has been kept with their trusting confidence; how far their honor and devotion to principle have been respected in the taunts and low flings which have been made at various times in both branches of Congress against their loyalty to constitutional obligations. Sir, I may speak warmly, for I feel deeply. I feel that whatever of consideration my State has had heretofore she has lost it; that while we of Maryland avoided the rock of secession, still clinging to the Constitution upon which we were embarked, we may find ourselves fast drifting into the dark and overwhelming whirlpool of a relentless, unyielding, and reckless sectional policy, which will end forever, in my humble judgment, the last hope of bringing together the dismembered and broken ties that bound this great and prosperous nation in one fraternal bond of union and power? In the name of my State I protest against this measure.

Willard Saulsbury [Del.], referring to Northern missionaries going to Port Royal, S. C. (captured by the Federal army and navy), and these embracing the negroes as brothers and sisters, said Senators should carry their principles to the logical conclusions and take negroes to their bosoms.

James Harlan [Ia.] opposed the charge that miscegenation would result from emancipation, or that the white people would rise and murder the freedmen. He therefore opposed colonization.

Do you find white gentlemen and white ladies marrying the free negroes that are now in this District? Do Senators find that the amalgamation of the white and the negro race is in progress in the States they represent? And, if so, does it progress more rapidly in the free than in the slave States? I have known of but three cases in my own State, and all three of those men married to wenches have been residents of slave States, where, I doubt not, they acquired their tastes. [Laughter.] Liberating the negroes carries with it no obligation to marry their wenches to white men. Gentlemen may follow their tastes afterward as now.

It is here in a slave District and in the slave States that men learn to associate familiarly as laborers and mechanics with the colored population; and, as a result of that familiar association at the daily toils of life, there is less reluctance at receiving them into their embrace, so handsomely described by the Senator from Delaware but a moment since. You will find in every slaveholding community a much larger number of mulattoes than in the free States.

But, then, what is to be done with these fifteen hundred liberated slaves? If they are to be liberated we are told they must be expatriated; they must be sent into some other country, into a strange community, and there compelled to provide in a land of strangers for the supply of their daily wants? Where are they now? In the bosom of the families of this metropolis. They are the house servants and the field hands of those who now claim to be their owners. Whence, then, a necessity for expatriating them? It does not increase their number to liberate them. If their labor is now necessary for the industrial purposes and comfort of the people of this District, will it not be as necessary after they shall have been liberated? If they are now needed as house servants and hotel servants, laborers and mechanics, in shops and fields, will they not be as necessary afterward? The only change in this regard that I can perceive is that after their liberation, those who now enjoy their labor gratuitously will, if their services are continued, be compelled to pay them reasonable compensation, the Government paying them a bonus of $300 each to relinquish the supposed right to their labor without the payment of wages. This is the only wrong that will have been inflicted on those who now own them. They now employ them, and give them food and raiment and shelter for their services, without reference to their own wishes, coercing obedience with the lash when found necessary. Afterward they will be compelled to consult the will and wishes of the employed, and to pay them probably stipulated wages, with which the servant will provide his own supplies. No injury is inflicted on society, no change is wrought on its organization, and no change is made in the political condition of the emancipated. They will have acquired no political rights or franchises. They will have acquired simply the right to enjoy as they choose the proceeds of their own labor. But if you confer this right on fifteen hundred more negroes now slaves in this District, we are gravely warned by Senators, in most eloquent and pathetic strains, that we will thus inaugurate a war of extermination between the white and black race! Rather than pay the negroes just compensation for their services their former masters, who have lived on the proceeds of their unpaid toil, will take down their rifles and shoot them! A war of extermination is to arise!

It is declared on the floor of the American Senate, in the face of a Christian nation, that, if men are to be liberated from a slavery that is more galling and degrading than any that has ever existed on the face of the earth from the commencement of time down to this moment, the people will rise and murder the poor freedmen. Senators say so without expressing so much as a regret. They thus approve and justify this savage feeling—if it exists; but, sir, it does not exist; I will defend the people of Kentucky, of Maryland, of Delaware, and of this District from any such slanderous aspersion. They entertain no such purpose on their part as the indiscriminate murder of the colored population, if they should become free. I doubt not but that the public sentiment that now exists, induced by the slaveholders themselves, in the State to which I have referred, is bitterly opposed to the liberation of the slaves; but if these slaves should be set free it will be effected by their own legislatures; and, if thus set free, no such savage war would arise.

You say that if two races are thrown together as freemen they will necessarily engender a war of extermination. Such a war never did commence between two races of free people; and, until the laws of the human mind and the human heart change, never will. To say that men of different, so called, races are natural enemies to each other, and will commence and wage a war of extermination when brought into contact, is a libel on humanity. It is a libel on the Author of the human race. The Almighty never implanted such feelings in the human heart. They never have been cultivated by an enlightened people. Wars of extermination exist only among savages; and with them only between belligerent tribes.

On March 31 Charles Sumner [Mass.] made an exhaustive and carefully prepared speech on the bill.

Mr. President, with unspeakable delight I hail this measure and the prospect of its speedy adoption. It is the first installment of that great debt which we all owe to an enslaved race, and will be recognized in history as one of the victories of humanity. At home, throughout our own country, it will be welcomed with gratitude; while abroad it will quicken the hopes of all who love freedom.

In early discussions of this question it was part of the tactics of slavery to claim absolute immunity. Indeed, without such immunity it had small chance of continued existence. Such a wrong, so utterly outrageous, could find safety only where it was protected from inquiry. Therefore, slave masters always insisted that petitions against its existence at the national capital were not to be received; that it was unconstitutional to touch it even here within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress; and that, if it were touched, it should be only under the auspices of the neighboring States of Virginia and Maryland. On these points elaborate arguments were constructed; but it were useless to consider them now. Whatever may be the opinions of individual Senators the judgment of the country is fixed. The right of petition, first vindicated by the matchless perseverance of John Quincy Adams, is now beyond question, and the constitutional power of Congress is hardly less free from doubt. It is enough to say on this point that, if Congress cannot abolish slavery here, then there is no power anywhere to abolish it here, and this wrong will endure always, immortal as the capital itself.

But as the moment of justice approaches we are called to meet a different objection, inspired by generous sentiments. It is urged that since there can be no such thing as property in man, especially within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, therefore all now held as slaves at the national capital are justly entitled to freedom, without price or compensation of any kind to their masters; or, at least, that any money paid should be distributed according to an account stated between masters and slaves. Of course, if this question were determined according to divine justice, so far as we may be permitted to look in that direction, it is obvious that nothing can be due to the masters, and that any money paid belongs rather to the slaves, who for generations have been despoiled of every right and possession. But, if we undertake to audit this fearful account, pray what sum shall be allowed for the prolonged torments of the lash? What treasure shall be voted to the slave for wife ravished from his side, for children stolen, for knowledge shut out, and for all the fruits of labor wrested from him and his fathers? No such account can be stated. It is impossible. If you once begin the inquiry all must go to the slave. It only remains for Congress, anxious to secure this great boon, and unwilling to embarass or jeopard it, to act practically according to its finite powers, in the light of existing usages, and even existing prejudices, under which these odious relations have assumed the form of law; nor must we hesitate at any forbearance or sacrifice, provided freedom can be established without delay.

The clear-headed Senator from Kansas [Mr. Pomeroy] has asked, first, has slavery any constitutional existence at the national capital? and, secondly, shall money be paid to secure its abolition? The answer to these two inquiries will make our duty clear. If slavery has no constitutional existence here, then more than ever is Congress bound to interfere, even with money; for the scandal must be peremptorily stopped, without any postponement or any consultation of the people on a point which is not within their power.

It may be said that, whether slavery be constitutional or not, nevertheless it exists, and therefore this inquiry is superfluous. True, it exists as a monstrous fact; but it is none the less important to consider its origin, that we may understand how, assuming the form of law, it was able to shelter itself beneath the protecting shield of the Constitution.

It is true, there can be no such thing as property in man. If this pretension is recognized anywhere it is only another instance of the influence of custom, which is so powerful as to render the idolator insensible to the wickedness of idolatry, and the cannibal insensible to the brutality of cannibalism. To argue against such a pretension seems to be vain; for the pretension exists in open defiance of reason as well as of humanity. It will not yield to argument; nor will it yield to persuasion. It must be encountered by authority. It was not the planters in the British islands or in the French islands who organized emancipation, but the distant governments across the sea, far removed from the local prejudices, who at last forbade the outrage. Had these planters been left to themselves they would have clung to this pretension as men among us still cling to it. Of course, in making this declaration against the idea of property in man, I say nothing new. An honored Senator from Maryland, whose fame as a statesman was eclipsed, perhaps, by his more remarkable fame as a lawyer—I mean William Pinkney, whom Chief Justice Marshall called the undoubted head of the American bar—in a speech before the Maryland House of Delegates, spoke as statesman and lawyer when he said:

> "Sir, by the eternal principles of natural justice no master in the State has a right to hold his slaves in bondage for a single hour."

And Henry Brougham spoke not only as statesman and lawyer, but as orator also, when, in the British Parliament, he uttered these memorable words:

> "Tell me not of rights—talk not of the property of the planter in his slaves. I deny the right—I acknowledge not the property. The principles, the feelings of our common nature, rise in rebellion against it. Be the appeal made to the understanding or to the heart, the sentence is the same that rejects it. In vain you tell me of laws that sanction such a claim. There is a law above all the enactments of human codes—the same throughout the world, the same in all times: it is the law written by the finger of God on the heart of man; and by that law, unchangeable and eternal, while men despise fraud and loathe rapine and abhor blood they will reject with indignation the wild and guilty phantasy that man can hold property in man."

It has often been said that the finest sentence of the English language is that famous description of law with which Hooker closes the first book of his "Ecclesiastical Polity"; but I cannot doubt that this wonderful denunciation of an irrational and inhuman pretension will be remembered hereafter with higher praise; for it gathers into surpassing eloquence the growing and immitigable instincts of universal man.

Of course, here in the national capital, which is under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, the force which now maintains this unnatural system is supplied by Congress. Therefore does it behoove Congress to act in order to relieve itself of this painful responsibility.

But this responsibility becomes more painful when it is considered that slavery exists at the national capital absolutely without support of any kind in the Constitution. Nor is this all. Situated within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitution, where State rights cannot prevail, it exists in open defiance of most cherished principles. Let the Constitution be rightly interpreted by a just tribunal, and slavery must cease here at once. The decision of a court would be as potent as an act of Congress. If authority could add to the force of irresistible argument it would be found in the well-known opinion of the late Mr. Justice McLean, in a published letter, declaring the constitutional impossibility of slavery in the national Territories, because, in the absence of express power under the Constitution to establish or recognize slavery, there was nothing for the breath of slavery, as respiration could not exist where there was no atmosphere. The learned judge was right, and his illustration was felicitous. Although applied at the time only to the Territories, it is of equal force everywhere within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress; for within such jurisdiction there is no atmosphere in which slavery can live.

Under the Constitution Congress has "exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever" at the national capital. But Congress can exercise no power except in conformity with the Constitution. Now, looking at the Constitution, we shall find, first, that there are no words authorizing Congress to establish or recognize slavery; and, secondly, that there are positive words which prohibit Congress from the exercise of any such power. The argument, therefore, is twofold: first, from the absence of authority, and, secondly, from positive prohibition.

Of course, a barbarism like slavery, having its origin in force, and nothing else, can have no legal or constitutional support except from positive sanction. It can spring from no doubtful phrase. It must be declared by unambiguous words incapable of a double sense. In asserting this principle I simply follow Lord Mansfield, who, in the memorable case of Sommersett, said: "The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law. It is so odious that nothing can be suffered to support it but positive law." (Howell's "State Trials," Vol. 20, p. 82.) This principle has been adopted by tribunals even in slaveholding States. (See Horey vs. Decker, Walker's R., 42; Rankin vs. Lydier, 2 Marshall, 470.) But I do not stop to dwell on these authorities. Even the language, "exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever," cannot be made to sanction slavery. It wants those positive words, leaving nothing to implication, which are obviously required, especially when we consider the professed object of the Constitution, as declared in its preamble, "to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty." There is no power in the Constitution to make a king, or, thank God, to make a slave, and the absence of all such power is hardly more clear in one case than in the other. The word king nowhere occurs in the Constitution, nor does the word slave. But, if there be no such power, then all acts of Congress sustaining slavery at the national capital must be unconstitutional and void. The stream cannot rise higher than the fountain head; nay, more, nothing can come out of nothing; and, if there be nothing in the Constitution authorizing Congress to make a slave, there can be nothing valid in any subordinate legislation. It is a pretension which has thus far prevailed simply because slavery predominated over Congress and courts.

To all who insist that Congress may sustain slavery in the national capital I put the question, where in the Constitution is the power found? If you cannot show where, do not assert the power. So hideous an effrontery must be authorized in unmistakable words. Do not insult human nature by pretending that its most cherished rights can be sacrificed without solemn authority. Remember that every presumption and every leaning must be in favor of freedom and against slavery. Do not forget that no nice interpretation, no strained construction, no fancied deduction, can suffice to sanction the enslavement of our fellowmen. And do not degrade the Constitution by foisting into its blameless text the idea of property in man. It is not there; and if you think you see it there, it is simply because you make the Constitution a reflection of yourself.

A single illustration will show the absurdity of this pretension. If under the clause which gives to Congress "exclusive legislation" at the national capital slavery may be established, if under these words Congress is empowered to create slaves instead of citizens, then, under the same words, it may do the same thing in "the forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings" belonging to the United States, wherever situated, for these are all placed within the same "exclusive legislation." The extensive navy-yard at Charlestown, in the very shadow of Bunker Hill, may be filled with slaves, whose enforced toil shall take the place of that cheerful, well-paid labor whose busy hum is the best music of the place. Such an act, however consistent with slaveholding tyranny, would not be regarded as constitutional near Bunker Hill.

A court properly inspired, and ready to assume that just responsibility which dignifies judicial tribunals, would at once declare slavery impossible at the national capital, and set every slave free—as Lord Mansfield declared slavery impossible in England, and set every slave free.[1] The two cases are parallel; but, alas! the court is wanting here. But the good work which courts have thus far declined remains to be done by Congress.

But the question is asked, shall we vote money for this purpose? I cannot hesitate. And here there are two considerations, which with me are prevailing. First, the relation of master and slave at the national capital has from the beginning been established and maintained by Congress, everywhere in sight, and even directly under its own eyes. The master held the slave; but Congress, with strong arm, stood behind the master, looking on and sustaining him. Not a dollar of wages has been taken, not a child has been stolen, not a wife has been torn from her husband, without the hand of Congress. If not a partnership, there was a complicity on the part of Congress, through which the whole country has become responsible for the manifold wrong. Though always protesting against its continuance, and laboring earnestly for its removal, yet gladly do I now accept my share of the promised burden. And, secondly, even if we are not all involved in the manifold wrong, nothing is clearer than that the mode proposed is the gentlest, quietest, and surest in which the beneficent change can be accomplished. It is, therefore, the most practical. It recognizes slavery as an existing fact and provides for its removal. And when I think of the unquestionable good which we seek; of all its advantages and glories; of the national capital redeemed; of the national character elevated; and of a manganimous example which can never die; and when I think, still further, that, according to a rule alike of jurisprudence and morals, liberty is priceless, I cannot hesitate at any appropriation within our means by which all these things of incalculable value can be promptly secured.

Let this bill pass, and the first practical triumph of freedom, for which good men have longed, dying without the sight—for which a whole generation has petitioned, and for which orators and statesmen have pleaded—will at last be accomplished. Slavery will be banished from the national capital. This metropolis, which bears a venerated name, will be purified; its evil spirit will be cast out; its shame will be removed; its society will be refined; its courts will be made better; its revolting ordinances will be swept away; and even its loyalty will be secured. If not moved by justice to the slave, then be willing to act for your own good and in self-defence. If you hesitate to pass this bill for the blacks, then pass it for the whites. Nothing is clearer than that the degradation of slavery affects the master as much as the slave; while recent events testify that, wherever slavery exists, there treason lurks, if it does not flaunt. From the beginning of this rebellion slavery has been constantly manifest in the conduct of the masters, and even here in the national capital it has been the traitorous power which has encouraged and strengthened the enemy. This power must be suppressed at every cost, and, if its suppression here endangers slavery elsewhere, there will be a new motive for determined action.

Amid all present solicitudes the future cannot be doubtful. At the national capital slavery will give way to freedom; but the good work will not stop here. It must proceed. What God and nature decree rebellion cannot arrest. And as the whole widespread tyranny begins to tumble, then, above the din of battle, sounding from the sea and echoing along the land, above even the exultations of victory on well-fought fields, will ascend voices of gladness and benediction, swelling from generous hearts wherever civilization bears sway, to commemorate a sacred triumph, whose trophies, instead of tattered banners, will be ransomed slaves.

The bill was passed on April 3 by 29 yeas to 14 nays, the Senators from the border and Pacific States and Joseph A. Wright of Indiana voting in the negative.

The bill was sent to the House and there debated on April 10-11, the discussion including the right of secession, the power of Congress to confiscate property and to emancipate slaves in the seceded States.

Judge Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.], a conservative Republican, was the leading speaker on these subjects. He delivered a profound legal argument showing that there could be no secession of States, but only of citizens, and that the acts of these were rebellion and not war; that confiscation of the property of the rebels was unconstitutional, unjust, and impolitic; and that emancipation of slaves could be justified only as a military necessity.

The bill was passed upon this day (April 11), and signed by the President on April 16. In his message to the House communicating his act the President said:

I have never doubted the constitutional authority of Congress to abolish slavery in this District, and I have ever desired to see the national capital freed from the institution in some satisfactory way. Hence there has never been in my mind any question upon the subject, except the one of expediency, arising in view of all the circumstances. I am gratified that the two principles of compensation and colonization are both recognized and practically applied in the act.

One curious result of the act was that under it a District negro (free) claimed and received compensation for his wife and their six children, whom he had previously purchased from their white master.

Compensated Emancipation

The President's Special Message Proposing a Bill for Compensated Emancipation in States so Desiring It—His Conference with Border State Delegates—Roscoe Conkling [N. Y.] Introduces the Bill in the House—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Conkling, John A. Bingham [O.], Alexander S. Diven [N. Y.], Abraham R. Olin [N. Y.], Owen Lovejoy [Ill.], Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.], and John Hickman [Pa.] Supporting the Bill under Protest; Opposed, William A. Richardson [Ill.], Charles A. Wickliffe [Ky.], Daniel W. Voorhees [Ind.], John J. Crittenden [Ky.]—Bill Passed—It Is Introduced in the Senate—Debate: in Favor, Lot M. Merrill [Me.], John B. Henderson [Mo.], John Sherman [O.]; Opposed, Willard Saulsbury [Del.], James A. McDougall [Cal.], Lazarus W. Powell [Ky.]—The Bill Is Passed—Debate in the House on Abolition of Slavery in the Territories: in Favor, Isaac N. Arnold [Ill.], Owen Lovejoy [Ill.]; Opposed, Samuel S. Cox [O.], John W. Crisfield [Md.], Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.]—Bill Becomes Law—The President Appeals to the Border States to Accept Compensated Emancipation—Results of Federal and State Action in Regard to Compensated Emancipation.

DURING the debates on abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia the President sent a special message to Congress on compensated emancipation in the States so desiring it.

Compensated Emancipation

Special Message of President Lincoln, March 6, 1862

I recommend the adoption of a joint resolution by your honorable bodies, which shall be substantially as follows:

"Resolved, That the United States ought to coöperate with any State which may adopt gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State pecuniary aid, to be used by such State, in its discretion, to compensate for the inconveniences, public and private, produced by such change of system."

If the proposition contained in the resolution does not meet the approval of Congress and the country, there is the end; but if it does command such approval I deem it of importance that the States and people immediately interested should be at once distinctly notified of the fact, so that they may begin to consider whether to accept or reject it.

The Federal Government would find its highest interest in such a measure, as one of the most efficient means of self-preservation. The leaders of the existing insurrection entertain the hope that this Government will ultimately be forced to acknowledge the independence of some part of the disaffected region, and that all the slave States north of such part will then say, "The Union for which we have struggled being already gone, we now choose to go with the Southern section." To deprive them of this hope substantially ends the rebellion; and the initiation of emancipation completely deprives them of it as to all the States initiating it.

The point is not that the States tolerating slavery would very soon, if at all, initiate emancipation; but, that while the offer is equally made to all, the more Northern shall, by such initiation, make it certain to the more Southern that in no event will the former ever join the latter in their proposed confederacy. I say "initiation" because, in my judgment, gradual and not sudden emancipation is better for all. In the mere financial or pecuniary view any member of Congress, with the census tables and treasury reports before him, can readily see for himself how very soon the current expenditures of this war would purchase, at fair valuation, all the slaves in any named State. Such a proposition on the part of the general Government sets up no claim of a right by Federal authority to interfere with slavery within State limits, referring, as it does, the absolute control of the subject in each case to the State and its people immediately interested. It is proposed as a matter of perfectly free choice with them.

In the annual message, last December, I thought fit to say, "The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed." I said this not hastily, but deliberately. War has been made, and continues to be, an indispensable means to this end. A practical reacknowledgment of the national authority would render the war unnecessary, and it would at once cease. If, however, resistance continues, the war must also continue; and it is impossible to foresee all the incidents which may attend and all the ruin which may follow it. Such as may seem indispensable, or may obviously promise great efficiency, toward ending the struggle, must and will come.

The proposition now made, though an offer only, I hope it may be esteemed no offence to ask whether the pecuniary consideration tendered would not be of more value to the States and private persons concerned than are the institution and property in it, in the present aspect of affairs?

While it is true that the adoption of the proposed resolution would be merely initiatory, and not within itself a practical measure, it is recommended in the hope that it would soon lead to important practical results. In full view of my great responsibility to my God and to my country, I earnestly beg the attention of Congress and the people to the subject.

Lincoln's Conference on Compensated Emancipation with Border State Delegates

On March 10 the President held a conference with delegates from the border slave States. One of the delegates, John W. Crisfield [Md.], reported the substance of the conference.

The President disclaimed any intent to injure the interests or wound the sensibilities of the slave States. On the contrary, he declared that his purpose was to protect the one and respect the other. We were, he said, engaged in a terrible, wasting, and tedious war; immense armies were in the field, and must continue there as long as the war should last; these armies came of necessity into contact with slaves in the States we represented, and, as they advanced, would be brought into contact with the slaves of other States. Slaves came, and would continue to come, to the camps, thus keeping up continual irritation. He was constantly annoyed by conflicting and antagonistic complaints. On the one side a certain class complained if the slave was not protected by the army; persons were frequently found who, participating in these views, acted in a way unfriendly to the slaveholder. On the other hand, slaveholders complained that their rights were interfered with, their slaves were induced to abscond and were protected within the lines. These complaints were numerous, loud, and deep. They were a serious annoyance to him, and embarrassing to the progress of the war. They kept alive a spirit hostile to the Government in the States we represented; they strengthened the hopes of the Confederates that at some day the border States would unite with them, and thus tend to prolong the war; and he was of opinion, if this resolution should be adopted by Congress and accepted by our States, that these causes of irritation and these hopes would be removed, and more would be accomplished toward shortening the war than could be hoped from the greatest victory achieved by Union armies. He made this proposition in good faith, and desired it to be accepted, if at all, voluntarily, and in the same patriotic spirit in which it was made. Emancipation was a subject exclusively under the control of the States, and must be adopted or rejected by each for itself; he did not claim, nor had this Government any right, to coerce them for that purpose.

The President disclaimed that he had any ulterior purpose, such as emancipation by Federal authority. He should lament the refusal of the States to accept compensated emancipation, but had no designs beyond their refusal.

In respect to the constitutionality of the proposition he said that it presented no difficulties, proposing as it did simply to cooperate with any State by giving it pecuniary aid. It was the expression of a sentiment, rather than the presentation of a constitutional issue. In any scheme to get rid of slavery the North as well as the South was morally bound to do its equal share. He thought that the institution was wrong and that it ought never to have existed; but yet he recognized the rights of property which had grown out of it, and he would respect those rights as fully as similar rights in any other property; he recognized that property can exist, and does legally exist, in slavery; he would get rid of the odious law, not by violating the right, but by encouraging the proposition and offering inducements to give it up.

Compensated Emancipation

House of Representatives, March 10-11, 1862

On March 10 Roscoe Conkling [N. Y.] introduced the President's bill in the House. He said:

This resolution is in the exact words of the President of the United States, as sent here with the message in which he recommends its passage. It relates to a subject in regard to which almost every member, if not every one, has made up his mind; and those who have not made up their minds will not have their conclusions settled by any discussion which may occur on this resolution.

William A. Richardson [Dem.], of Illinois, replied:

The gentleman from New York says that we ought to have our minds made up on the subject of this resolution. Why, sir, there is no subject which will engage the attention of this Congress of more magnitude. I venture to say that not one half of the members on this side of the House have had time to consider it. We have had no time to communicate with our people.

But I am prepared to say one thing in regard to that message of the President. So far as it recommends the doctrine of the rights of the States in this matter I recognize its force. My objection to it is not of that character; I object to it upon another ground altogether. I do not believe my people are prepared to enter upon this proposed work of purchasing the slaves of other people and turning them loose in our midst. I have long entertained the idea that this class of negroes in our country are incapable of becoming the repository of freedom or government.

In reference to another point embraced in that message I have but a single word to offer. Without the Constitution and the Union there is no liberty—no government—and whatever stands in the way of their preservation I am prepared to strike down or to yield up. Whatever stands in the way of our Government and its integrity must be destroyed. But I do not propose to go beyond the Constitution. I do not know why a single article of property should be singled out and made an exception.

But, sir, I am satisfied that gentlemen are not prepared to vote upon this question to-day. It is a subject which requires consideration; and I move, therefore, that it be postponed to this day week.

John A. Bingham [O.].—I hope the motion to postpone will not prevail. If gentlemen propose to entertain the proposition of the President they can have but little, if any, difficulty in coming to a just conclusion upon it, as it involves no principle save the power of the Government of the United States to contribute in aid of the gradual abolition of slavery in any State which, of its own motion, may initiate that policy. That is all there is of the resolution.

The President has told us that he deems it important, if the resolution meets the approval of Congress, that the people immediately interested should be at once distinctly notified of the fact, so that they may begin to consider whether they will accept or reject the proposition. The adoption of the resolution imposes upon no State any obligation to act in the premises. It interferes with no right of any State by intendment or otherwise.

CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE [Ky.].—The gentleman is learned in the Constitution of the United States. Will he tell me under what clause of the Constitution he finds the power in Congress to appropriate the treasure of the United States to buy negroes, or to set them free? Is it under the head of "the general welfare"?

MR. BINGHAM.—I supposed, Mr. Speaker, that that question was settled long ago by those who made the Constitution. If the gentleman will pardon me, I beg leave to remind him again of the words of Madison, that "It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation. It is worse than in vain!"

And, says Hamilton:

"Congress have an unlimited discretion to make requisitions of men and money."

DANIEL W. VOORHEES [Dem.], of Indiana.—I shall vote against any postponement of this question. I, for one, as a member of this House, am fully prepared to act upon it now. If this measure is to be pressed, and to become a part of the policy of the Government, I think it is right and proper that the people should know it soon; that, while groaning under almost untold burdens, while trembling under the weight of taxation upon their shoulders, if this additional burden is to come upon them they may prepare in season their sad and oppressed hearts and almost broken bodies to bear it.

I will say one thing further: that if there is any border slave State man here who is in doubt whether he wants his State to sell its slaves to this Government or not, I represent a people that is in no doubt as to whether they want to become the purchasers. It takes two to make a bargain; and I repudiate, once and forever, for the people whom I represent on this floor, any part or parcel in such a contract. Slavery, wherever it exists under the Constitution, I and my constituents will recognize and respect in its legal rights; the slave trade, either domestic or foreign, we are opposed to, and it is no favorite of the Constitution. If emancipation means taxation on the free States, now lavishing their all for the Union and the Constitution, and ever ready to do so, I am opposed to that cause; and I here take my stand in the name of the people I represent against it.

Thaddeus Stevens [Rep.], of Pennsylvania, was in favor of postponing the bill in order to give every member time to consider it.

I have read it over; and I confess I have not been able to see what makes one side so anxious to pass it or the other side so anxious to defeat it. I think it is about the most diluted, milk and water gruel proposition that was ever given to the American nation. [Laughter.] The only reason I can discover why any gentleman should wish to postpone this measure is for the purpose of having a chemical analysis made to see whether there is any poison in it. [Laughter.]

The House adjourned with the motion to postpone the bill before it. The discussion was resumed on the following day (March 11). The motion to postpone was decided in the negative—yeas, 67; nays, 71.

Charles A. Wickliffe [Ky.] opposed the bill on constitutional grounds, stating that the only color of its justification was to be found in the "general welfare" clause in the preamble of the Constitution.

Under this pretence of power, Congress might think that it would be advancing the interests of the general Government to dot the whole country over with turnpikes, railroads, and bridges, or with schools and colleges, or to do anything or everything that a legislative body, unrestrained by a constitution, may do for the benefit of the people. I thought that this idea of a general welfare power had long since been exploded by our statesmen and jurists and courts whenever it was attempted to be asserted in the State or Federal tribunals. If you were to allow that to be taken as a granting power in the Constitution, then there is no limit to which the Federal Government or Congress may not go.

But we are told that this measure is to be consummated under the war power. It is alleged that we are now in a state of war, and we are told that the Constitution is, therefore, to be disregarded. It is said that whatever is necessary to carry on this war to a successful conclusion may be done with perfect freedom under the license and authority, not of the Constitution, but as a military necessity. I deny that a state of war, and especially the present state of war, enlarges the power of Congress. What will be the result of that military necessity which, it is said, enables us to lay aside the Constitution? What is it, and what has caused this line of executive and military action? I greatly fear there are many who desire more the emancipation of the slaves of the South than the restoration of the Union of the States. If it had not been for that strong desire I think that we would never have heard of this military-necessity power.

I suspect, sir, that these old-fashioned opinions of mine may be taken as evidence of my want of loyalty. I have not as yet seen any necessity why we should violate the Constitution in order that we should do what is required of us, and that is to furnish the men and money necessary to the restoration of the Union—I deny that a state of war increases or enlarges the powers of Congress.

Furthermore, the proposition is unwise. If the measures which now seem to be the particular and favorite ones urged to our consideration shall be carried out, if you proclaim to these people extermination or subjugation, and the confiscation of private property, you will have a war that will last longer than the life of any man upon this floor. You may conquer battles, and gain victories; but you will not in that way secure the re-establishment of the Government and the restoration of the Union. How do you expect to maintain the Union and to re-establish the laws of the United States over the seceded States? How do you expect to induce the people of those States to aid and assist you in the restoration of the Union and of the Government? How do you expect to do that if you drive every man from his homestead under the threat you make here of utter destruction or subjugation? You destroy all hope of peace. Leave the peaceful non-combatants at rest; let them know that they have the pledge of their security by this Government. If that be done, when the war is over you will find a nucleus of Union men in the slave States around which the inhabitants of those States can rally, and then the Union may be restored. But if they are to be alarmed by threats of confiscation of estates of non-combatants, then their homesteads will be abandoned and burned either by themselves or the enemy. You see already the madness of the leaders of the rebellion. They urge the population of the South to burn their homesteads, and to destroy all their crops, in order to keep them out of the possession of what they term their enemies. You have taken possession of a portion of the South. I was glad when I heard of it. You have alarmed the population. They have now run off and left their slaves unprotected. What is proposed here? One gentleman has proposed that we shall have a land office in the South, and that the lands of the nabobs shall be distributed to the slaves that have been abandoned. There are other projects equally as absurd, and in violation of the laws of civilized war.

Suppose you emancipate the whole of the black population of the Southern seceded States, something over three millions, what do you intend to do with them? Have you provided any colony to which you can send them? Do you intend to leave them in the South where they are? Or do you intend to locate them in the free States? One plan was before us, I think, in a bill this morning. It is proposed that the Congress of the United States shall open cotton plantations in the South, upon lands now in the possession of the army. Is that a military necessity? Is it a military necessity that we should employ, at the public expense, many agents (I do not know that they are called overseers, as they are in the South; that would not sound well), sub-agents or superintendents? They are none of them to be called overseers, that would sound too much like the agent of a Southern slaveholder. There was a peculiar provision in it—this bill to which I refer. They were to force these creatures to work —they were to use "humane and Christian force," I believe. What do you mean by that? You are to send a parcel of men to superintend the negroes on the cotton plantations as overseers for the United States.

I ask the gentlemen who are advocating these propositions if it is a "military necessity" that this Government, with a debt now of upward of seven hundred millions of dollars, should commence the business of cotton planting in South Carolina and Georgia or elsewhere? I ask where are the power and authority in the Government of the United States to go into the business of farming—for it amounts to that practically? Where is the authority for the Government of the United States to send a parcel of men South to engage in the business of cotton-growing who, when they get there, will know as much about raising cotton as I do about preaching the Gospel, and not as much, for I have heard the Gospel preached, and they never saw a stalk of cotton growing. [Laughter.] If you carry out your plan it will be the finest position for one of your modern honest men to steal that you can find in the United States, not excepting army contracts.

What is to be the effect of this resolution upon the war? There seems to be an intimation, if I understand it, that there is danger that the border slave States, as they are termed, unless this measure shall be inaugurated, may wish to join the slave States of the South, not while the war is going on, but when the Southern Confederacy, composed of the cotton States, shall have gained its independence. Sir, I can see how this message of the President and the vote of this House may be understood abroad greatly to our prejudice. The inference will be inevitably drawn there that you from the North who advocate this resolution look to the utter impossibility of carrying out your favorite scheme of emancipation and confiscation, and the liberation of the slaves of the South; that you do not desire Union until slavery is abolished; and that you are willing to give up the cotton States, provided you can get the border States to emancipate their slaves.

In Kentucky and all these border States the great difficulty that we have had to encounter from the influence of the South, and those of our own citizens who acted with the South, was to convince them that the Federal Government did not mean to interfere with slavery. I do not mean this to apply to the man alone who owns the slave; for it is a strange fact that the non-slaveholding portion of the population are most against emancipation.

The speaker concluded with declarations of the Administration, Congress, and the officers of the army, made at the beginning of difficulties and up to this time, that the war, being forced upon the United States, is to be prosecuted for the maintenance of the Constitution and the restoration of the Union as it was. He said:

To give it now a different purpose, to wage it for the destruction of the States, the abolition of slavery, would be a fraud so infamous that it would call down upon its authors the anathemas of all good and honest men.

Alexander S. Diven [N. Y.] believed that the reason which urged the President to his recommendation was that President Jefferson Davis of the Confederacy had issued a proclamation implying that the Confederate forces would be concentrated for the defence of the cotton States, and that the border States would be abandoned to the Union, thus inducing the United States Government to acknowledge the independence of the cotton States.

The rebels, he said, hugged the idea that we care but little for these States, if we could only get the border States—the most valuable in a commercial point of view—and believe that with the Union thus broken, with that holy devotion broken which the whole country has ever had for the Union of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, the loyalty for the Union would be broken. It was then hoped that a petty annoyance would be waged against the border States until they would be driven, one by one, to join that confederation of the Gulf States. They would thus add to their power, and secure what they now find they cannot secure by force of arms. Seeing that they were clinging to that hope, the President is desirous to strip them of their last hope of refuge, and to show them that, even though they should succeed in their rebellion, they will be disappointed in their expectation of drawing the border States with them. Disappointed in it by this, by a noble, just, fair proposition upon the part of the Government not to interfere with any of the reserved rights of these States; not, under the Constitution or above the Constitution, to meddle with any of their institutions; not to assume to pass laws, if we have the right to pass them, which could interfere with their reserved rights; but a magnanimous proposition to them, that if they would stand by the Union no injustice should be done to them. If the possession of their slaves should become intolerable they might have an opportunity to rid themselves of them without crushing them out and breaking them down. In a spirit of magnanimity the President of the United States recommended that this Congress should adopt this resolution, looking to an ultimate resort in case any of the States at any time find it necessary, for the protection of their rights, to adopt that ultimate resort.

When they pass a law for the emancipation of their slaves, if they ever do pass such an act, they will make it conditional that Congress shall pay a portion of the loss. If that condition be not complied with they lose nothing by their law. If it be complied with by Congress they gain. There is, I repeat, no tampering with their rights, no infringement upon their rights.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] has thought proper in the discussion of this proposition to refer to the expense that would be incurred. Why, sir, half a day's expense of this war will pay for the emancipation of all the slaves in Delaware. The cost of sustaining this war for half a month will pay for the emancipation of all the slaves in Kentucky. The cost of maintaining this war for a month would pay for the emancipation of the slaves in Missouri and Kentucky. And if we can cut off from these rebels their last hope, and in my judgment this is their last hope, for they have already been obliged to surrender the hope to which they have so fondly clung of the intervention of European countries; and now if you will cut off this last desperate hope which the rebel leaders still entertain, you will do more to accelerate the termination of this rebellion than any other congressional measure that can possibly be adopted.

Abraham R. Olin [N. Y.] replied to Mr. Wickliffe.

It is not true that either this House or the people of this country have any other motive in the prosecution of this war than they had in August last. They are fighting this war for the maintenance of the Constitution and the Union. I know that there is a difference of opinion upon another question, and that is as to the means to be employed for the prosecution of this war. I know that some gentlemen, and perhaps my friend from Illinois [Owen Lovejoy] for one, think that the best way is, like the Dutch governor of New York, to fight it by proclamations, to proclaim liberty throughout the land to captives. Another gentleman would say, let the negro question alone.

Mr. Lovejoy.—I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him; but I simply desire to say that I want to fight with bayonets and bullets, and not with proclamations.

Mr. Olin.—I am happy to hear that, and it will enlighten the House upon that point, I have no doubt.

Now, there is, as I have observed, a difference of opinion upon this subject. But every intelligent man in the free States as well as in the slave States knows—the whole world knows—that this institution of slavery, never very palatable to the free States of the Union, has been the cause of this accursed rebellion. Mr. Speaker, you remember Toombs said that that institution could only exist as long as slaveholders controlled this Government, and that, when they were deprived of the power and patronage of the Government to uphold it, that institution must fall. Slaveholders having been deprived of that power, this rebellion is the consequence. Now, gentlemen from slave States must treat with a little forbearance my friends upon this side of the House. I beg you remember they, together with all the world, know that this war has been brought upon us by men who sought to control the destinies of this country by wielding the influence of slavery. It is not to be wondered at that the people of the free States do not feel very kindly disposed toward that institution, or that every opportunity is sought within the constitutional limits of the Government to strike a blow at slavery, which, if it shall not destroy that institution forever, will leave it in such a situation that it will never hereafter be a disturbing power in the administration of this Government.

Now, I am desirous to see this war prosecuted within the strict limits of the Constitution. I think that this Government is released from no obligation to my friend from Kentucky by reason of this rebellion; that the Government is bound to protect all his rights of property and everything that is dear to him in his social and political relations, and I wish to see the war prosecuted successfully, if it may be, with a most sacred regard to all the rights of every citizen. In my humble judgment the whole strength of this accursed rebellion rests in an entire delusion on the part of the Southern people. Every gentleman who has held a seat on the floor of this House as long as I have knows one fact, and that is that there has been for years a strenuous, constant, and persistent effort on the part of some Southern men in this House, and out of it, to imbue the entire Southern mind with the idea that the party now in power, if they ever did attain power, would, by force and violence, if necessary, emancipate their slaves; and it is that belief that now adds strength to their army. If that delusion could be dispelled this rebellion would melt away like frost-work before the sun. I believe as sincerely that that is so as I believe any truth revealed from above.

What, then, is obviously the policy of the Government in respect to this measure? Why, I think—though, perhaps, my opinion upon that subject is not worth much—that the President is pursuing a wise and prudent course, and I think that my friend from Kentucky is unnecessarily alarmed at the introduction of this resolution. What is it, in its whole scope and extent? Why, simply that if you gentlemen of the slave States are willing to get rid of slavery the general Government will aid you to do it by giving you a compensation for any loss that you may sustain; and, although I am not worth much, God knows I would divide my last crust of bread to aid our Southern friends to get rid of slavery, and let us live in peace and harmony together. If these gentlemen say, "we cannot afford to make the sacrifice of manumitting our slaves," the President says, "very well; the general Government will aid you to accomplish it." That is the magnanimous, the great, the God-like policy of the Administration. But, while it says that, it says to you and it says to the world, "we do not propose to force this question of emancipation upon you; you are perfectly free to accept or to reject the offer. We disclaim entirely the right to constrain you in the matter."

But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Wickliffe] says that the offer to aid in the emancipation of the slaves is an interference with this institution. Merciful God! Does this institution make you mad? Must you close your eyes to what is going on all over the civilized world? Look, I beseech you, at this matter! Conduct your army in the best way you can, with the most sacred regard to every right, and when it overruns a State, as it has overrun Missouri, what is the result? Where have gone to-day her slave population? Nearly two-thirds of them have fled either North or South; and, if our army marches successfully through Kentucky and Tennessee, to some extent this same result will be produced there. Nay, more. As they march through other States, as they are now marching through South Carolina, thousands upon thousands of these poor negro slaves will flock to the standard of the Union—the slaves of rebel masters, the slaves of men who have taken up arms to subvert this Government, a Government such as was never founded by man. And do you think, I pray you, that any power of this Government, judicial, military, or executive, can ever be induced to surrender those men to those rebel masters? Oh, no; you are touching there a chord that vibrates through the whole Northern heart, and it says we never will consent that property of this description shall be returned to men thus arrayed against the Government by the strong arm of the Government.

John J. Crittenden [Ky.] construed the proposition as asking the border States to give up their "domestic institution" of slavery as a pledge of loyalty to the Union.

What right have you to suppose now that old Kentucky will abandon her faith in the Constitution of the United States, and unite herself with the South? None at all. The way to conciliate Kentucky is not by pressing these questions upon her. The way to conciliate her is to let her alone. That is the way to show your confidence in her—your confidence that she will always, and under all circumstances, do her duty. That will make the old State proud. But when you demand of her a revolution in her domestic policy, when you make a demand of that sort upon her, I am apprehensive it may not have the good effect you suppose. The cardinal principle upon which our whole system of Government is founded is that matters of a local and domestic character shall be under the exclusive control of the State governments, and national and external matters under the control of the general Government. If you begin now to trench upon that paternal and patriarchal jurisdiction which belongs to the States by taking one domestic subject from under its control, what will be the result in the future?

I do not know how this proposition will be received by my constituents. It is suddenly brought before them. It relates to a subject about which they are very sensitive. I fear they will think that they ought to be let alone on this subject. You urge them to take a further step in proof of their loyalty. They will say: "Is this the way the other States of the Union treat us? The moment we come within their grasp, the moment we join hands with them, and take up the sword in defence of the Constitution, they desire that we shall modify our institutions in accordance with their wishes."

Do you demand of us a surrender of a part of our constitutional rights, while you are professing to support the whole Constitution?

MR. LOVEJOY.—I desire to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would be unconstitutional if Kentucky should emancipate her slaves, on condition that the Federal Government shall pay her a certain amount of money?

MR. CRITTENDEN.—I am not prepared to say that it would be unconstitutional. But the gentleman looks at the matter in a very limited way. When this Government makes a proposition of this sort, it is equivalent to an invitation, and by such an invitation agitation may be introduced at a time when we want no agitation.

But gentlemen say that this will break the hopes of the rebellion, and that otherwise the South will compel you to recognize her independent government. So says my friend from New York [Mr. Diven]; and this measure proposed is only to prevent Kentucky and the border States from acceding to that independent Southern government when it shall force itself upon our acknowledgment. Sir, I hope that that day is never to come. It is too remote a possibility to found any argument upon. If that time ever does come, when these twenty millions of people shall be content to see this great Government broken up; and if, looking forward beyond that infamous and disgraceful day, we shall be told that there is a fear on the part of the North that the border States will then join the Southern Confederacy, if you permit that day to come I shall not want to be with you. Are we recreantly to submit to have this country broken into pieces, and then dare to think of things that are to happen afterward? No, sir; there is no thereafter; there is no future beyond that. I will not look into it. And yet the argument used here to-day is that we shall, without consideration, without knowing what will happen to this measure in Kentucky or the other border States, base this measure only upon things that may happen in the future, that may happen after that day of infamy. My policy does not reach so far, nor will I act upon any supposition of the sort.

Sir, we are in the habit of saying a great many things in the ardor of our feelings which we would like to recall. My friend from New York [Mr. Olin] has said so many admirable things that he will excuse me for alluding to one extravagance of this sort in the remarks which he has just made. He says that when it shall be necessary for the preservation of the country he would be willing to see the negro armed and servile war made in the South by Southern negroes upon Southern planters—a war of the black man upon the white man.

How can it ever become necessary for a nation to do what, in the sight of God and man, is condemnable under all circumstances? I will not suppose such a case. It is the very argumentum which ranges through the long series of resolutions here for confiscation and emancipation—that you have a right to do anything to weaken your enemy and to strengthen yourself. A doctrine more at war with every principle of ethics, of morals, and of religion cannot be proclaimed.

In the name of God, what are we fighting for this day? Are we not fighting to uphold the Government; to uphold humanity; to put down those who violate law, who would induce to disorder, homicide, and crime? And are you to say that you have a right to commit all manner of crimes for the purpose of accomplishing your object? No matter what your enemy was, he could not be worse than you are, if that is your morality. In a cause like ours, a glorious cause, which seeks to maintain justice and liberty and right among men, let not us, its chosen defenders, sink ourselves down to the level of those who have called forth this effort on our part to subdue them. This is a great contest. I want to see it waged on principles that become it; that are lofty as the subject itself is. It is not necessary for us to do wrong. It is only necessary for us to behave dutifully toward our country, and to enforce our laws. We shall thus do our whole duty, and shall have nothing to upbraid ourselves with when the war is over.

John Hickman [Pa.], a radical Republican, said that he would vote for the bill, although he thought it of little practical importance.

It does not possess any great intrinsic merit, for the reason that its adoption would not constitute legislation. It would be better distinguished as a plank in the platform of a political party. If carried through this House it will not even bind the present House to pass a law, much less a House that shall be convened in the future. It is, in my judgment, simply a declaration of opinion as to a policy, and nothing more. As I look at it is is rather a compensation to the North for disappointed hopes, and a warning to the people of the border slave States. The President of the United States cannot be ignorant of the fact that he has, thus far, failed to meet the just expectation of the party which elected him to the office he holds, and his friends are to be comforted, not so much by the resolution itself as by the body of the message, while the people of the border slave States will not fail to observe that with the comfort to us is mingled an awful warning to them.

The paper is somewhat of an assurance—slight, I admit—that the President still has convictions upon the great question of freedom and slavery, and that in a certain event the interests of slavery, which he seems anxious to protect, may be prostrated; and that, therefore, it is better for the border States to put themselves in a position to meet a great crisis. It is, therefore, rather a palliative and caution than an open and avowed policy; it is rather an excuse for non-action than an avowed determination to act. Neither the message nor the resolution is manly and open. They are both covert and insidious. They do not become the dignity of the President of the United States. The message is not such a document as a full-grown independent man should publish to the nation at such a time as the present, when positions should be freely and fully defined.

Sir, any man who sits down and carefully reads this message cannot fail to understand just what it was the President had in his mind at the time he penned it. In the first place, he says to the Republican party: "Gentlemen, I am not such a great defender of the institution of slavery as you would make the country believe I am. I am willing that the institution of slavery shall be sustained, and especially in the border States, but in case a dissolution of the Union, to any extent, shall occur, I will see, as far as my official influence extends, that those border States shall affiliate with the States of the North." In the second place, he says to those border States: "Gentlemen, I give you warning in time that in the prosecution of the war a policy may eventually become necessary on the part of this Administration which will lead to the destruction of the slave interest in these States."

I am satisfied that I cannot be mistaken as to the points in the mind of the President. He does look, and we look, and you gentlemen from the slave States look to a contingency in which extreme war measures may become necessary. If this Union and Constitution are deserving of the eulogiums which have been passed upon them by gentlemen from all sections they are worth more than the pecuniary interests involved in any single local or domestic institution; and if you are possessed of the patriotic feelings which I suppose you to be possessed of, and which I am willing to admit you are possessed of, you will regard the preservation of the Constitution and the Union as paramount to the pecuniary interests involved in any domestic institution, not excepting slavery. That man who is not willing to save the Constitution and the Union by the sacrifice of a private interest is already a rebel, and I care not upon whose ear that declaration may fall with harshness; and, sir, when, a few weeks since, in a running discussion in this Hall, I propounded the question to gentlemen from the border slave States whether they would sustain the Constitution and the Union, although it might be necessary to sacrifice slavery to save them, there was but a solitary and a very feeble voice came up in affirmative response. Now, sir, although the North has magnanimity, the North has not too much patience. I proclaim here a fact which has studiously been concealed, as it seems to me, that the border States are not in this Union because they love freedom. They are in it because they fear force.

What means the action of Kentucky maintaining neutrality in the hour when the Union required friends? If a man professes to be a friend of mine I expect him to show his active friendship in the hour of my trial and my sufferings. Kentucky, proud, magnanimous Kentucky, as she has been designated here this morning—and I have nothing to say against either attribute—in that hour of trial and danger stood on the ground of perfect neutrality. But when the passage of our troops to the national capital had been secured, when the integrity of the Union had been put out of danger for the time being, and when the safety of Kentucky was imperiled, then she was the proud and magnanimous State to declare herself on the side of the Union.

And, sir, I do not hesitate to say that, from all I can see, there is no slave State population that has not the well-being of slavery so much at heart, and into the composition of whose hearts slavery does not enter to such an extent that they love human slavery, with its christianizing and republican influences, its separations of husbands and wives, of parents and children, its days of toil without recompense, its servility and utter degradation, its life without hope, and its death without knowledge, as much as they love the Government. Why, sir, I have found but one among the Representatives of slave constituencies on this floor who, when the Union was in the hour of its direst peril, was ready to make the open and distinct avowal that, if the Union and slavery could not both be saved, he would save the Union in preference to slavery.

Now, sir, but one word more. Mr. Lincoln has found himself between two swords—the sword of the party looking to a particular policy, to be pursued toward a rebellion springing from slavery, and the sword in the hands of the border States, who insist all the time that the war shall be prosecuted in such a way as to save their peculiar, divine, and humanizing institution. The President of the United States, if he has any recollection—and I do not know whether he has or not, for I do not perceive any evidence of the fact—if he has any recollection he will remember that he was taken up by a party, sustained and carried into his high position by a party whose very life was dedicated to the maintenance of the Constitution and the Union; and they had the right to expect the adoption of such measures, not inconsistent with the laws of war, as would be most likely to crush treason at the earliest moment. And when I say to this House that the nation at large has been somewhat disappointed in its reasonable expectation, I may be open to a charge of indiscretion, but not to one of misrepresentation.

I say, further, that the nation has felt a great lack of confidence, not only in the President, but in those military leaders put in the highest position by the President. He knows this well, and has made some changes. He knows, further, that the people of the Northern States regard this Government as sacred, and will never allow the sacrilegious hand to touch it without striking it off, and that its downfall cannot precede Northern desolation and death. No matter what interests may perish, no matter what lives may be sacrificed, they will command that the war shall be prosecuted with the greatest vigor, and that the Government shall be reëstablished, even if it be but over smoldering cities and wasted lands.

I speak for myself alone; I do not speak for organizations, political or otherwise, and I assume the responsibility. That may be my misfortune.

"Never mind!
My words, at least, are more sincere and hearty
  Than if I sought to sail before the wind.
He who has naught to gain can have small art; he
  Who neither wishes to be bound nor bind
May still expatiate freely, as will I,
Nor give my voice to slavery's jackal cry."

The bill passed the House on March 11 by a vote of 89 to 31. It came up in the Senate on March 24.

Compensated Emancipation

Senate, March 24-April 2, 1862

Willard Saulsbury [Del.] denounced the bill as in effect an interference with slavery in the States by fomenting agitation upon the subject, and by holding out inducements for the abolition of the institution. Whether force or bribery was used to accomplish this end, it was an infraction of the solemn pledge of the Republican party not to touch slavery in the States.

On March 26 James A. McDougall [Dem.], of California, opposed the bill on the ground that it would be ineffectual—indeed, would defeat the very end aimed at by arousing antagonism to emancipation through agitating the question.

I have seen the time when I hoped Missouri would soon provide for the gradual emancipation of her slaves, and it would have been done but for agitation. The same thing has been known in the history of Kentucky, Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware. I believe that by the just administration of the Government of its own affairs the legitimate course of events will accomplish all these results yet; but they never will be accomplished by legislation. We may have this subject agitated session after session, year after year, Congress after Congress, angry discussions, expensive discussions, profitless discussions—Federal legislation cannot cure this evil; it cannot be reached by any such medicine; for favorable times, circumstances, events, we may hope; but if we here undertake the management of this great social problem we will find that we are not merely anticipating, but that we are usurping the ways of Providence, and assuming an office higher than any to which we have been yet elected.

Lazarus W. Powell [Ky.] regarded the measure as "a pill of arsenic, sugar-coated," its object being to inaugurate Abolition parties in the border States.

I happened a few nights ago, through curiosity, to go to the Smithsonian Institution, to hear a man of some distinction as an orator and lecturer in this country. There I heard this man, Wendell Phillips, for half an hour, and he distinctly announced, after eulogizing the President very highly for this message, that the interpretation of it was simply saying to the border slave State men: "Gentlemen, if you do not take this we will take your negroes anyhow." That was the interpretation given to it by some gentlemen of the House of Representatives, and that, in my opinion, is the plain, distinct, and proper interpretation of the message, when you take it as a whole.

Lot M. Morrill [Me.] defended the proposition of the President as generous and just. He could not conceive how it could possibly be offensive to any man who had not made up his mind to hold slavery supreme above the Constitution and the integrity and welfare of the Union.

John B. Henderson [Dem.], of Missouri, supported the bill (and, indeed, thereafter acted as an emancipationist).

It has been urged with a great deal of power in the border slaveholding States that the design of the bill is to effect the emancipation of the slaves in the border slaveholding States, and then to consent to a dissolution of the Union. I have no idea that any such thing is really contemplated.

The institution of slavery in the State of Missouri has not been sufficient, notwithstanding it has been deemed by Senators here to be sufficient in a great many of the States—because slavery has been charged to be the cause of all our troubles—to withdraw the people of my State from their allegiance to the Federal Government. There are other interests in Missouri besides the interests of slavery of equal, if not superior, importance. One of the great reasons inducing them to remain firm and fixed to the Union is that they will never consent to surrender their right to the Mississippi River, over every inch of it, from the borders of Missouri to the Gulf of Mexico; and, sir, if they lose all idea that that is to be an object of the majority here, it will inevitably affect their feelings in the future.

We of the South have been annually frightened by some imaginary plot for the overthrow of slavery in the United States. We have been regularly informed by a race of politicians, whose watchful and jealous regard for our true interests has been about equal to that of the Abolitionist for the negro, that unless they were continued in power the whole institution would be immediately upset, the owner robbed of his property, and the negro made equal, if not superior, to the white man. We have listened to these stories, and been made alike to fear and hate the most unsubstantial and harmless thing on earth.

Why was this war forced upon us, and who are its authors? However opposed I may be to some radical measures which have been introduced in Congress, and which, no doubt, are largely attributable to the feelings engendered by this unjustifiable war, yet candor compels the Union men of the border States to do justice to the President, and even to his friends in Congress. This terrible revolution was brought about by Mr. Yancey and his confederates, by inflaming the Southern mind against the dangers of Abolition, which they knew to be false. They drove the South to madness, to self-destruction.

Now, sir, what has been the result of this unnecessary strife upon my State. In 1860 our slave population was one hundred and fourteen thousand nine hundred and sixty-five. Our white population at the same period was upward of one million. How is it now? I doubt whether there are fifty thousand slaves in the State.

The true value of real and personal property in Missouri in 1860 was $501,214,398. Aside from the depreciation of value, which no man can now estimate, and beyond the loss of slaves to which I have referred, I think it safe to say that ten per cent. of this vast amount of property has been destroyed and forever lost to the owners in consequence of this war—an amount equal to the aggregate value of all the slaves in the State at the commencement of hostilities.

If I were to add to this the loss occasioned to the people of the State by the utter prostration of its agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests for the last twelve months I might add fifty millions more to the sum already named.

Looking, then, to my own State, I am not disposed to take issue with the President in regard to the future results of the war. I regard his expression as a prophecy, and not as a threat —a prophecy that I feel will be realized if this war continues. It is a new pledge of faith by the representatives of the people that this vexed question shall be left with the people of each State. It comes not in the spirit of arrogance, demanding conformity with the views of others, but with humility acknowledging if slavery be an evil it is a sin for which we are all responsible, and for the removal of which we are willing to come with practical benevolence. It means more than all this. It intimates to the States that the nation would prefer gradual to immediate emancipation, and that the measures now pending in Congress, looking to such results, should be superseded by one of conciliation and good will.

If this spirit had been more largely cultivated in days gone by we would not this day be forced to witness a ruined South and a deeply oppressed North. Why, sir, ninety-six days of this war would pay for every slave, at full value, in the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia. Nine months of the expenditures of this strife would have purchased all the slaves in the States named, together with those in Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, thus preserving in peace the whole of the Mississippi to the Gulf. Less than two years of these expenditures would have paid for every slave that treads the soil of the nation. If Northern men had treasured these things, and learned that kind words can accomplish more than wrath, and if Southern men had resolved to look upon slavery as upon other questions of moral and political economy, and both had determined to examine this as all other subjects, in calmness and deliberation, we would have been spared the evils that now oppress us.

Mr. President, I have made up my mind to cast my vote for the resolution, and to leave it with the people of my State. I am indifferent as to the result upon myself. I feel that it is altogether a change from what we have witnessed for the last number of years on the floor of this and the other House. Instead of that wrangling controversy, instead of those rushing waves of tumult, of ill feeling, and of anger that have been engendered in the discussion of this question, it marches up and takes hold of the slavery question as a practical one, worthy of the calm, cool, and deliberate judgment of those in whom the nation has trusted its prosperity and its future greatness. Then, sir, I shall cast my vote for it. I regard it as no insult to the people of my State; I regard it as no threat; but I regard it as a measure that is conciliatory, and looks to the future peace and harmony of the country, and to the early restoration of the Union.

On April 2 John Sherman [O.] spoke in behalf of the bill, closing the debate.

It is said that the resolution of the President now before us looks to an interference with slavery in the States. I do not so construe it. It does not assert the power or advise us to interfere with slavery in the States. On the contrary, it, by necessary implication as strong as express denial, denies the power. If the State of Maryland should, in its wisdom, see fit to commence a system of gradual emancipation of slaves, would they not have the right by this bill to call upon us for aid and assistance? We here announce beforehand that we will give them pecuniary aid, but not until they call for it. It is right that we should announce that doctrine. It is right that they should inaugurate that system; and I believe that in the providence of Almighty God the system will be inaugurated more rapidly even than we now hope for.

Why should we not give this aid? By it we accomplish great purposes. We banish from the Halls of Congress a disturbing element which in some form or other will permeate this body and every political organization in this country. It is for the peace and quiet and comfort of our people we should aid any State desiring to emancipate their slaves.

Besides, the policy of emancipation would tend to develop the resources of the States in a wonderful degree. Why, sir, I visited the other day the Chesapeake Bay, James River, and York River. It surprises me beyond expression that that magnificent region, with resources unrivaled in this country, is not now peopled by a million of men. When I look upon those deep bays, those fertile fields, requiring only energetic labor to develop them, when I see those marts of commerce in the very center of our Atlantic coast, I wonder in amazement that a million of men are not now crowded there, delving and striking and working with honest toil for an honest reward. But, sir, there is no other cause for this lack of development except simply that labor, upon which all civilization depends; labor which has built up New York, New England, and the West, is there degraded by the presence of slaves, so that the master must live on the labor of the slaves, and the slaves must work for the master without hope of reward.

Sixty years ago Ohio was a wilderness, now she has two and a half millions of people. I believe that if Virginia was a free State now, in thirty years from this time she would contain three or four millions of people. Therefore I say that, if I were a citizen of a border State, I would at once raise the banner of gradual emancipation; I would call on the general Government for aid, and, for one, if I should happen to be a member of this body, I will give that aid cordially and freely.

But it is said that Congress by giving this aid would interfere with slavery. The resolution of the President does not say that Congress shall render this aid, but that the United States ought to coöperate. It may be necessary to call upon the States; and I think I can say in advance that, if Kentucky should free her slaves, Ohio would gladly respond to anything that Kentucky would ask. She would gladly pay the debt she owes from the war of 1812 by any aid that Kentucky might ask of her.

The policy and the effect of emancipation in the border States would undoubtedly be to induce the slaves to go southward. They would commence a kind of hegira southward, and free people from the Old World and from the Northern States would go down to the border States. I have no doubt that the tide of emigration, having now met the vast plains and deserts of the West, will gradually seek a home southward. If you will welcome it, avail yourself of it, use that labor to develop your resources, it will make the people of Kentucky and of these border States rich, prosperous, and happy. The owner of seventeen hundred acres of land will be worth three times as much as his lands and his slaves are now worth. Labor makes everything and not the mere possession of land.

I am willing, therefore, to adopt the policy of the President in regard to slavery in the States, to abolish slavery in this District, to promote a system of voluntary colonization. I am also in favor of confiscation; I think such a measure should be passed promptly. We must seize upon the property of these men who have taken up arms against the Government. Our people, when they come to pay taxes, will demand it. These men know it. They themselves are confiscating all the property of their own citizens who will not take up arms. You must in war adopt the laws and policy of war. I am, therefore, in favor of the most rigid law of confiscation against the leaders of this rebellion; but I would, as an act of wisdom, of amnesty, of wise forbearance, and moderation, authorize the President at any time to proclaim an amnesty to the great masses of the rebels. As to those who have led, the captains of companies, the members of Congress, the leaders in the rebellion, all those who have staked their property upon it, men of intelligence and character, I would, without mercy, prosecute the laws of confiscation and war against them to the furthest extent. Let us adopt this policy, guided by wise moderation, controlled by a manly earnestness and a determination to stand by each other, and I believe the Republican party will not only save the country, but will put the country in a march of prosperity of which we have heretofore had no example. If, on the contrary, any useless measures of legislation, looking to extreme means, be adopted, prejudicing the great mass of the people of the Southern States, destroying their rights as citizens of those States, or reducing the States to Territories, it will only exasperate the people of those States more and more, will make conquest impossible, and a reunion of all the States utterly futile. I believe that by a wise system we may, one by one, gather these States again into the folds of the Union; and if the Republican party, through its wisdom and ability, shall carry the country through this revolution, I do not fear for the verdict of the popular will. I have heard some of my friends express a doubt, and say, "let us do this now, because after a while we may not have the power." I will do what I think is right, and I have an abiding confidence in the people of the United States that they will stand by those who follow their convictions of duty with moderation and good sense.

The bill was then passed by a vote of 32 yeas, including Henderson, Garrett Davis [Ky.], and Waitman T. Willey [Va.], to 10 nays, mostly from the border States.

Abolition of Slavery in the Territories

On March 24, 1862, Isaac N. Arnold [Ill.] introduced in the House a bill abolishing slavery without compensation in every existing Territory, and prohibiting it in all which might be formed in the future. It was referred to the Committee on Territories. On May 1 it was reported from the committee by Owen Lovejoy [Ill.]. The bill was bitterly opposed by the Democrats: Samuel

S. Cox [O.] called it a complete justification of the charges of the secessionists that the Republicans had never intended to abide by the pledges of the Chicago platform, and therefore that its title should be "A Bill for the Benefit of Secession and of Jeff. Davis." John W. Crisfield [Md.] characterized the bill as "a palpable violation of the rights of the States, and an unwarrantable interference with private property—a fraud upon those States which have made cessions of land to the Government, and a violation of the Constitution." Judge Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.] ably opposed the bill because of the lack of compensation to slaveholders in it, and to remove this objection the feature of compensation was added. The bill was then passed by vote of 85 yeas, including all the Republicans and two Democrats, William T. Sheffield [R. I.] and Judge Thomas, to 50 nays.

The bill was reported in the Senate by Orville H. Browning [Ill.] on May 15, and on June 9 it was passed by a strict party vote of 28 yeas to 10 nays. On June 19 it was approved by the President.

Lincoln's Appeal to the Border States

On July 12 President Lincoln read to the border State Representatives in Congress an appeal that their States adopt compensated emancipation.

If the war continues long, as it must if the object be not sooner attained, the institution of slavery in your States will be extinguished by mere friction and abrasion—by the mere incidents of the war. It will be gone, and you will have nothing valuable in lieu of it. Much of its value is gone already.

I am pressed with a difficulty which threatens division among those who, united, are none too strong. An instance of it is known to you. General Hunter is an honest man. He was, and I hope still is, my friend. I valued him none the less for his agreeing with me in the general wish that all men everywhere could be free. He proclaimed all men free within certain States, and I repudiated the proclamation. He expected more good and less harm from the measure than I could believe would follow. Yet, in repudiating it, I gave dissatisfaction, if not offence, to many whose support the country cannot afford to lose. And this is not the end of it. The pressure in this direction is still upon me, and is increasing. By conceding what I now ask you can relieve me, and, much more, can relieve the country, in this important point.

In his annual message of December 1, 1862, the President was forced to report on his favorite project of colonization that no countries were willing to accept the freedmen as citizens except Liberia and Hayti, and to these the freedmen were unwilling to migrate.

He had, however, a more favorable report to present of State action in regard to compensated emancipation, a number of loyal slave States having initiated legislation looking to this end.

The passage of the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery superseded Federal action in regard to compensation.

CHAPTER VII

Punishment of Treason

Thomas D. Eliot [Mass.] Introduces in the House, and Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] in the Senate, a Bill to Confiscate Property of Rebels—Speeches against the Bill by Sen. Edgar Cowan [Pa.] and Sen. James R. Doolittle [Wis.]—Daniel Clark [N. H.] Introduces in Senate Bill to Emancipate Slaves of Rebels, Garrett Davis [Ky.] Opposes It—Mr. Eliot Introduces Confiscation and Emancipation Bills in the House—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Eliot; Opposed, Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.], Samuel S. Cox [O.], John Law [Ind.]—Conference of Senate and House Reports Combined Confiscation and Emancipation Bill—It Is Passed—No Punishments Inflicted for Treason.

THE policy of punishing treason by confiscation of the property of rebels, at least their slaves, had been timidly suggested in the extra session of Congress (July-August, 1861), but no action was then taken to this end. Early in the present session it was more definitely proposed: on December 2, 1861, by Thomas D. Eliot [Mass.] in the House; and on December 5, by Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] in the Senate. The proposition with various amendments, sometimes including other property than slaves, was hotly discussed in both Houses throughout the session in intervals of other measures, and in connection with these when they dealt with the question of emancipation. By all the Democrats, and by some of the more conservative Republicans, the proposition was denounced as utterly and glaringly in antagonism to the Constitution and the pledges of the dominant party, and as calculated to extinguish the last vestige of Unionism in the seceded States, and to imperil it in the loyal border States. Thus Edgar Cowan [Rep.], a Senator from Pennsylvania, said, on March 4, 1862:

Against Confiscation of Rebel Property

Senator Cowan

We are standing now squarely face to face with questions of most pregnant significance. Shall we stand or fall by the Constitution, or shall we leave it and adventure ourselves upon the wide sea of revolution? Shall we attempt to liberate the slaves of the people of the rebellious States, or shall we leave them to regulate their domestic institutions the same as before the rebellion? Shall we go back to the doctrine of forfeitures which marked the middle ages, and introduce feuds which intervening centuries have not yet sufficed to quiet? These are great questions, and they are in this bill, every one of them.

This bill proposes, at a single stroke, to strip four millions of people of all their property, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind whatsoever, and reduce them at once to absolute poverty; and that, too, at a time when four hundred thousand of them are in the field opposing us desperately.

Now, sir, it does seem to me that, if there was anything in the world calculated to make that four millions of people and their four hundred thousand soldiers in the field now and forever hostile to us and our Government, it would be the promulgation of a law such as this. Will they yield to us sooner in view of such a result to them? What would we be likely to do if they were to threaten us with a similar law? Would we ever, under any circumstances, yield on terms like those? I need hardly ask that question to men descended from sires who refused to pay the tax on teas, and from grandsires who rose in rebellion and overturned a monarchy rather than pay twenty shillings ship money—for that, I believe, was the sum demanded from Hampden, and which cost Charles I his head.

The English conquerors of Ireland, in their long series of forfeitures and confiscations, from the time of Strongbow down to the rebellion of 1798, never, at any time, ventured upon such a sweeping measure as this; their attainders exhausted themselves upon the Irish nobility, and they never were rash enough to strip the Irish people.

I do not know the value of the property forfeited by this bill; I cannot even approximate it, except to say that it is enormous—to be computed by billions. But, sir, the bill goes further, and forfeits a vast amount of property of the rebels which, when forfeited, cannot be confiscated or put into the coffers of the conquerors—I mean their property in negro slaves.

This bill would liberate, perhaps, three millions of slaves; surely the most stupendous stroke for universal emancipation ever before attempted in the world; nay, I think it equivalent, if carried out, to a virtual liberation of the whole four millions of slaves in the Union.

Now, I do not mean to stop here to discuss their right to this species of property; it is enough for me to say that all the people of the slave States, loyal and rebellious, seem to agree as to this with a wonderful unanimity, and to resent with an excessive sensibility any interference with it whatever. And, although in the bitterness of the feuds engendered by the civil war now raging among them, the loyalists there would be glad to join in inflicting upon the rebels even the severest punishments, yet this one they abhor and refuse, because they aver that it would be equally injurious to them as to their enemies.

But what is to be the effect of it upon the war? Will we be stronger after it than before; or will we find we have doubled the number of those in arms against us? They have now no cause of war; will not this measure furnish them one, and one they think more just and holy than any other? Let the loyal men who know them also answer this question. I will abide their answer.

Those who favor this astounding bill seem determined to bewilder and blind us still more by an additional project of greater magnificence and, if possible, of greater difficulty; and that is, in the duty it imposes upon the President, of procuring a home for these emancipated millions in some tropical country, and of transporting, colonizing, and settling them there, if they desire to go, with guaranties for their rights as freemen! Surely, sir, we must have been recently transported away from the sober domain of practical fact, and set down in the regions of eastern fiction, if we can for a moment entertain this proposition seriously. Do the advocates of the scheme propose to confer upon the President the gold-making touch of Midas? One would think the universal menstruum or the philosophers' stone had been at last discovered. Certainly, nothing short of the ring and lamp of Aladdin, with their attendant genii, would enable us in our present condition to assure the President of his ability to enter upon such a task, unless, indeed, it is conceived the treasury note is of equal potency in this behalf. If so, the sovereign of the tropical country and the transportation companies ought to be consulted in regard to the legal tender clause. I suppose it is not expected that the exodus can be supported on the way by quails and manna; and yet, I am free to say, it will need the miraculous interposition of Heaven quite as much as did that of the Israelites of old.

Then there is a further consideration involved in this bill of still greater moment than even those I have already glanced at; and that is its direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, requiring us, indeed, should we pass it, to set aside and ignore that instrument in all its most valuable and fundamental provisions; those which guarantee the life, liberty, and property of the citizen, and those which define the boundaries between the powers delegated to the several departments of the Government.

Pass this bill, sir, and all that is left of the Constitution is not worth much. Certainly it is not worth a terrible and destructive war, such as we now wage for it. And it must be remembered that that war is waged solely for the Constitution, and for the ends, aims, and purposes sanctioned by it, and for no others.

I am aware, however, that some think the Constitution is a restraint upon the free action of the nation in the conduct of the war, which they suppose could be carried on a great deal better without it, etc. Now, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that no greater mistake ever was made in the world than is made by such people, because, under the Constitution, we have full and ample power delegated to the general Government to enable it to do, in war as well as peace, everything which a Government ought to be allowed to do; while, at the same time, it has laid down accurately upon its charts all those rocks upon which other governments have been split and wrecked heretofore, with the proper prohibitions to prevent us from seeking our destruction upon them. And I will venture to say that there is not a restraint it imposes which is not salutary, and which, if thrown off, will not prove most destructive. The real danger consists in the fact that the prohibited measures are all of them at first sight most plausible; they are not roaring breakers, obvious to all, but sunken rocks in a calm sea, where the chart of experience is most necessary to guide the political pilot, if he is prudent enough to take the warning.

Congress cannot forfeit the property of rebels for longer than their lives, by the enactment of any law whatever, for the following reasons:

1. Those persons now in rebellion, having levied war against the United States, are guilty of treason within the exact definition of that crime contained in the third section of the third article of the Constitution, in which it is declared that

> "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

Hence, as soon as the rebels are arrested and brought within the power of any law we may pass, they become eo instanti[1] traitors, and obnoxious to the punishment which is imposed by our statute for treason. As long, however, as the rebel is at large, or in the hands of the military, he cares nothing for the law, and is not amenable to it, because the military power cannot try him under the law—that must be done by the courts. But the second clause of that same section provides further, that > "The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted."

Therefore any law made for the guidance of the courts must conform to this provision, and no other or greater penalty could be imposed than it would warrant. If, therefore, the law was to enact an absolute forfeiture of the estates of the traitor, it would be bad for the excess, and the judges would be obliged to make the sentence constitutional, either by cutting down the statutory penalty to a forfeiture of his estates for life, or by omitting to forfeit them at all. All this seems to me so obvious as not to be doubted.

2. The power assumed in this bill is also obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution, if it be assumed that Congress can legislate an effectual forfeiture of the estates of rebels, as such, without allowing them an opportunity or means of trial in the courts. Because,

By the fifth amendment to the Constitution, it is provided:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Here it is attempted to deprive a large class of persons of all their estates and property, without any arrest, without any presentment by a grand jury, without any trial by a petit jury, without, indeed, any trial at all in any court. This would be to deprive them of their property in the very face of the provision requiring that it shall only be done "by due process of law," which, all commentators and all lawyers agree, means proceedings according to the course of the common law.

I am aware that this will seem strange to some people who think that, as we are at war with the rebels, we ought of course to be able to enact any law we pleased, inflicting upon them punishment befitting their crimes. Such people, however, will do well to remember that our Government is not one of absolute powers—it is in no respect omnipotent or restrained only by its own sense of propriety or policy. On the contrary, its powers are limited to those expressly delegated to it, and are not to be implied from any supposed necessity that they ought to be there, or that it was intended to confer them. Besides this, the powers actually delegated are also distributed and divided to and among the several departments of the Government which are to exercise them. These, too, must confine themselves severally to their functions as fixed by the terms of the grant. Congress has its part, the President has his part, and the courts their part. Now Congress, for instance, has no power to punish anybody (except for contempts), and to-day, if we had half a dozen of the worst rebels caged here in this Chamber, we could inflict upon them no punishment. We could not order the sergeant-at-arms to hang or behead them, no matter how certain we might be of their guilt. Nay, more, the President himself and all his army could not lead them away from this hall to execution. The only way they could be punished at all would be to deliver them over to the judges—the proper judges—because no one judge might have a right to try all of them. Nay, it is possible every one of them might have to be tried by his separate judge, in his separate court and district. There, again, the functions of the judges, in such cases, are limited—a jury shares them, and its members are the exclusive judges of the facts, while, after the condemnation and judgment, the sheriff or marshal would be the only person having the right to execute the judgment.

I may also further remark that it is in this limitation of the powers of the Government, and their distribution after the manner of the Constitution, that its great merit consists. On those accounts we love, cherish, and revere it; and because it has such features we are now at war with all our force and treasure to defend and preserve it. Had we no Constitution limiting its powers, defining its agencies, fixing the boundaries of their rights and duties under it, nobody would lift a hand for it; and if you make it usurp powers not granted at all, not granted to the usurping department, then our war for it is a great mistake if not a great wickedness.

Again, this is further guarded against in the ninth section of the first article and third clause, as follows:

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

A bill of attainder was a mode of proceeding resorted to in England, as well as in some of the United States during the Revolution, to condemn and punish traitors, by Parliament or the legislature, in cases where they were out of the reach of the process of the courts; nay, indeed, in many cases even after they were dead. In such cases the law-making branch of the Government supplied the want of due process of law by blending together in one statute the law and the application of the law to particular persons named therein, or to a class of persons by description. Bills of attainder condemned the accused to death

(if not dead already), forfeited their estates, and corrupted the inheritable blood of their children and heirs, so that no one could take any estate either from or through them. Bills, however, like the one under consideration, which does not propose to inflict capital punishment, or corrupt the blood of the offenders, but imposed other penalties of lesser grade, were called "bills of pains and penalties."

It may be said the latter are not within the prohibition, and therefore allowable here. It is true they are not within the letter of it, but being equally within the mischief, which was that the legislature should in any case attempt to usurp and exercise the functions of the courts; and construing the fifth amendment in connection, I have no doubt they are also prohibited. Indeed, no one can come to any other conclusion but that the convention which framed the Constitution intended to remove every possibility of the usurpation, by Congress, of the power to punish anybody without "due process of law."

Besides, to grant our power of passing bills of pains and penalties is to nullify the whole effect of the clause, inasmuch as it is easy, by passing several of these against the same person, to make their aggregate result precisely the same as a bill of attainder. Such a construction would defeat the provision instead of making it avail, as intended.

We are not left, however, without authority as to this point, if any were needed to give force to the reason adduced for it, because Judge Story, in his "Commentary on the Constitution," at section 1344, says:

"But in the sense of the Constitution, it seems that bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties; for the Supreme Court have said, 'A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or both.'"

And for this he cites Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch's Reports, 137; 1 Kent's Commentaries, sec. 19, p. 382; and this was well shown by the honorable Senator from California [James A. McDougall].

This, then, being, in the language of the Supreme Court, a bill of attainder, and in the stricter language of the common law a bill of pains and penalties, is clearly within the prohibition contained in the clause read; and nothing which I can say is so apposite as the remainder of the section quoted from Judge Story, and from it all may see the view taken of such laws as this by a jurist so eminent—one, too, sitting calmly in his closet and free from all those exciting influences which, in troubled times like ours, are so apt to warp our judgments and blind our reason to the truth:

"The injustice and iniquity of such acts, in general, constitute an irresistible argument against the existence of the power. In a free government it would be intolerable; and, in the hands of a reigning faction, it might be, and probably would be, abused, to the ruin and death of the most virtuous citizens. Bills of this sort have been most usually passed, in England, in times of rebellion, or of gross subserviency to the Crown, or of violent political excitements—periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties, and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

I now propose to go further and argue that the exercise of such a power, even if it had been granted, would now be mischievous and impolitic, and that our fathers did wisely and well in refusing it. By their just leniency they showed that they looked beyond the hour of conflict to the better day of reconciliation, and offered a bounty to the heirs of the guilty that they might be loyal. I may say, too, that the civilized world, at least in all christendom, have come to this same conclusion, and have generally purged their statute-books of such a relic of angry barbarism:

"The reasons commonly assigned for these severe punishments, beyond the mere forfeiture of the life of the party attainted, are these: by committing treason the party has broken his original bond of allegiance, and forfeited his social rights. Among these social rights, that of transmitting property to others is deemed one of the chief and most valuable. Moreover, such forfeitures, whereby the posterity of the offender must suffer, as well as himself, will help to restrain a man, not only by the sense of his duty and dread of personal punishment, but also by his passions and natural affections; and will interest every dependent and relation he has to keep from offending. But this view of the subject is wholly unsatisfactory. It looks only to the offender himself, and is regardless of his innocent posterity. It really operates as a posthumous punishment upon them, and compels them to bear, not only the disgrace naturally attendant upon such flagitious crimes, but takes from them the common rights and privileges enjoyed by all other citizens, where they are wholly innocent, and however remote they may be in the lineage from the first offender. It surely is enough for society to take the life of the offender, as a just punishment of his crime, without taking from his offspring and relatives that property which may be the only means of saving them from poverty and ruin. It is bad policy, too; for it cuts off all the attachments which these unfortunate victims might otherwise feel for their own government, and prepares them to engage in any other service, by which their supposed injuries may be redressed, or their hereditary hatred gratified. Upon these and similar grounds it may be presumed that the clause was first introduced into the original draft of the Constitution; and after some amendments it was adopted without any apparent resistance. By the laws since passed by Congress, it is declared that no conviction or judgment, for any capital or other offences, shall work corruption of blood, or any forfeiture of estate. The history of other countries abundantly proves that one of the strong incentives to prosecute offences as treason has been the chance of sharing in the plunder of the victims. Rapacity has been thus stimulated to exert itself in the service of the most corrupt tyranny; and tyranny has been thus furnished with new opportunities of indulging its malignity and revenge, of gratifying its envy of the rich and good, and of increasing its means to reward favorites, and secure retainers for the worst deeds."—Story's "Commentaries on the Constitution," Sec. 1300.

In the light of this exposition let us follow the consequences of this bill into detail, and let us suppose its provisions fully carried out. Our armies have overrun the whole territories of the Confederate States; resistance has entirely ceased; and the President and his officers being masters of the country, they have time to finish the residue of their work by gathering in the balance of the property of the rebels not already taken to supply the "military necessities" of the suppression. The rebels themselves are homeless, houseless, and propertyless; and the question arises, have you made them loyal by your severity? Are you assured their love for the Union will return again after this chastisement? Have you thought how they would shout at the sight of the glorious old banner—"the stars and stripes"—which brought them such deliverance?

Mr. President, these people are to be again our brethren and kinsmen, if such a thing is possible; but it does seem to me that, by such laws as this, you will make that possibility a very remote one. Will not their women and children hate you, and their children's children hate and curse you down to the latest generation; and whenever they get a chance will they not rebel against you? Have you not sown the seeds of many rebellions by this one ill-advised act? All this might make little or no difference if they were of hostile race and alien enemies, and if we were making war upon them for conquest and subjugation. But that is not the fact. We have here in these Halls of Congress solemnly declared that the war was for no such purpose, but that it was for the purpose of compelling obedience to the Constitution and the laws; and I am for standing upon that declaration.

The Constitution and the laws being restored and obedience tendered, is this law one of them? Now, we suppose that a large number of people everywhere in the Confederate States were constrained, even by force, to join in the rebellion—are these to suffer upon the same scaffolds with the willing traitor; and is there no difference to be made between the general who betrayed his country and the soldier he has compelled to march at his bidding at the head of a rebel column? This bill makes none; and, if it did, it makes no provision to try it and determine its value when it is found; the officers have seized the property, and the victim of force in the beginning ends by being the victim of wrong and injustice. To him the Constitution and laws are not yet restored. Again: thousands of these people have been duped into rebellion by being told that we of the North were all Abolitionists—intent, when we had the power, to wield it for the emancipation of their slaves, and the destruction of their social system. What does your bill do with these—these men, who believed the falsehood because it was first asserted by Southern demagogues and then proved and corroborated by Northern knaves? Is there no difference here, again, between the wily traitor and his simple dupe? This bill makes none, but includes within its terms the whole rebel population, of every state and degree, from the lordly planter down to the negro laborer; and the broad acres of the one, as well as the narrow hovel of the other, are alike forfeit under it.

But the President and his officers are to dispose of these confiscated estates. Who will buy them? What kind of neighborhood will exist between the former owner or his heirs and your alienees or their heirs? How the delights of this society will enhance the value of those estates to the purchasers, especially when they reflect that the forfeiture will never be forgotten in the family of the rebel, and that, if they have no other, they can transmit this inheritance to their descendants unimpaired for centuries! The tradition of it will sit continually by the hearthstone of that family a hideous specter, deathless for ages, prompting to revenge and inciting to rebellion. Sir, your thrifty purchasers will not like incumbrances such as these hanging over your forfeited estates; and you might as well try to attract them and their capital to your vendue by promising they should be entitled, as appurtenant to the land offered for sale, to an Irish feud in perpetuity or a Corsican vendetta in fee to them and their heirs forever. Such titles have never been desirable. In the French Revolution, even when its success seemed well assured the holders of the assignats refused to buy the public domain with them, although at that time (August, 1793) the franc assignat had so depreciated that the metal franc was worth nine of them. Sir, you might as well expect capital to seek the margin of an extinct volcano before the lava had cooled for investments in real estate. The only purpose forfeitures ever served in ancient times was to furnish a means of payment to the hardy soldier who achieved their conquest; his title was in his sword, and he could maintain it. That which is taken in war must be kept in war. Every hill must have its castle, and every march its wardens. But surely this is not one of the "dispositions" the President and his officers are to make of this property.

As a Republican, standing upon the Constitution as construed by that party, I protest against this bill as being a total and entire departure from the principles of that instrument, most mischievous at this time, because it uselessly distracts, divides, and weakens the friends of the country when they ought to be united and of one accord in action, if ever such were needed before. In addition to this, it would make us do of all things in the world that which would most gratify and strengthen our enemies everywhere—worth to-day more than a hundred thousand armed men to the traitors of the South, and worth more than five hundred thousand votes to the would-be traitors of the North; thus enabling the latter again to get control of the Government, to wield it as they have wielded it before. No, sir; pass that bill by this Congress and every falsehood uttered and every design charged upon us in six years of desperate struggle is verified by our deliberate act, an act as useless to the country and to the cause in which we are engaged (apart from other objections) as would be a law against serfdom in Russia passed here.

Sir, I hope and trust some other and better way than this will be found to punish those concerned in this rebellion after it shall have been suppressed, and that the method adopted, whatever it may be, will not be one which will furnish cause for future revolts. Those who are to be punished at all ought to be punished effectually under the Constitution, and according to the laws they have violated; and those who are to be forgiven ought to be forgiven fully and freely as it becomes the majesty of a great nation to forgive. Having rescued the revolted States, and restored the dominion over them to the loyal people within them, I would have the traitors dealt with in such way as not to endanger in the future either the happiness or safety of such as have remained faithful through the terrible ordeal to which they have been subjected. In this I should consult their wishes and defer much to their better judgment; but certainly I would not do that which, in their opinion, would leave them worse with the Union restored than they would be with the Confederacy sustained. I would not offer bounties to make them rebels, neither would I impose penalties or conditions having the like effect. I look upon this bill as a measure of the latter kind—the natural consequence of which would be to give to the rebels the energy of despair, and to take from the loyalists every motive for fidelity. Pass this bill and the same messenger who carries it to the South will come back to us with the news of their complete consolidation as one man. We will then have done that which treason could not do; we, ourselves, will then have dissolved the Union; we shall have rent its sacred charter and extinguished the last vestige of affection for it in the slave States by our blind and passionate folly.

I am well aware, sir, of the object of this second clause—emancipating the slaves of the rebels—and I know there are many who think that ought to be done, because they think slavery the only cause for the rebellion. In considering this it is well to remember that there are now in the world, and always will be, many great evils which God, in His wisdom and for His own purposes, has put out of the reach of remedy except in His own way and at His own time, and then His means are always adequate and very generally apparent. Four millions of negro slaves are now in bondage in the United States. Where are the signs of their emancipation? Have not hundreds of thousands of these everywhere had ample opportunities to throw off their chains within the last few months? Have they done so? And, if they have not done so, can you compel them to exchange voluntary servitude for involuntary freedom? I thought the world was old enough by this time to know that they who are entitled to freedom themselves must strike the blow which is to secure it. What blow has the negro struck for himself in this his fairest opportunity? His rebel master, with a madness to all other men incomprehensible, engaged himself in revolt, broke up the society in which he lived, liberated all its elements, so that they are free to act, and thus tacitly invited him to assert his manhood? How has he availed himself of it? Why, sir, just in the way one might have expected; knowing nothing of liberty, caring nothing for it, he has remained inactive as the domestic animals around him, impelled, perhaps, by the same unconscious instinct of dependence upon the providence of a master wiser and stronger than himself. A child always in the scale of development, he may have had some child's consciousness that the boon of liberty so ostentatiously offered him by his over-zealous friends might prove to him fatal as the shirt of Nessus or the box of Pandora, and he still hesitates and hugs his chains.

I have no hope of the negro yet, though, God knows, I would have him free, free as I am myself, if freedom be his choice, through the strife and agony by which he, as all men, must purchase it. Eternal vigilance and continual struggle is the price of liberty.

On May 2, 1862, James R. Doolittle [Rep.], of Wisconsin, spoke in the Senate upon the limitations in the Constitution upon the punishment for treason.

Against Confiscation of Real Estate of Traitors

Senator Doolittle

When the Constitution was formed it was a serious question whether there should be any power given to the United States Government to punish treason against it. Under the old Articles of Confederation no such power existed. It, however, is given by the Constitution of the United States, and the same language which gives it puts a limitation upon it. There is the power and there its limitation. There they stand side by side, put into the Constitution in the same clause. We cannot close our eyes to one and open them to the other.

The power to suppress insurrection is a distinct and substantive power, without limitation, except that whatever law shall be passed by Congress and whatever shall be done by the Executive in suppressing insurrection should not go beyond the powers usually exercised according to the modern usage of nations in carrying on civilized warfare—the laws of necessity and of humanity.

Under this Constitution Congress is not prohibited from declaring that personal estate shall be forfeited upon the conviction of a traitor, but that his real estate cannot be forfeited beyond his life upon the attainder for treason. I have received a copy of an able argument written by Joel Parker, who stands at the head of the law school of Harvard University. I find he makes the same distinction. He assumes it to be almost too clear for an argument. He says:

"The attainder spoken of in the clause cited from the Constitution being such attainder as, according to the common law, results from a judgment, it seems clear that the forfeiture, which is limited by the Constitution to an estate for life, relates to the same general kind of property which was forfeited by the attainder at common law; and the language of the constitutional provision indicates that this was real and not personal property. A forfeiture of a life estate in personal property, of which the traitor had the absolute title, would certainly be an anomaly. But it is clear that the forfeiture on attainder of treason was of real property only, lands, and interests in or rights to lands, and could be no other; for the forfeiture of the personal property of the traitor was the result of the conviction which preceded the judgment and the attainder."

I will also read a sentence or two from Chitty's Criminal Law:

"There is this difference between conviction and judgment, that if the traitor die after conviction and before judgment he may pass his real estate, but not his personal property, because the goods and chattels are forfeited on the verdict of guilty, but the lands are not divested until the attainder, which is the pronouncing of the sentence of the court."

See, also, Coke's "Commentaries on Littleton," Vol. 2, Sec. 745.

It is clear, therefore, that, under this clause of the Constitution, giving to Congress the power to declare the punishment of treason, we may declare the absolute forfeiture of every dollar of the traitor's personal estate upon his conviction; but, when we come to touch his real estate, we can forfeit it for his life, and for his life only.

I am aware that Senators here have contended that in other countries of the world, upon a conviction of treason, men have had not only their personal property confiscated absolutely, but their real property also. I agree to that. Such was the law among the Persians, the Macedonians, the Greeks, the Romans, and in England, too, until they passed a law, to take effect after the death of the Pretender, to restrain its effect. The same power was exercised in this country in most if not all of the colonies during the Revolution; but not under this Constitution. That power was exercised before this Constitution was formed, when there was no such limitation upon them, when the common law was in full force, and the judgment of attainder forfeited all his real estate absolutely, as his personal estate was forfeited upon conviction.

It was with all these facts before them that our ancestors who formed the Constitution placed this limitation in it. They had been in rebellion themselves. In their own experience they had learned all there is in the passions which dictate and the consequences which follow attainders, forfeitures, and confiscations. They knew it all. With all the lights of human history before them, under the old and under the new dispensation, before and after Christ, when they met in convention to form this Constitution, to found this new Government to be the light and the example of nations, they determined to limit the power of confiscating real estate to the life of the guilty party, even in this highest of political crimes. They determined that, to the extent of the homes and lands of the family, the rule should be, punish the guilty, but spare the innocent.

On May 6 Senator Trumbull's bill was referred to a select committee of seven. The chairman, Daniel Clark [N. H.], duly reported the committee's bill, which merely authorized the President, at his discretion, to proclaim free all slaves of persons who shall be found in arms against the United States thirty days after such proclamation. It came up for discussion on May 16, and Garrett Davis [Ky.] tried to amend it by providing that the confiscated slaves be sold, the proceeds accruing to the Treasury. This amendment failing (only 7 votes being recorded in its favor), he then moved that no slave should be emancipated unless provision had been made for his immediate colonization out of the country; this amendment received only 6 votes. The bill was then put aside in favor of the House [Eliot] bill.

The Confiscation and Emancipation Bills

House of Representatives, April 30-May 26, 1862

This bill had been referred in the House to the Judiciary Committee, and was there reported against by John Hickman [Pa.], the chairman, because the President had already the power that it sought to confer. It was then referred to a select committee of seven, of which Mr. Eliot was made chairman. By this committee it was separated into two bills, one providing for confiscating the property of persistent rebels, and the other providing for emancipating their slaves, and these were reported on April 30. The debate on these measures lasted for several days. Judge Benjamin F. Thomas [Mass.], a conservative Republican, opposed them as a violation both of the Constitution and the law of nations.

"The duty of obedience to that Constitution was never more imperative than now. I am not disposed to deny that I have for it a superstitious reverence. I have 'worshipped it from my forefathers.' In the school of rigid discipline by which we were prepared for it, in the struggles out of which it was born, the seven years of bitter conflict, and the seven darker years in which that conflict seemed to be fruitless of good; in the wisdom with which it was constructed and first administered and set in motion; in the beneficent government it has secured for more than two generations; in the blessed influences it has exerted upon the cause of freedom and humanity the world over, I cannot fail to recognize the hand of a guiding and loving Providence. But not for the blessed memories of the past only do I cling to it. He must be blinded 'with excess of light,' or with the want of it, who does not see that to this nation, trembling on the verge of dissolution, it is the only possible bond of unity."

Samuel S. Cox [Dem.], of Ohio, asked:

"Must these Northern fanatics be sated with negroes, taxes, and blood, with division North and devastation South, and peril to constitutional liberty everywhere, before relief shall come? They will not halt until their darling schemes are consummated. History tells us that such zealots do not and cannot go backward."

Said John Law [Dem.], of Indiana:

"The man who dreams of closing the present unhappy contest by reconstructing this Union upon any other basis than that prescribed by our fathers, in the compact formed by them, is a madman—aye, worse, a traitor—and should be hung as high as Haman. Sir, pass these acts, confiscate under these bills the property of these men, emancipate their negroes, place arms in the hands of these human gorillas, to murder their masters and violate their wives and daughters, and you will have a war such as was never witnessed in the worst days of the French Revolution, and horrors never exceeded in St. Domingo, for the balance of this century at least."

Mr. Eliot closed the debate on May 26 with a most radical speech in favor of the bills. Of the Confiscation Bill he said:

This bill seeks to condemn the property of the leading rebels, and to place the proceeds in the treasury for the purpose of helping to defray the expenses of the war, and also in aid of those who have been robbed by the Confederate Government. All laws of this kind, gentlemen must be aware, must be in their terms severe. The rebels began to confiscate a year ago. They passed confiscation laws, and under those laws there is but little property of loyal men left in their States. We are slow in following their example. I am surprised that, after a year's experience of the effects of their confiscation schemes, and after they have used the property taken from loyal citizens against the Government of the United States, gentlemen should come here and speak of this bill as being too severe. There is not a rebel of the classes mentioned in the bill who does not deserve to be hanged by the neck until he is dead.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will accomplish good in the border States. It will strengthen the hands and hearts of loyal men. If made effectual, it will deprive the enemy of his means of carrying on the war. It will help to weaken and subdue him. It will increase our strength. It will, in part, indemnify us against the cost of this rebellion. It will give the property of rebels, first, to their creditors in loyal States; and, secondly, it will provide a means of indemnity for loyal men whose property, owned in rebellious States, has been taken from them.

Sir, when it is argued that this bill affects men who are dupes of ambitious leaders, I cannot but be struck with the audacity of such a proposition. Who are the dupes named in the first section of the bill? Are the President and Vice-President of this rebel Confederacy dupes? Are the members of Congress, members of the cabinet, members of the legislatures, members of conventions, high officers of the Confederacy or of different States, dupes? Have they not good sense enough to know what they are doing? Are they not conscious and willful rebels, and enemies against their Government? Are they not at war with us? Does any sane man believe they do not mean what they are doing, and that they do not know what they mean? Are they dupes? Sir, if we are deceived by such arguments against our bills we shall be the dupes, and the enemy, as they wage this war and confiscate our property, will hold us in derision.

The Confiscation Bill was passed by a vote of 82 to 68. The Emancipation Bill was next taken up and defeated by a vote of 74 yeas (all Republican) to 78 nays (15 of which were Republicans). It was then reconsidered, and, after elimination of its harsher features, was passed by a vote of 82 to 54.

The House Confiscation Bill was amended in the Senate on motion of Daniel Clark [N. H.] by the addition of provisions under certain conditions of emancipation of slaves, and, on June 28, passed by a vote of 28 to 13. The House refused by a vote of 8 yeas to 124 nays to concur in this action, whereupon a joint conference of the two Houses was brought about, which presented a combined Confiscation and Emancipation Bill.

This bill passed the House by 82 yeas to 42 nays, and the Senate by 27 yeas to 12 nays, and was approved by the President on July 17. In its final form the bill contained the following provisions:

The slaves of the person convicted of treason performed after the passage of the act should be set free, and he himself should either suffer death, or be imprisoned not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, at the discretion of the court. A person convicted of assisting rebellion was to have his slaves liberated, and himself be imprisoned not less than ten years, or fined not over $10,000, or suffer both penalties, all at the discretion of the court. Persons convicted under the act were permanently disqualified to hold office under the United States. The President was authorized to confiscate for the support of the army the property of any one of several enumerated classes of persons, namely: (1) rebel military and naval officers; (2) officers of the Confederate government; (3) officers of Confederate State governments; (4) all other citizens of seceded States who do not within sixty days after the President's proclamation of this act return to their allegiance to the United States; and (5) those citizens of loyal States and Territories who assist rebellion. Fugitive and captured slaves of rebels were deemed captives of war by the act, and ordered to be set free. Fugitive slaves of loyal owners were to be returned to them on their taking oath that they had not aided the rebellion; the civil authorities were to return these slaves—in no case the military or naval authorities. The President was authorized at his discretion to employ negroes to suppress the rebellion; and to colonize free negroes in some tropical country beyond the limits of the United States, as well as to proclaim amnesty to rebels.

At the end of the rebellion there were no prosecutions for treason. Says Alexander Johnston, in his "American Political History":

It has been roundly asserted that the reason for this was the consciousness of the Government of the United States that it had been illegally suppressing a misnamed rebellion, that treason could only hold against a State, and that Jefferson Davis and his associates had committed no crime and engaged in no treason, in any sense known to the Constitution or its framers. Those who so argue forget that Mr. Davis, at least, was no prisoner of war; that his surrender was unconditional and in a territory under military occupation; and that, if there had been any such impotent spite against him as this theory assigns to the Government, a drum-head court-martial and a file of men would quickly have made it patent, treason or no treason. The fact seems to be that his escape was due entirely to lack of spite. The collapse of the rebellion had been too complete to allow of spite. The nation stood aghast as it realized the thoroughness of its work; and its controlling impulse was to efface as rapidly as possible all evidences of the conflict. Treason trials would have been a festering sore in the body politic, and they were avoided.

CHAPTER VIII

Emancipation

Union Victory at Antietam [Sharpsburg], Md.—President Lincoln Issues the Emancipation Proclamation—He Forestalls Objections to It in an Address on Colonization to Negro Deputation; in a Letter to Horace Greeley, Replying to His "Prayer of Twenty Millions," and in an Address on Emancipation to a Religious Delegation—The Preliminary Proclamation—Its Reception by the Country and Europe—The Final Proclamation—Second Annual Message of the President; It Treats of Compensated Emancipation and the Relative Advantages of Retaining Freedmen in the Country and Deporting Them; and Pleads That Congress and the Country Aid Him in His Plan for Saving the Union—Reply of William A. Richardson (Dem.), of Illinois, to the Message: "Enslaving the Whites to Free the Blacks."

THE Union victory at Antietam [Sharpsburg], Md., on September 18-19, 1862, precipitated the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln.

By the advice of William H. Seward, Secretary of State, Lincoln had only been waiting for a Union victory to declare an emancipation proclamation applying to slaves in the disloyal States. Not only did he believe that, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the Republic, he had a constitutional right to issue the proclamation as a war measure, but he was fortified by the special authorization of Congress to do so at his discretion. Late in July or early in August he had announced to the Cabinet his determination to issue such a proclamation.

After the President had determined to issue the proclamation he set himself to forestall the objections which he knew the document would call forth, such as: that it was intended to establish negro equality; that it proved the insincerity of the declared purpose of the Administration to save the Union by showing this to have been from the beginning to free the slave, etc. On August 14, addressing a deputation of negroes on the subject of colonization, he said, in regard to the vexed question of race equality:

Why should the people of your race leave the country? It is because you and we are different races. We have between us a broader physical difference than exists between any other two races. Whether this is right or wrong I need not discuss; but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both. Your race suffer greatly, many of them, by living among us, while ours suffer from your presence. This affords a reason why we should be separated. Your race is suffering, in my judgment, the greatest wrong inflicted on any people. But, even when you cease to be slaves, you are yet far remote from being placed on an equality with the white race. You are cut off from many of the advantages which the other race enjoys. The aspiration of men is to enjoy equality with the best when free, but on this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of a single man of ours. Go where you are treated the best, and the ban is still upon you. I do not propose to discuss this—but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal. I cannot alter it if I would. . . . I believe in its general evil effects on the white race. See our present condition—white men cutting one another's throats—none knowing how far it will extend. . . . But for your race among us there could not be war, although many men engaged on either side do not care for you one way or the other. . . . It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated.

On August 19, 1862, Horace Greeley, in his paper, the New York Tribune, addressed a letter to the President some weeks after this, entitled "The Prayer of Twenty Millions," exhorting Mr. Lincoln not to proclaim all the slaves in our country free, but to execute the laws of the land which operated to free large classes of the slaves of rebels. It concluded as follows:

"On the face of this wide earth, Mr. President, there is not one disinterested, determined, intelligent champion of the Union cause who does not feel that all attempts to put down the rebellion, and at the same time uphold its inciting cause, are preposterous and futile—that the rebellion, if crushed out to-morrow, would be renewed within a year if slavery were left in full vigor—that army officers, who remain to this day devoted to slavery, can at best be but halfway loyal to the Union—and that every hour of deference to slavery is an hour of added and deepened peril to the Union. I appeal to the testimony of your embassadors in Europe. It is freely at your service, not mine. Ask them to tell you candidly whether the seeming subserviency of your policy to the slaveholding slavery-upholding interest is not the perplexity, the despair of statesmen of all parties; and be admonished by the general answer!

What an immense majority of the loyal millions of your countrymen require of you is a frank, declared, unqualified, ungrudging execution of the laws of the land, more especially of the Confiscation Act. The rebels are everywhere using the late anti-negro riots in the North—as they have long used your officers' treatment of negroes in the South—to convince the slaves that they have nothing to hope from a Union success—that we mean in that case to sell them into a bitter bondage to defray the cost of the war. Let them impress this as a truth on the great mass of their ignorant and credulous bondmen, and the Union will never be restored—never. We cannot conquer ten millions of people united in solid phalanx against us, powerfully aided by Northern sympathizers and European allies. We must have scouts, guides, spies, cooks, teamsters, diggers, and choppers, from the blacks of the South—whether we allow them to fight for us or not—or we shall be baffled and repelled. As one of the millions who would gladly have avoided this struggle at any sacrifice but that of principle and honor, but who now feel that the triumph of the Union is indispensable not only to the existence of our country but to the well-being of mankind, I entreat you to render a hearty and unequivocal obedience to the law of the land.

The President replied to this appeal by telegraph on August 22, 1862.

As to the policy which I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not meant to leave anyone in doubt. I would have the Union. I would have it in the shortest way under the Constitution.

The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be the Union as it was.

If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them.

If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them.

My paramount object is to save the Union, and not either to save or destroy slavery.

If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it—if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it—and if I could do it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that.

LINCOLN CROSSING NIAGARA

[Suggested by a feat of Blondin, the tight-rope walker]

What I do about slavery and the colored race I do because I believe it helps to save this Union; and, what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union.

I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause! and I shall do more whenever I believe doing more will help the cause.

I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors; and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views.

I have here stated my purpose according to my views of official duty; and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free.

But the most astute of the President's preparatory statements was his reply, on September 13, to a committee from the religious denominations of Chicago asking him to issue a proclamation of emancipation. In this he reviewed the arguments for the proclamation as if he were an opponent of them, and so, by admitting their cogency, he put himself, when ultimately he did issue the proclamation, in the politically advantageous position of being forced to do so. Also, by bringing expediency as a consideration to the fore, he prepared the country for an indefinite postponement of emancipation, which would be the case if there was delay in achieving the victory upon which its promulgation depended. The President said:

The subject presented in the memorial is one upon which I have thought much for weeks past, and I may even say for months. I am approached with the most opposite opinions and advice, and that by religious men who are equally certain that they represent the Divine will. I am sure that either the one or the other class is mistaken in that belief and perhaps in some respects both. I hope it will not be irreverent for me to say that, if it is probable that God would reveal his will to others on a point so connected with my duty, it might be supposed He would reveal it directly to me; for, unless I am more deceived in myself than I often am, it is my earnest desire to know the will of Providence in this matter. And if I can learn what it is I will do it. These are not, however, the days of miracles, and I suppose it will be granted that I am not to expect a direct revelation. I must study the plain physical facts of the case, ascertain what is possible, and learn what appears to be wise and right. . . .

What good would a proclamation of emancipation from me do, especially as we are now situated? I do not want to issue a document that the whole world will see must necessarily be inoperative, like the Pope's bull against the comet! Would my word free the slaves, when I cannot even enforce the Constitution in the rebel States? Is there a single court, or magistrate, or individual that would be influenced by it there? And what reason is there to think it would have any greater effect upon the slaves than the late law of Congress, which I approved, and which offers protection and freedom to the slaves of rebel masters who come within our lines? Yet I cannot learn that that law has caused a single slave to come over to us. And suppose they could be induced by a proclamation of freedom from me to throw themselves upon us, what should we do with them? How can we feed and care for such a multitude? General Butler wrote me a few days since that he was issuing more rations to the slaves who have rushed to him than to all the white troops under his command. They eat, and that is all; though it is true General Butler is feeding the whites also by the thousands; for it nearly amounts to a famine there. If, now, the pressure of the war should call off our forces from New Orleans to defend some other point, what is to prevent the masters from reducing the blacks to slavery again; for I am told that whenever the rebels take any black prisoners, free or slave, they immediately auction them off! They did so with those they took from a boat that was aground in the Tennessee River a few days ago. And then I am very ungenerously attacked for it! For instance, when, after the late battles at and near Bull Run, an expedition went out from Washington under a flag of truce to bury the dead and bring in the wounded, and the rebels seized the blacks who went along to help, and sent them into slavery, Horace Greeley said in his paper that the Government would probably do nothing about it. What could I do?

Now, then, tell me, if you please, what possible result of good would follow the issuing of such a proclamation as you desire? Understand, I raise no objections against it on legal or constitutional grounds, for, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, in time of war I suppose I have a right to take any measure which may best subdue the enemy; nor do I urge objections of a moral nature, in view of possible consequences of insurrection and massacre at the South. I view this matter as a practical war measure, to be decided on according to the advantages or disadvantages it may offer to the suppression of the rebellion.

The committee at this point replied to the President's objection that the measure was inexpedient, by contending that it would secure at once the sympathy, heretofore in suspense, of England and France, and, indeed, of the whole civilized world; further, that, as slavery was clearly the root of the rebellion, it must be eradicated if the war was to be decisively ended. The President said:

I admit that slavery is at the root of the rebellion, or at least its sine qua non. The ambition of politicians may have instigated them to act, but they would have been impotent without slavery as their instrument. I will also concede that emancipation would help us in Europe, and convince them that we are incited by something more than ambition. I grant, further, that it would help somewhat at the North, though not so much, I fear, as you and those you represent imagine. Still, some additional strength would be added in that way to the war, and then, unquestionably, it would weaken the rebels by drawing off their laborers, which is of great importance; but I am not so sure we could do much with the blacks. If we were to arm them, I fear that in a few weeks the arms would be in the hands of the rebels; and, indeed, thus far, we have not had arms enough to equip our white troops. I will mention another thing, though it meet only your scorn and contempt. There are fifty thousand bayonets in the Union army from the border slave States. It would be a serious matter if, in consequence of a proclamation such as you desire, they should go over to the rebels. I do not think they all would—not so many, indeed, as a year ago, or as six months ago—not so many to-day as yesterday. Every day increases their Union feeling. They are also getting their pride enlisted, and want to beat the rebels. Let me say one thing more: I think you should admit that we already have an important principle to rally and unite the people, in the fact that constitutional government is at stake. This is a fundamental idea, going down about as deep as anything.

In dismissing the committee he said assuringly:

Do not misunderstand me because I have mentioned these objections. They indicate the difficulties that have thus far prevented my action in some such way as you desire. I have not decided against a proclamation of liberty to the slaves, but hold the matter under advisement. And I can assure you that the subject is on my mind, by day and night, more than any other. Whatever shall appear to be God's will, I will do. I trust that in the freedom with which I have canvassed your views I have not in any respect injured your feelings.

Already the President had laid the event in the hands of God by vowing to issue the proclamation if Lee were driven back over the Potomac. This result of the battle of Antietam was not at once apparent. As Lincoln said to George S. Boutwell: "The battle of Antietam was fought Wednesday, and until Saturday I could not find out whether we had gained a victory or lost a battle. It was then too late to issue the proclamation that day, and . . . I fixed it up a little Sunday, and Monday (September 22) I let them have it."

In accordance with the request of Mr. Lincoln Secretary Seward suggested a few minor changes in the document, which were indorsed by his colleagues and accepted by the President. The proclamation then received the unqualified approval of the entire Cabinet except Postmaster-General Blair, who, while personally in favor of it, expressed apprehension of its evil effect on the border States and the army, which contained many opponents of Abolition. He asked leave to file a paper which he had prepared on the subject with the proclamation. This the President readily granted. Secretary Blair, however, changed his mind over night, and next morning withdrew his objections. The proclamation was published in the newspapers of the 23d. As the President said in response to a serenade from approving Washington citizens at the White House that evening: "It [was] now for the country and the world to pass judgment, and, may be, take action upon it."

The Emancipation Proclamation

The proclamation, after solemnly affirming that the purpose of the war was, and should continue to be, the restoration of the Union, and promising measures of compensated emancipation to those slave States which should adhere or return to the Union, and of colonization to the freedmen, declared that on January 1, 1863, "all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free."

The country quickly gave its approval of the proclamation in the most official way possible at the time. When Confederate invasion of Pennsylvania was imminent Governor Andrew G. Curtin of that State had invited the governors of the Northern States to meet at Altoona on September 24 to consult on emergency measures for the common defence. Before this date arrived the defeat of Lee had removed the original purpose of the convocation, and the governors, after spending a day or so at Altoona in a helpful exchange of information upon military methods employed by their several States, proceeded to Washington and presented a written address to the President, pledging their support in suppressing the rebellion, with the recommendation that an army of 100,000 men be held in reserve at home ready for such emergencies as that which had recently occurred. To this was added an indorsement of the new proclamation. All the governors of the loyal States, those who were present, and the absentees to whom it was shortly sent, signed that portion relating to the suppression of rebellion, and all but the governors of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri signed the indorsement of the proclamation.

The measure was acclaimed by the newspapers in general and by men of prominence all over the country. Nevertheless the President deplored the absence of material results. On September 28 he wrote to Vice-President Hamlin in reply to his congratulation upon the proclamation:

It is six days old, and, while commendation in newspapers and by distinguished individuals is all that a vain man could wish, the stocks have declined and troops come forward more slowly than ever. This, looked soberly in the face, is not very satisfactory. We have fewer troops in the field at the end of the six days than we had at the beginning—the attrition among the old outnumbering the addition by the new. The North responds to the proclamation sufficiently in breath; but breath alone kills no rebels.

The passage of the Emancipation and Confiscation

Acts of Congress, followed as these were by the Emancipation Proclamation of the President, converted the Opposition, which had hitherto with few exceptions supported every other measure for the suppression of the rebellion, into a peace party. A number of Democrats continued to support the Administration in the vigorous prosecution of the war, and, in order to admit these into their ranks without committing them to other than the war issues, the Republicans assumed temporarily the character and designation of a "Union" party. "Union League" clubs for the support of the Administration began to spring up in the large cities of the country. By strenuous appeals to patriotism the Union party, in the congressional elections of the fall of 1862, retained its majority of Representatives, although with greatly decreased pluralities.

Abroad the proclamation secured immediately and enduringly the sympathy of the common people and their representative statesmen for the Northern cause, and so sounded the knell of Southern expectations of foreign aid and intervention.

Lincoln's Proposed Emancipation Amendments to the Constitution

In his annual message of December 1, 1862, the President proposed amendments to the Constitution which would provide compensation in the form of United States bonds to those States or loyal individuals which should free the slaves under their control at any time before January 1, 1900, and which would authorize Congress to colonize freedmen abroad. The articles he discussed at length, advocating them as embodying a plan of mutual concession between loyal and honest slaveholders and loyal and honest Abolitionists.

Doubtless some of those who are to pay, and not to receive, will object. Yet the measure is both just and economical. In a certain sense the liberation of slaves is the destruction of property—property acquired by descent or by purchase, the same as any other property. It is no less true for having been often said that the people of the South are not more responsible than are the people of the North; and when it is remembered how unhesitatingly we all use cotton and sugar and share the profits of dealing in them, it may not be quite safe to say that the South has been more responsible than the North for its continuance. If, then, for a common object this property is to be sacrificed, is it not just that it be done at a common charge?

Of the economic advantage of this plan the President said, prophesying a population at the end of the century of 100,000,000:

The proposed emancipation would shorten the war, perpetuate peace, insure this increase of population, and proportionately of the wealth of the country. With these we should pay all the emancipation would cost, together with our other debt, easier than we should pay our other debt without it.

On the subject of the competition of the freedmen with white laborers the President remarked at length, presenting economic arguments as to the relative advantages of retaining the freedmen in the country and of deporting them.

I cannot make it better known than it already is that I strongly favor colonization. And yet I wish to say there is an objection urged against free colored persons remaining in the country which is largely imaginary if not sometimes malicious.

It is insisted that their presence would injure and displace white labor and white laborers. If there ever could be a proper time for mere catch arguments, that time surely is not now. In times like the present men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time and in eternity. Is it true, then, that colored people can displace any more white labor by being free than by remaining slaves? If they stay in their old places, they jostle no white laborers; if they leave their old places, they leave them open to white laborers. Logically, there is neither more nor less of it. Emancipation, even without deportation, would probably enhance the wages of white labor, and very surely would not reduce them. Thus, the customary amount of labor would still have to be performed; the freed people would surely not do more than their old proportion of it, and very probably for a time would do less, leaving an increased part to white laborers, bringing their labor into greater demand, and consequently enhancing the wages of it. With deportation, even to a limited extent, enhanced wages to white labor is mathematically certain. Labor is like any other commodity in the market—increase the demand for it and you increase the price of it. Reduce the supply of black labor by colonizing the black laborer out of the country, and by precisely so much you increase the demand for, and wages of, white labor.

But it is dreaded that the freed people will swarm forth and cover the whole land? Are they not already in the land? Will liberation make them any more numerous? Equally distributed among the whites of the whole country, and there would be but one colored to seven whites. Could the one in any way greatly disturb the seven? There are many communities now having more than one free colored person to seven whites, and this without any apparent consciousness of evil from it. The District of Columbia and the States of Maryland and Delaware are all in this condition. The District has more than one free colored to six whites; and yet in its frequent petitions to Congress I believe it has never presented the presence of free colored persons as one of its grievances. But why should emancipation south send the free people north? People of any color seldom run unless there be something to run from. Heretofore colored people, to some extent, have fled north from bondage; and now, perhaps, from both bondage and destitution. But, if gradual emancipation and deportation be adopted, they will have neither to flee from. Their old masters will give them wages at least until new laborers can be procured; and the freedmen, in turn, will gladly give their labor for the wages till new homes can be found for them in congenial climes and with people of their own blood and race. This proposition can be trusted on the mutual interests involved. And, in any event, cannot the North decide for itself whether to receive them?

He said in conclusion:

It is doubted, then, that the plan I propose, if adopted, would shorten the war, and thus lessen its expenditure of money and of blood? Is it doubted that it would restore the national authority and national prosperity, and perpetuate both indefinitely? Is it doubted that we here—Congress and Executive—can secure its adoption? Will not the good people respond to a united and earnest appeal from us? Can we, can they, by any other means so certainly or so speedily assure these vital objects? We can succeed only by concert. It is not "Can any of us imagine better?" but "Can we all do better?" Object whatsoever is possible, still the question occurs, "Can we do better?" The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country.

Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or another of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down, in honor or dishonor, to the latest generation. We say we are for the Union. The world will not forget that we say this. We know how to save the Union. The world knows we do know how to save it. We—even we here—hold the power and bear the responsibility. In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve. We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last, best hope of earth. Other means may succeed; this could not fail. The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just—a way which, if followed, the world will forever applaud, and God must forever bless.

Acts of Congress

Congress failed to legislate upon the subject of compensated emancipation; the Senators and Representatives from the border States holding that Congress under the Constitution had no authority to appropriate public money for such a purpose.

In other respects Congress loyally upheld the hands of the President. It ratified his suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in the cases of persons suspected of treason, and broadly authorized him to suspend the writ in the future "at such times, and in such places, and with regard to such persons, as in his judgment the public safety may require." An act was passed to enroll and draft in the national service the militia of the whole country, each State contributing its quota in the ratio of its population. By this the nation's power to compel the military services of its citizens was for the first time declared and maintained.

Of the attacks made by the opposition upon the President's message the following, delivered in the House on December 8 by William A. Richardson [Ill.], is typical:

Enslaving the Whites to Free the Blacks

Attack on the President's Message

By William A. Richardson, M. C.

Sir, it is a remarkable document. It is an extraordinary message, when we come to think of its sum and substance. To feed, clothe, buy, and colonize the negro we are to tax and mortgage the white man and his children. The white race is to be burdened to the earth for the benefit of the black race.

A friend of mine from New England the other day made a mathematical analysis of the message. He said, one from one and naught remains. Naught from naught and the message is the result. [Laughter.]

So far as it relates to the white race, that mathematical calculation is right. So far as it relates to the negro, or, in the court language of the President, the "free American of African descent," rivers of blood and countless millions of treasure are not enough for his benefit and advantage.

Now, sir, when our people have anxiously looked to the message from the President of the United States to learn what they have to hope of a restored Union, and a return of the blessings of peace once more to their firesides, by inference we learn, if not directly, that, if we will carry out all of the President's plans, if we will carry out his schemes, thirty-seven years from now the people may again behold the restoration of the Union and the return of peace. True, the message states that at the end of those thirty-seven years but few of us will then be living to enjoy the blessings we once enjoyed in this now distracted and divided country.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are a few passages in the message so extraordinary, so wonderful, that they require at least a passing notice. There has been, and still is, a great anxiety felt and expressed by our people that this negro population shall not interfere with them; that it shall not jostle them in the occupations they have heretofore pursued in the various industrial pursuits of life in the great fertile regions of the West. The President tells our people, those who supported him because they believed he and his party intended to keep the non-slaveholding States and all the Territories of the Union for the sole occupation of the white race, if you do not like my plan of disposing of this black race; if you fear from their introduction among you that their labor will be brought into competition with that of your own, all you have to do to avoid this competition is to quietly leave your present fields of labor, homes to which, perhaps, you may be attached, and the graves of your kindred, and emigrate southward, and occupy the places made vacant by the exodus of what His Excellency terms the "free Americans of African descent." That is the sum and substance of it.

But, for sake of argument, admit, if you choose, that all the plans of the President touching emancipation and colonization of the negro were to-day successfully carried out, what would it accomplish in the great work of restoring the Union? Nothing—worse than nothing.

The President recommends in his annual message three propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States. The first, second, and third are for the benefit of the negro. The people are sick and tired of this eternal talk upon the negro, and they have expressed that disgust unmistakably in the recent elections. The President's proposed amendments as a whole, or either of them, could not receive the suffrages of a majority of the people of more than two States of this Union.

While upon this subject I desire to call the attention of the committee to a single feature in relation to these amendments. In the message he recommends an amendment to the Constitution as follows:

> "Art. —. Congress may appropriate money, and otherwise provide for colonizing free colored persons, with their own consent, at any place or places without the United States."

In this recommendation he seeks to give power to do what he claims he has the power to do without it; and by this recommendation he admits he has been exercising unauthorized and illegal authority. Is not this in itself an admission that the Constitution, unamended, grants no power to Congress or the Executive to appropriate or use the money of the people for any purposes contemplated in this amendment? He calls upon us to compromise. What compromise is that? For whom does he propose a compromise? What for? In order that you may have more power to advance the negro. That is all there is to it, and there is nothing less of it. He tells us there are differences of opinion among the friends of the Union "in regard to slavery and the African race among us." He says, to all of those who differ with him, surrender your convictions and come to my plan—and he calls that compromise! Compromise! Yes, I trust in God the day is not far distant when the people of this country will compromise and save the Constitution and the Union for the white people, and not for the black people. Our people are for no other compromise than that.

There are other portions of the message upon which I should like to bestow some attention, but I will forbear to do so now, for I desire to call the attention of the committee to another proposition of the President which is connected with this subject.

The proclamation of the 22d of September last, issued by the President, took the country by surprise, and no one of the citizens more than myself. I had fondly hoped and been anxious that the President of the United States should so conduct himself in his high office as Chief Magistrate that I could lend him my support. I have been driven, with thousands of others, into opposition to the policy contained in that proclamation, for reasons which must commend themselves to every reflecting man sincerely desirous of terminating this war and suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. Lincoln, on the 4th of March, 1861, on the east portico of this Capitol, took a vow, which he said was registered in Heaven, to support the Constitution of the United States. In his inaugural address delivered on that occasion he said he had no lawful authority or inclination to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. In his proclamation of the 22d of September last he assumes that he has power to forever free "all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall be in rebellion against the United States," thus violating the pledge so solemnly made in his inaugural address.

If the object of the proclamation was not to aid the rebellion, its effect was. It has strengthened the rebellion by driving into their army every person in the South that it was possible to drive there. Was its intent to affect those alone in rebellion? Certainly not. The slaves of every man in a rebellious State were to be free. The loyal man owning twenty slaves and the man in the rebel army owning a like number were by that proclamation to be affected precisely the same. The object of the proclamation was to benefit the negro, not to restore the Government or preserve the Constitution. It was nothing more, nothing less. It goes a bow-shot beyond anything done by this House at the last session of Congress.

But again. If the proclamation is to be carried into effect, the war must continue until every slave is free. If every rebel should lay down his arms on the 2d day of January next, or any subsequent day, and submit himself to the laws and Constitution of the United States, the war would still have to go on, unless the slaves were all free, for the proclamation declares that "the executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons." It strengthens the arm of the rebellion, and postpones the time of restoring peace to this country, by the declaration of the purpose for which the executive power shall be used. In what respect has our cause —the cause of the Union—been advanced? Up to that time, throughout the great Northwest, you had but to call for volunteers and they rushed to the army. Since then you have had no volunteering. Prior to that time it was not necessary, as the Secretary of War—as I am told, for I have not read his report—now declares it is necessary, to have provost marshals in every county to arrest deserters from the army.

We are informed that but a few days before the issuing of this proclamation the President himself declared, in a conference with some gentlemen who were urging him to this step, that it would not only be wholly inoperative in the object sought, but would directly weaken us in the border States, but significantly added that it might increase our strength in the North. I pause here to inquire where that additional strength in the North was to be obtained; not certainly from the Democratic element in the North. If additional vigor was infused into the service, it must come from some other quarter which until then had not heartily sustained the policy of the Administration. I need not particularize what class of individuals were to be thus induced to lend their support—the country well knows the baleful influences of this class, and the ends they seek to accomplish.

But this is not all. The record of the military operations shows to-day almost conclusively what the country had for some considerable time suspected: that success in a military point of view was not so much the object sought as the bringing about a condition of things when a proclamation of this sort could be urged as the only means of securing to us success.

Here the speaker went on to prove that on two occasions General McClellan could have captured Richmond had he not been interfered with by the Administration, and that finally McClellan had been removed from command because, in his orders to the army, he had failed to indorse the President's Emancipation Proclamation, intended as it was to enslave the white man by freeing the black.

"THE TRUE ISSUE"

[McClellan stopping the division of the country by Lincoln and Davis]

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

The speaker then adverted to the despotic acts of the Administration.

Arrests of thousands of men in loyal States, without due process of law, by the order of the executive officers of this Government, at the times and places where, in all cases, courts of justice were entirely open and the execution of the laws wholly unobstructed. The most remarkable page in the history of our race is the fact that, while these outrages have been committed upon the rights of our people, no resistance has been offered, no violence done, and no life has been taken as the penalty for the wrong. The desire of the people to preserve the peace in their own midst has restrained them thus far from the commission of violence.

But they are in earnest. They mean to preserve their liberties and their rights. The results of the last elections were of no temporary character. Such a triumph has never before been witnessed in this country. There is not a man who voted the Democratic ticket last fall throughout the country who is not prepared, when the proper time comes, to lay down his life rather than sacrifice his liberty. Do not misunderstand us. We are for union. We are for liberty—constitutional liberty. Our ancestors, in all times past, have vindicated it; and their descendants, after long suffering, will, if need be, vindicate it before God and the world. They do not wish to be slaves, and do not mean to be made slaves.

Perhaps I should not anticipate the course of the President of the United States in regard to his proclamation. I trust that he will reconsider it; that he will pause and not go forward with it. This Government cannot be restored by the sword alone. You must carry with it the olive branch. The President says we are making history. I trust we are not making such history as the incendiary[1] who swung his lighted torch in the air to burn the temple of Diana at Ephesus, and who has left his name behind, while the name of him who reared that temple has perished from our memories. I think we may expect that, under a change of policy, the blessings of the Union may yet be restored and made perpetual.

CHAPTER IX

Negro Soldiers

Negro Soldiers in the Revolution—In the War of 1812—Organization of Negro Companies by Union Generals in 1862—Jefferson Davis Orders Execution for Felony of Union Officers Engaged in Such Organization—Congress Passes Act of July 17, 1862, Accepting Negroes for General Service in the Army—Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] Introduces Bill in the House Specifically Employing Negroes as Soldiers—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Stevens, John Hickman [Pa.], Thomas M. Edwards [N. H.], Alexander S. Diven [N. Y.]; Opposed, John J. Crittenden [Ky.], Samuel S. Cox [O.]—Bill Is Passed by the House, and Rejected by the Senate as Conferring Power Already Granted—History of Negro Troops in the War—Employment of Negroes by the Rebels—Retaliation.

CRISPUS ATTUCKS, a mulatto and a fugitive slave, led the patriot mob at the Boston massacre. It was Peter Salem, one of the enfranchised negroes who fought at Bunker Hill, that shot dead Major Pitcairn, leader of the British marines, as he leaped over the breastworks crying, "The day is our own."

The Revolutionary Committee of Safety, feeling that it was inconsistent with the principles of the conflict and reflecting dishonor on the colonies to employ slaves as soldiers, decreed, on May 20, 1775, that only those negroes who were free should be admitted into the army. Many patriots thereupon freed their slaves that these might be permitted to fight.

In the Continental Congress Mr. Edward Rutledge, of South Carolina, moved, on September 26, 1775, that all negroes be dismissed from the patriot armies, but the opposition was so formidable and so determined that the motion did not prevail. Negroes, instead of being expelled from the service, continued to be received, often as substitutes for ex-masters or their sons; and, in Virginia especially, it gradually became a custom to give a slave his freedom on condition of his taking his master's place at the front.

The Congressional Committee of Conference with General Washington before Boston, headed by Benjamin Franklin, ordered on October 23, 1775, that negroes, "especially such as are slaves," should no longer be enlisted; but, on Washington's representation that the negro soldiers whose time had expired were much dissatisfied with the order, and that he feared some might show their resentment by deserting to the enemy, Congress, on January 16, 1776, permitted these to reënlist.

Already (in November, 1775) Lord Dunmore, Royal Governor of Virginia, in order to "reduce" the colonists "to a proper sense of their duty to His Majesty's crown and dignity," had invited slaves to enter the British army, offering them freedom if they would do so.

The Virginia patriots, to offset the effect of this proclamation, called the attention of the slaves to the fact that enlistment in the British army would leave their families at the mercy of "an enraged and injured people." Many enlisted, however, though almost all were destroyed by a malignant fever contracted in the camps.

On August 24, 1778, 775 negroes were enrolled in the Continental army. On August 29 a black regiment, all of whose members had been freed by the Rhode Island legislature on condition they enter the State militia, fought with notable gallantry at the battle of Rhode Island. The legislatures of other Northern States followed the example of that of Rhode Island, and in the South this policy was urged by leading patriots. It is highly probable, says Horace Greeley in his "American Conflict," that had the Revolutionary War lasted a few years longer slavery would have been abolished throughout the country.

So great was the fear of the British commanders that negroes would be set free and enrolled in the patriot army, that Sir Henry Clinton, on June 30, 1779, issued a proclamation offering protection and employment to all slaves who should enter the British lines. Lord Cornwallis, in his Southern campaign, proclaimed freedom to all slaves who should join him. Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to Dr. Gordon, from Paris, on July 16, 1788, estimated that this policy in one year cost Virginia 30,000 slaves, most of whom died of small-pox and camp-fever. Thirty of these were his own, and he characteristically said: "Had this been to give them freedom he (Lord Cornwallis) would have done right."

In the beginning of the War of 1812 the policy was generally adopted of not enlisting negroes, but toward its close, under the stress of military necessity, the restriction was abandoned. Thus the New York legislature, on October 24, 1814, authorized in several quarters the raising of two regiments of negroes, freeing those who were slaves, and compensating their owners with the negroes' pay. On September 21, 1814, Gen. Andrew Jackson, in a proclamation from Mobile, Ala., vigorously denounced the "mistaken policy" of excluding negroes from the army, and gave high praise to the bravery of those who had fought under him, which was shortly afterward confirmed in the defence of New Orleans (January 8, 1815), where a number of negroes fought side by side with the white soldiers, repelling from behind the breastworks the advance of the trained British soldiers under Pakenham with the same ardor which Peter Salem and his black companions had displayed at Bunker Hill.

In the Civil War, before Gen. David Hunter's proclamation of military emancipation had been revoked [see page 130], he had organized some of the slaves of his department into companies.

In his report to the Secretary of War [Edwin M. Stanton], on June 23, 1862, General Hunter gave this testimony to their efficiency:

> The experiment of arming the blacks, so far as I have made it, has been a complete and even marvelous success. They are sober, docile, attentive, and enthusiastic; displaying great natural capacities for acquiring the duties of the soldier. They are eager beyond all things to take the field and be led into action; and it is the unanimous opinion of the officers who have had charge of them that, in the peculiarities of this climate and country, they will prove invaluable auxiliaries—fully equal to the similar regiments so long and successfully used by the British authorities in the West India Islands.

On July 16, 1862, Congress passed an act authorizing the President to accept negroes for "any war service for which they may be found competent," though not specifying fighting as one of these services. The act was approved by the President on July 17.

On August 25, 1862, Secretary Stanton issued a special order to Gen. Rufus Saxton, military governor of the sea islands off the coast of South Carolina, to enlist and drill not over 5,000 negroes and to give them the pay of white soldiers. Saxton was ordered to cultivate the plantations with other negroes, and in every way to "withdraw from the enemy their laboring force and population."

Brigadier-General J. W. Phelps, a Vermont Abolitionist serving under Benjamin F. Butler at New Orleans during the summer of 1862, organized five companies of negroes, who, he announced to his chief, were "all willing and ready to show their devotion to our cause in any way it may be put to the test." He recommended that they be used as soldiers under the command of recent graduates of West Point and the more promising non-commissioned officers and privates.

General Butler, in response, instructed General Phelps to employ his "contrabands" upon the fortifications instead of organizing them as soldiers. This General Phelps peremptorily declined to do, saying, "I am not willing to become the mere slave-driver you propose, having no qualifications that way," and thereupon he threw up his commission.

Later (on July 31, 1862) General Butler felt constrained by the necessities and perils of his position to appeal to the free colored men of New Orleans to take up arms in the national service, which appeal was responded to with alacrity and enthusiasm, and a first regiment, 1,000 strong, was filled within 14 days—all its line officers being colored, as well as the rank and file. His next regiment, filled soon afterward, had its two highest officers white, all the rest colored. His third was officered by the best men that could be had, regardless of color. His two batteries were officered by whites only; for the simple reason that there were no others who had any knowledge of artillery.

On the reception at Richmond of tidings of General Hunter's and General Phelps's proceedings with reference to the enlistment of negro soldiers for the Union armies, President Jefferson Davis issued an order directing that said generals be no longer regarded as public enemies of the Confederacy, but as outlaws; and that, in the event of the capture of either of them, or of any other commissioned officer employed in organizing, drilling, or instructing slaves, he should not be treated as a prisoner of war, but held in close confinement for execution as a felon, at such time and place as he should order. It is not recorded that anyone was ever actually hung under this order.

Employment of Negro Soldiers

House of Representatives, January 29-February 2, 1863

On January 27, 1863, Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] introduced in the House a bill authorizing the President to raise and equip 150,000 negro soldiers, and as many more as he deemed it expedient; to receive the same pay and treatment as white soldiers; to serve for five years, if necessary; the officers to be white or black; commissioned by the President; recruiting stations to be established in both free and slave States; all the slaves among the negroes to become free at discharge, the Government purchasing those belonging to loyal citizens.

The bill was hotly opposed by Representatives from the border States, and by the "Peace" Democrats of the North. Of the speeches of the former class that by John J. Crittenden, made on January 29, is representative.

> You propose by this bill to raise a force of one hundred and fifty thousand slaves as soldiers. You include, to be sure, and permit to be enlisted, free men of color. How can you approve of it? You say the war is a contest for freedom, a contest for liberty; and shall we, sir, stigmatize our constituents, our brothers, the white free-born men of this land, as being so degenerate as to shrink from this contest, and compel you to appeal to your own black men to defend the liberties of the white man?
>
> The bill proposes to raise one hundred and fifty thousand Americans of African descent. You stigmatize them, while you invite them into the field. You employ them as soldiers to fight your battle, but give them only one-half pay and exclude them from command to a great extent.
>
> This distinction which the white race makes in its own favor against the negro may be an unjust one. It is not necessary for me to enter into that question or to define exactly the degree of superiority on the one side or of inferiority on the part of the other race. We know that it exists; it exists North, it exists South, and it exists everywhere. The feelings of our people in reference to it are founded upon instincts that have come down from one generation to another. There is not one of you here who would admit a black man to social equality or to any species of equality. Yet what are you striving to do? You propose to enlist the negro for five years. We are engaged in a mighty war now, a war caused by revolution and pregnant with revolution. What will be the result if we do not conquer a peace shortly? Before long the term of service of your white troops will have expired. Is the nation to be left to a standing black army, with the President at its head, clothed with almost illimitable war powers? Would anyone dare to propose such a policy as that to the American people—to leave the defence of the country and the lives and liberties of its people in the guardianship of any President with one hundred and fifty thousand myrmidons like these, without a knowledge of the simplest principles upon which our Government depends, and without any possibility of their being able to appreciate that liberty for which you are willing to fight and to send your sons to fight? The janizaries are safer depositaries of the liberties of the Ottoman than would be this army of slaves to protect our liberties.
> All nations which have held slaves have been found to reject their services for military purposes in time of war. My learned friend from Ohio [Samuel Shellabarger], who the other day was comparing these rebels to Catiline, is well enough acquainted with his history, and can bear testimony that he, that bold conspirator, had Roman pride enough left in the midst of his vices to reject the assistance, even in his extremest hour of peril, of slaves and gladiators, although they were white slaves, men who had been born free, men who had been made captives in war, and reduced by the inhuman policy of that age to the condition of slavery; they had been tainted and marked with that degradation, and that was enough; even Catiline would not be their leader, and preferred to face the perils of the battle alone. And what a spectacle is here presented! The representatives of a nation which has ever boasted of its readiness to shed the last drop of its blood in defence of the liberties of its people are calling upon slaves to defend it and to defend them! Sir, it is a mockery—a mockery of the American people. It is a policy unlike that of any other nation. It is an insult to your army. It is a crime against the civilization of the age. It is a crime against the Constitution. It is an act of hostility against the Union. These are the sentiments with which I am compelled to regard this measure.

I say it is a crime against the Constitution. You send out your recruiting officer, and you authorize him to go into the State of Maryland, for instance, and to any gentleman's house and seduce away his slave and persuade him to enlist by the promise of his freedom, or, perhaps, the promise of a captaincy, and that slave the property of the master! Mr. Lincoln says the owner has property in his slave; that, he says, is plain and cannot be contested. And yet your recruiting officer is authorized to enlist the slave; to take from the lawful ownership of a loyal man his slave and put him in the army. Did injustice ever go further than this?

John Hutchins [Pa.].—I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Do not the Government of the United States take minors and apprentices, whose services by law belong to the father or master, and put them into the army of the United States?

Mr. Crittenden.—Sir, if the gentleman can mislead himself by any such ideas as those that his question suggests, I cannot help him. I tell him now that the free-born boy owes no obligation of slavery to anyone. His father is his guardian; the owner of the slave is his master. To those who cannot understand that distinction I can make no explanation that will enable them to understand it.

Mr. Speaker, your law is impracticable. My friends, just think of what you are doing! One hundred and fifty thousand negroes are to be enlisted. I say your army will consider it an insult and a degradation.

I remember that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, last session of Congress, was in favor of this same measure. The topics of our conversation then were the battles near Richmond, and there was much sympathy over the great slaughter there. It was then that he introduced this idea of a negro army; they would have saved so many of our dear sons. It seems to me that the gentleman's idea, fairly translated, amounted to this: that he wanted a negro to march before every white man in the field of battle. What a shame it is that proud Republicans, who talk so much about their liberties, should require to have poor negroes held before them in battle as a sort of shield! Do you want this negro army for such a purpose? Sooner advise your sons and brothers to desert. That may escape the attention of history. But, if you want to make the cowardice of our army memorable and historical, bring out your one hundred and fifty thousand black men, put them in the front of the battle, and shelter your white soldiers behind them.

Whenever the American sinks so low; whenever that pusillanimous policy is adopted by him, the liberties of such men are not worth much. The pride and heroism of the American name will have all gone. Let not the man who wants such a defence as that go forth to battle. Let him stay at home. That is not the way to train up a great people. Sparta had her slaves. So had Athens. Did they ever send these slaves into the battle? They were small republics, and were often greatly harassed by war, but they never used their slaves as soldiers. Shall we alone voluntarily degrade ourselves below the condition of other nations? Have not our citizens the courage and strength to defend the country? Have they not the public virtue that is absolutely necessary for the defence of their national existence and of their public liberties? When we shall abandon that defence to slaves we ought to give up our country.

Sir, you cannot execute such a law, and you know it. If you want to make war directly in Kentucky, I assure you, much as I deprecate and deplore it, that this will produce it. It is not in the power of the Government, State or Federal, to prevent actual hostilities there on the very day this sort of recruiting shall be entered on. Your recruiting officers will be driven pell-mell out of the State, or they will be hung, just as the temper of the people may happen to be. I tell you that this is a fact, and that the passage of this measure, instead of assisting to restore the Union, will enlarge and embitter the war. I do not believe that you can, by any measure, drive Kentucky to go out of the Union, and to make alliance with the secessionists and rebels of the South; but the people of Kentucky will resist oppression, come from where it will. They are for the Constitution and are against the rebels, because the rebels are the enemies of the Constitution; and they will be against you, too, whenever you resort to unconstitutional measures. We are fighting so that when peace comes our Constitution and liberties will be restored to us with it. But for that hope there would be no heart for the fight. But if, while we are carrying on a war against the rebellion, the Constitution of our country is to be destroyed piece by piece behind us, and we are to have nothing but the ruins of it left, why should we not be hostile to those who have done this work of destruction?

Sir, this plan of bringing black men into your military service will prove an act of cruelty to the slaves, but of profit to no one. Can they sympathize with us in the motives that actuate us in carrying on this war? That Constitution for which we are fighting makes them slaves; and yet you now call upon them to assist you in restoring its supremacy. What claim have you upon their services in any such cause? What do you bring them to the field for? Do you believe in your hearts you can ever make soldiers of them? There may have been brave seamen in the Pacific Ocean of the African race, and there may have been a brave company of black men which General Jackson saw fit to compliment after the battle of New Orleans; but do you expect your army of one hundred and fifty thousand blacks will prove to be of that class? Let me tell you that if you do you will be disappointed. You will gain no strength to your army by such means. For every black soldier you may muster into the service, you will disarm more brave soldiers who will think you have degraded them by this sort of military association. You cannot carry into the field, I repeat, an army made up of the African race. The slave is not a soldier, and he cannot be a soldier. It is not in the nature of things.

I protest, then, against the President, Mr. Lincoln, undertaking to garrison our important posts with negro soldiers. They are not safe, and never will be safe. I care not though the forts are in New York or Massachusetts; they are as much mine as they are yours. They belong to the United States, and I protest against their being placed in the hands of such defenders.

But, sir, I do not care so much about the employment of these men in respect to their inefficiency as soldiers as I do in respect to the character their employment will give to the war itself. You put one white man to command a thousand negroes at the South, and will he restrain them? Will it not result in servile war? It will be a servile war led by white men.

The speech of Samuel S. Cox [O.] is representative of the views of the Northern Democrats. On January 30 he spoke against the bill. He declared that those who promoted it were, in so doing, not the true friends of the negro, but rather his enemies.

The Confederate States will not treat our black soldiers as the equals of their white soldiers or of our white soldiers; and the result will be, as many negroes at the North are shrewd enough to foresee, that they will, if captured, receive none of the advantages of the laws of war, but all the terrible consequences of being outlawed from the international code, slavery, imprisonment, and perhaps death. And how, sir, can we retaliate for any such injuries or outrages? As the gentleman from Kansas argued the other day, and as Vattel argued before him, a rebellion, when formidable, demands, in the name of humanity, the observance of the laws of civilized warfare, the laws of moderation and honor. There is a distinct society, organized de facto, in the South; and the laws of war obtain the same as between two nations with regard to prisoners of war. These men in the South have the power, and, although it may have been obtained wrongfully and outrageously, we must legislate on the facts as they exist. We must not shut our eyes to the fact that they are a power so formidable that we cannot, as an act of humanity to our soldiers, refuse to observe the laws of war, not as we would interpret them, but as they also may interpret them. No genuine friend of the negro would try to persuade him to take the position of a soldier in our army, knowing how the Confederate Government has determined to treat negro soldiers. The men who would try to dragoon him into that position are not his friends. The poor negro, if he survive this conflict, will bitterly curse the very men who seem most to champion him, but whose championship has in it more of political consideration than of generous feeling.

Thomas M. Edwards [N. H.].—I understand the gentleman to say that, if these black soldiers in our army should be captured by the enemy and be handed over to the civil authorities to be treated as felons and their lives taken, or any other consequence visited them not known to the rules of civilized warfare, the United States Government would have no remedy.

MR. COX.—What is your remedy?

MR. EDWARDS.—Retaliation.

MR. COX.—Retaliation—that is a rule which will soon turn this into a barbarous war. It has no limit—no law. It has but one end—bloody extermination.

MR. EDWARDS.—I would hang or shoot one of their soldiers every time they hung or shot one of ours.

MR. COX.—Would you have the President retaliate upon white rebels because they abuse the captured negroes? You will answer yes. Then what? Retaliation again from them upon our white soldiers, and so on, until the war becomes unbearable to the Christian world and an outrage upon all civilized codes.

Furthermore, the measure is inadvisable because many white soldiers will not serve when black soldiers are enlisted. We can never eradicate from the great body of the white people of America that prejudice against the black race which has been carried from private life into the public service, and which, if you run counter to it, will destroy the vigor and esprit of the army.

Why, Mr. Speaker, perhaps one-third of our present army is made up of Irishmen. I tell you, sir, these Irishmen will not fight side by side with the negro. You would listen to such warnings if indeed you wished the army to succeed and the Union restored.

The bill was stoutly defended by Republicans, the most typical speech being by Mr. Stevens, mover of the bill, made on February 2.

It is said that we have already so large an army that we have no need of more soldiers, and that this bill will cause a needless expense. Let us look at this. It will require some three or four months to raise one hundred and fifty thousand. By that time, about June, the time of the two years' men of New York and of the nine months' men will expire. They will take from the army, I think, at least three hundred thousand men. How are you to supply their place except by colored soldiers? It is said by our opponents that in the present temper of the country you could not raise in the whole North fifty thousand men by voluntary enlistment, and that to enforce conscription is out of the question. It may be so; and, if it be, it is useless, perhaps, to inquire what has produced this condition of the public mind. No doubt the unhappy management of the war, and want of successful battles, have done something toward it. An unsuccessful war is always unpopular.

Another great cause is the conduct of partisan demagogues. The Democratic leaders—and when I speak of Democrats in these remarks I beg to be understood as not including those true Democrats who support the war and give their aid to the Administration—the Democratic leaders, I say, have been busy for the last year in denouncing the war and the Administration. They tell the people that this is an Abolition war, a war for the negro and not for the Union; that our Southern brethren have been injured and that we ought to lay down our arms and compromise. During the last electioneering campaign throughout Pennsylvania, and I suppose the whole North, when the new volunteers were called for, Democratic leaders traveled everywhere and advised that no Democrat should volunteer, but stay at home and carry the election and regain power. The masses followed their advice; scarcely any Democrats joined the volunteers.

Another thing that has cooled the ardor of the people is the rivalry among the officers and the evident sympathy of a large portion of them with the rebels. Our armies have been in the hands of men who had no heart in the cause and who have demoralized the army; and such demoralization has been transferred to their friends at home. Hence, if we are to continue this war, we must call in the aid of Africans, slaves as well as freemen.

But gentlemen speak boastfully of the power of the white men of the North, and that we have a million men in the field, and need no other aid. Sir, I have as high an opinion of the valor of Northern men as any man can have; but, instead of having a million, I do not believe we have now half that number of effective soldiers. Sickness, the sword, and absenteeism have taken half our troops; and in four months one-fourth more will be taken by the expiration of their time.

But suppose we could recruit our armies by white volunteers, is that any argument against employing blacks? Why should our race be exposed to suffering and disease when the African might endure his equal share of it? Is it wise, is it humane, to send your kindred to battle and to death, when you might put the colored man in the ranks and let him bear a part of the conflict between the rebel and his enfranchised slave? Why should these bloody graves be filled with our relatives rather than with the property of traitors slain by their own masters, who, in their turn, would fall by the hands of the oppressed? I have but little respect for the Northern man who would save the rebels' property at the expense of the life of white men.

We have heard repeated the usual slang of Democrats, so freely and falsely used by them to prejudice the minds of the people, that Republicans are trying to make the black man equal in all things to the white. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Charles A. Wickliffe] and his allies from Ohio have talked of Sambo's commanding white men. Sir, the bill contains no such provisions. They are to be employed only as soldiers or non-commissioned officers as is provided by the original bill and by the amendments as now proposed. I do not expect to live to see the day when, in this Christian land, merit shall counterbalance the crime of color. True, we propose to give them an equal chance to meet death on the battlefield. But even then their great achievements, if equal to those of Dessalines, would give them no hope of honor. The only place where they can find equality is in the grave. There all God's children are equal.

But it is said that our soldiers would object to their employment in arms. It would be a strange taste that would prefer themselves to face the death-bearing heights of Fredericksburg, and be buried in trenches at the foot of them, than to see it done by colored soldiers. I do not believe it. My colleague [Hendrick B. Wright] said that he had heard some of our officers say that if we thus used them they would lay down their arms and retire from the army. In God's name let them go. They are rebels in heart, and ought to be in the Confederate army rather than in ours, to demoralize our soldiers. My colleague ought to report their names to the proper department, that they may be tried and inexorably shot.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Crittenden] objects to their employment lest it should lead to the freedom of the blacks. He says that he fights only for the freedom of his own white race. That sentiment is unworthy the high reputation of the friend and compeer of the great statesman of the West [Henry Clay]. That patriotism that is wholly absorbed by one's own country is narrow and selfish. That philanthropy which embraces only one's own race, and leaves the other numerous races of mankind to bondage and to misery, is cruel and detestable. But we are not fighting for the freedom of the slaves; we are fighting for the life of the nation; and, if in the heat of such strife the chains of the bondman are melted off, I shall thank God all the more. The distinguished, and, I would fain believe, the learned, gentleman from Kentucky exclaimed, "when before did any civilized country call on slaves to fight their battles? When did Sparta, or Athens, or Rome?" I must attribute this interrogative assertion to lack of memory.

I ask when did any civilized nation refuse to use their slaves in the defence of their country when its exigencies required it? Never! All have used them, and uniformly given them their freedom for their services. Sparta and Athens on many occasions armed their Helots. They were always their armor-bearers. That I may not be suspected of speaking without authority I will read a few passages from Roman history. In Arnold's "Rome" it is said:

> "But there is no reason to doubt that Gracchus gained an important victory; and it was rendered famous by his giving liberty to the volunteer slaves, by whose valor it had mainly been won. The soldiers marched back to Beneventum in triumph, and the people poured out to meet them, and entreated Gracchus that they might invite them all to a public entertainment. Tables were set out in the streets, and the freed slaves attracted every one's notice by their white caps, the well-known sign of their enfranchisement. The whole delighted the generous and kind nature of Gracchus; to set free the slave and to relieve the poor, appear to have been hereditary virtues in his family."—Page 205.

How different was the heart of the pagan Gracchus from the heart of the Christian Kentuckian!

But we are told that Kentucky will resist; that our recruiting officers will be driven pell-mell from the State; that the proclamation is unconstitutional; and that we and the President are doing mischief and aggravating the South. Sir, that sounds so exactly like what I was accustomed to hear from that side of the House some years ago, when those seats were occupied by those who are now officers in the rebel army, that I am fain to inquire whether their spirit has not been left behind them.

Two years ago, when I had occasion to address this House, I declared my conviction that neither Congress, nor the Administration, nor the people, realized the magnitude of the war in which we were engaged, and the difficulty of its suppression; that the rebels were as brave as we, and had better generals, who were more in earnest than our own; that men who, after a deliberation of thirty years, had entered upon so perilous an enterprise, involving property, wife and children, and their own lives, would never submit until they were totally exhausted and unable to continue the war; and that that would never be done until you took from them their support—the slaves. I have seen no reason to change my opinion. I have seen two years of bloody war elapse with balanced success. I have seen our debt accumulate to a grievous amount. I have seen many a bleeding heart, many a mother weeping for her slaughtered son, tens of thousands of our neighbors gone to an untimely grave, and the rebels are not yet subdued. And yet we are told that we must not stop the further effusion of white blood by the employment of the oppressed slave against his oppressor. Sir, to which side do such men belong? Are they with the Republic or are they like Cethegus and Lentulus, sitting in the Roman senate, while their associate, Catiline, was with the rebel army outside the walls?

But they say this tends to excite servile war. I believe no such thing. Disciplined troops under the articles of war do not engage in insurrection. But suppose it were so: which is the most cruel, which the most to be deprecated—an exterminating war between the oppressed and his oppressor or a murderous warfare by uninjured citizens against the unoffending Government which had protected them and was the hope of the freedom of the world? Can servile war produce more inhuman scenes than are now enacted by the rebels?

Here the speaker cited murders of innocent negroes committed in cold blood by rebel soldiers.

If a servile war were the only means to save this Republic, I should welcome it as a measure of humanity.

It is said that colored soldiers are cowardly and unfit for battle. But all history contradicts it, from the time of Juba and Syphan and the terrible Numidian cavalry down through our Revolution and the armies of General Jackson to the present time. I send you living evidence in the letter of General Saxton, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 25, 1863.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to report that the organization of the first regiment of South Carolina volunteers is now completed. In no regiment have I ever seen duty performed with so much cheerfulness and alacrity; and as sentinels they are peculiarly vigilant. I have never seen, in any body of men, such enthusiasm and deep-seated devotion to their officers as exist in this; they will surely go wherever they are led. Every man is a volunteer, and seems fully persuaded of the importance of his service to his race.

ALEXANDER S. DIVEN [N. Y.].—Mr. Speaker, in connection with the testimony furnished in favor of the employment of the slave I desire to supply the testimony of the most remarkable man of modern Italy, who, while an exile from his beloved country, with all the ardor of his nature, entered the service of the republicans of Brazil, who were seeking to extricate themselves from the tyranny of the Brazilian emperor. In the description of one of the battles between the republican and imperial parties I find this passage:

"The terrible lancers of Canabarro had already made a movement forward, confusing the right flank of the enemy, which was therefore obliged to change front in confusion. The brave freedmen, proud of their force, became more firm and resolute, and that incomparable corps presented to view a forest of lances, being composed entirely of slaves liberated by the republic and chosen from the best horse tamers in the province, and all of them blacks, even the superior officers. The enemy had never seen the backs of those true sons of liberty. Their lances, which were longer than the common measure, their ebony faces and robust limbs, strengthened by perennial and laborious exercise, and their perfect discipline, struck terror into the enemy."

A MEMBER.—What do you read from?

MR. DIVEN.—From the "Life of Garibaldi," by himself, page 63.

MR. STEVENS.—I believe that if the course which we now propose had been adopted eighteen months ago we should now have peace and universal liberty on this continent. But the timidity of conservatives, the clamor of Democratic demagogues, and the insidious counsels of Kentucky prevented our excellent and kind-hearted President from making stern resolves and using every legitimate means to crush the rebels. Sir, I would not have on my conscience the blood of the tens of thousands who have thus been sacrificed, and which must rest on the souls of its authors, for all the spoils of office, for all the allurements of the presidential chair, nor for all the diamonds that ever glittered in Golconda.

The bill was passed on February 2 by a vote of 83 to 54. The bill then went to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. On February 12 Henry Wilson [Mass.] stated that the committee reported it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do not pass, because the authority intended to be given by it to the President was already conferred on him by the act of July 17, 1862.

BRAVERY OF NEGRO SOLDIERS

President Lincoln from this time on devoted a large part of his energy to enlisting negro troops, his old fear that the former slaves would make inefficient soldiers having been outweighed by consideration of the great moral force of the policy. To Governor Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, who was contemplating the raising in his State of a negro military force, he wrote on March 26, 1863:

In my opinion the country now needs no specific thing so much as some man of your ability and position to go to this work. When I speak of your position I mean that of an eminent citizen of a slave State and himself a slaveholder. The colored population is the great available and yet unavailed of force for restoring the Union. The bare sight of fifty thousand armed and drilled black soldiers upon the banks of the Mississippi would end the rebellion at once; and who doubts that we can present that sight if we but take hold in earnest? If you have been thinking of it, please do not dismiss the thought.

As we have seen, General David Hunter had already organized negro troops in his department. From the beginning the experiment was an unqualified success. It was a pleasure to the President that he could now write a letter of congratulation to the Abolitionist general whom less than a year before he had been compelled to reprimand for his premature act of emancipation.

I am glad to see the accounts of your colored force at Jacksonville, Fla. I see the enemy are driving at them fiercely, as is to be expected. It is important to the enemy that such a force shall not take shape and grow and thrive in the South, and in precisely the same proportion it is important to us that it shall. Hence the utmost caution and vigilance are necessary on our part. The enemy will make extra efforts to destroy them, and we should do the same to preserve and increase them.

In all their subsequent battles the negro soldiers acquitted themselves with such valor that in the war reports the sentence, "the colored troops fought bravely," became a stock expression.

On the occasion of their soldierly conduct at the assault of Port Hudson late in May, 1863, George Henry Boker wrote a poem called "The Black Regiment," in which he extolled their patriotism and pleaded for their recognition as comrades by the white soldiers.

"Freedom!" their battlecry,—
"Freedom! or leave to die!"
Ah! and they meant the word,
Not as with us 'tis heard,
Not a mere party shout;
They gave their spirits out,
. . . . .
Hundreds on hundreds fell;
. . . . .
Oh, to the living few,
Soldiers, be just and true,
Hail them as comrades tried;
Fight with them side by side;
Never, in field or tent,
Scorn the black regiment!

On June 1, 1863, through Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, the President made a tentative offer to General Frémont to place him in command of all the negro troops to be raised. The offer was not accepted. Had it been, Frémont at the close of the war would have commanded an army of almost 200,000 men, second in number only to Grant's.

EMPLOYMENT OF NEGROES BY THE CONFEDERATES

As early as June 1, 1861, negroes were employed by the secessionists in constructing fortifications at Charleston, S. C. As soon as Virginia went out of the Union free negro volunteers were accepted in that State.

On June 28, 1861, after the legislature of Tennessee had formed a military alliance with the Confederacy, it authorized the governor, Isham G. Harris, "to receive into the military service of the State all male free persons of color, between the ages of 15 and 50," paying each $8 per month, with clothing and rations. It was further enacted that, if sufficient volunteers did not present themselves the sheriffs should press enough of such persons to make up the required number. Early in September it was announced in the Memphis Ava-

"O MASSA JEFF, DIS SECESH FEVER WILL KILL DE NIGGER!"
From the collection of the New York Historical Society

lanche that many negroes had volunteered for such service, and, armed and equipped with shovels, axes, blankets, etc., and under the leadership of white officers, were marching through the streets shouting for Jeff. Davis and singing war songs. In very sinister fashion the paper added: "Their destination is unknown, but it is supposed that they are on their way to the 'other side of Jordan.'"

About this time Alabama organized free negro volunteers, one regiment consisting of as many as 1,400.

In February, 1862, the Confederate legislature of Virginia passed a bill to enroll in the military service all the free negroes in the State.

Retaliation

In despite of these acts, when President Lincoln's preliminary emancipation proclamation appeared on September 22, 1862, the Confederate authorities exhibited great indignation over what they charged to be a deliberate purpose of the Union Government to incite a servile insurrection in the South. On October 13 General Pierre G. T. Beauregard wrote to a Confederate congressman at Richmond:

> Has the bill for the execution of abolition prisoners, after January next, been passed? Do it, and England will be stirred into action. It is high time to proclaim the black flag after that period. Let the execution be with the garrote.

On December 23 Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy, proclaimed the outlawry of the Union generals who had enlisted negroes as soldiers, and decreed that all slaves and their white officers captured in arms be turned over to the State governors to be dealt with according to law. In his third annual message to his Congress on January 12, 1863, he stigmatized the final proclamation as a violation of President Lincoln's inaugural pledge and the platform on which he had been elected. He added:

> It has established a state of things which can lead to but one of three possible consequences—the extermination of the slaves, the exile of the whole white population of the Confederacy, or absolute and total separation of these States from the United States. This proclamation is also an authentic statement by the Government of the United States of its inability to subjugate the South by force of arms, and, as such, must be accepted by neutral nations, which can no longer find any justification in withholding our just claims to formal recognition. It is also, in effect, an intimation to the people of the North that they must prepare to submit to a separation, now become inevitable; for that people are too acute not to understand that a restitution > of the Union has been rendered forever impossible by the adoption of a measure which, from its very nature, neither admits of retraction nor can coexist with union.

But the passage which more especially concerns negro soldiers is the following:

> We may well leave it to the instincts of that common humanity which a beneficent Creator has implanted in the breasts of our fellowmen of all countries to pass judgment on a measure by which several millions of human beings of an inferior race—peaceful and contented laborers in their sphere—are doomed to extermination, while at the same time they are encouraged to a general assassination of their masters by the insidious recommendation to abstain from violence unless in necessary self-defence. Our own detestation of those who have attempted the most execrable measures recorded in the history of guilty man is tempered by profound contempt for the impotent rage which it discloses. So far as regards the action of this government on such criminals as may attempt its execution, I confine myself to informing you that I shall—unless in your wisdom you deem some other course more expedient—deliver to the several State authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured by our forces in any of the States embraced in the proclamation, that they may be dealt with in accordance with the laws of those States providing for the punishment of criminals engaged in exciting servile insurrection. The enlisted soldiers I shall continue to treat as unwilling instruments in the commission of these crimes, and shall direct their discharge and return to their homes on the proper and usual parole.

The Confederate Congress took up the subject soon afterward, and, after protracted consideration, ultimately disposed of it by passing the following resolution:

> Sec. 1. That, in the opinion of Congress, the commissioned officers of the enemy ought not to be delivered to the authorities of the respective States, as suggested in the said message, but all captives taken by the Confederate forces ought to be dealt with and disposed of by the Confederate Government.
> Sec. 2. That, in the judgment of Congress, the proclamations of the President of the United States and the other measures of the Government of the United States and of its authorities, commanders, and forces, designed or tending to emancipate slaves in the Confederate States, or to abduct such slaves, or to incite them to insurrection, or to employ negroes in war against the Confederate States, or to overthrow the institution of African slavery, and bring on a servile war in these States, would, if successful, produce atrocious consequences, and that they are inconsistent with the spirit of those usages which, in modern warfare, prevail among civilized nations; they may, therefore, be properly and lawfully repressed by retaliation.

By Section 3 President Davis was authorized to "cause full and ample retaliation to be made for every such violation, in such manner and to such extent as he may think proper."

By Sections 4, 5, and 6 white officers of negro troops in the service of the Union, or those inciting the slaves to rise against their masters, were, if captured, to be put to death, or be otherwise punished at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 7. All negroes taken in arms against the Confederate States or who shall give aid or comfort to the enemies of the Confederate States shall, when captured, be delivered to the State authorities, to be dealt with according to the present or future laws of such State.

Some of the leading rebel journals, says Horace Greeley in his "American Conflict," on reflection admitted that this was unjustifiable—that the Confederacy could not prescribe the color of citizens of the free States, never in bondage at the South, whom our Government might justifiably employ as soldiers. But the resolve nevertheless stood for years, if not to the last, unrepealed and unmodified, and was the primary, fundamental impediment whereby the exchange of prisoners between the belligerents was first interrupted; so that tens of thousands languished for weary months in prison-camps, where many thousands died of exposure and starvation.

Secretary Stanton, having learned that three Union black soldiers captured with the gunboat Isaac Smith at Stone River had been placed in close confinement, ordered three South Carolinian prisoners to be treated likewise, and the fact to be communicated to the Confederate leaders. The Richmond Examiner, commenting on this resolution, said:

It is not merely the pretention of a regular government affecting to deal with rebels, but it is a deadly stab which they are aiming at our institutions themselves—because they know that, if we were insane enough to yield this point, to treat black men as the equals of white, and insurgent slaves as equivalent to our brave soldiers, the very foundation of slavery would be fatally wounded.

After one of the conflicts before Charleston an immediate exchange of prisoners was agreed on, but when the Union prisoners came to be received only whites made their appearance. A remonstrance against this breach of faith was met by a plea of want of power to surrender blacks taken in arms because of the resolve of the Confederate Congress just quoted. This caused President Lincoln, on July 30, 1863, to issue a general order:

"It is the duty of every government to give protection to its citizens, of whatever class, color, or condition, and especially to those who are duly organized as soldiers in the public service. The law of nations and the usages and customs of war, as carried on by civilized powers, permit no distinction as to color in the treatment of prisoners of war as public enemies. To sell or enslave any captured person on account of his color, and for no offence against the laws of war, is a relapse into barbarism, and a crime against the civilization of the age.

"The Government of the United States will give the same protection to all its soldiers; and, if the enemy shall sell or enslave anyone because of his color, the offence shall be punished by retaliation upon the enemy's prisoners in our possession.

"It is therefore ordered that, for every soldier of the United States killed in violation of the laws of war, a rebel soldier shall be executed; and for every one enslaved by the enemy or sold into slavery, a rebel soldier shall be placed at hard labor on public works, and continued at such labor until the other shall be released and receive the treatment due to a prisoner of war."

Either the threat of the Confederates was an idle one, or Lincoln's order deterred them from putting it into execution, for with but one important exception they gave negroes captured in battle the same treatment that was accorded white prisoners. At the storming of Fort Pillow, Tennessee, on April 12, 1863, the Confederate General Forrest massacred at least three hundred of the garrison, most of them negroes and their white officers, after these soldiers had thrown down their arms.

A rumor of this act came to the President just before he delivered an address at a sanitary fair in Baltimore on April 18, 1864, and in his speech he solemnly promised that if the charge against Forrest proved upon investigation to be true retribution would be surely executed. He said:

There seems to be some anxiety in the public mind whether the Government is doing its duty to the colored soldier, and to the service, at this point. At the beginning of the war and for some time the use of colored troops was not contemplated; and how the change of purpose was wrought I will not now take time to explain. Upon a clear conviction of duty I resolved to turn that element of strength to account; and I am responsible for it to the American people, to the Christian world, to history, and in my final account to God. Having determined to use the negro as a soldier, there is no way but to give him all the protection given to any other soldier. . . . If, after all that has been said it shall turn out that there has been no massacre at Fort Pillow, it will be almost safe to say there has been none, and will be none, elsewhere. If there has been the massacre of three hundred there, or even the tenth part of three hundred, it will be conclusively proved; and, being so proved, the retribution shall as surely come. It will be a matter of grave consideration in what exact course to apply the retribution; but in the supposed case it must come.

A congressional investigation found that the rumor was true, and had not been exaggerated. Yet the brutality revealed was so monstrous that the tender-hearted President refrained, in spite of his promise, from a retribution which, to be effective, would have to be coextensive with the offence, and, because visited in cold blood upon innocent prisoners, would be even more brutal than the massacre, which was perpetrated in the blood-lust of conquest.

Accordingly, the public interest being concentrated at the time on the bloody Wilderness campaign of Grant in Virginia, the Fort Pillow incident was allowed by the Government to pass without action upon it.

Toward the end of the war, when the collapse of the rebellion was in plain sight, the Confederate Government debated the question of arming the slaves; the measure failed by one vote. Mr. Lincoln expressed his sentiments upon this unique phase of the conflict begun in defence of slavery in a speech on the occasion of a presentation of a captured rebel flag to Governor Morton of Indiana.

While I have often said that all men ought to be free, yet would I allow those colored persons to be slaves who want to be, and next to them those white people who argue in favor of making other people slaves. I am in favor of giving an appointment to such white men to try it on for these slaves. I will say one thing in regard to the negro being employed to fight for them. I do know he cannot fight and stay at home and make bread too. And, as one is about as important as the other to them, I don't care which they do. I am rather in favor of having them try them as soldiers. They lack one vote of doing that, and I wish I could send my vote over the river so that I might cast it in favor of allowing the negro to fight. But they cannot fight and work both. We now see the bottom of the enemy's resources.

CHAPTER X

"The War Is a Failure"

Clement L. Vallandigham [O.] Speaks in the House on the Failure of the War, and Demands Armistice with the Confederacy to Arrange Terms of Peace—Reply by John A. Bingham [O.] Declaring the Union Is Worth the Costliest Sacrifice of Blood and Treasure to Maintain It—Lincoln's Gettysburg Speech: "These Dead Shall Not Have Died in Vain"—Second Election of Lincoln—His Inaugural Address on the Prosecution of the War: "The Almighty Has His Purposes."

THE Union disaster at Fredericksburg (December 11-12, 1862) and the strong resistance of the Confederates at Vicksburg, overweighing in popular opinion the costly Union victory at Stone River (December 30, 1862–January 4, 1863), caused the Opposition in Congress to inaugurate its peace policy—the view that the "war is a failure," "the South cannot be conquered," and therefore that the Government should speedily make the best terms it could with the enemy.

On January 14, 1863, Clement L. Vallandigham [O.] spoke as follows in the House:

Peace and Reunion

Clement L. Vallandigham, M. C.

Sir, twenty months have elapsed, but the rebellion is not crushed out; its military power has not been broken; the insurgents have not dispersed. The Union is not restored; nor the Constitution maintained; nor the laws enforced. A thousand millions have been expended and three hundred thousand lives lost or bodies mangled; and to-day the Confederate flag is still near the Potomac and the Ohio, and the Confederate Government stronger, many times, than at the beginning. Not a State has been restored, not any part of any State has voluntarily redirect and indirect, has been inaugurated, the most onerous and unjust ever imposed upon any but a conquered people.

Money and credit, then, you have had in prodigal profusion. And were men wanted? More than a million rushed to arms! Seventy-five thousand first (and the country stood aghast at the multitude), then eighty-three thousand more were demanded; and three hundred and ten thousand responded to the call. The President next asked for four hundred thousand, and Congress, in its generous confidence, gave him five hundred thousand; and, not to be outdone, he took six hundred and thirty-seven thousand. Half of these melted away in their first campaign; and the President demanded three hundred thousand more for the war, and then drafted yet another three hundred thousand for nine months. The fabled hosts of Xerxes have been outnumbered. And yet victory strangely follows the standards of the foe. From Great Bethel to Vicksburg, the battle has not been to the strong. Yet every disaster, except the last, has been followed by a call for more troops, and every time so far they have been promptly furnished. From the beginning the war has been conducted like a political campaign, and it has been the folly of the party in power that they have assumed that numbers alone would win the field in a contest not with ballots but with musket and sword. Yet after nearly two years of more vigorous prosecution of war than ever recorded in history; after more skirmishes, combats, and battles than Alexander, Cæsar, or the first Napoleon ever fought in any five years of their military career, you have utterly, signally, disastrously—I will not say ignominiously—failed to subdue ten millions of "rebels," whom you had taught the people of the North and West not only to hate but to despise. Rebels, did I say? Yes, your fathers were rebels, or your grandfathers. He who now before me on canvas looks down so sadly upon us, the false, degenerate, and imbecile guardians of the great Republic which he founded, was a rebel. And yet we, cradled ourselves in rebellion, and who have fostered and fraternized with every insurrection in the nineteenth century everywhere throughout the globe, would now, forsooth, make the word "rebel" a reproach. Rebels certainly they are; but all the persistent and stupendous efforts of the most gigantic warfare of modern times have, through your incompetency and folly, availed nothing to crush them out, cut off though they have been by your blockade from all the world, and dependent only upon their own courage and resources. And yet they were to be utterly conquered and subdued in six weeks or three months! Sir, my judgment was turned to the Union. And has anything been wanting that Congress, or the States, or the people in their most generous enthusiasm, their most impassioned patriotism, could bestow? Was it power? And did not the party of the Executive control the entire Federal Government, every State government, every county, every city, town, and village in the North and West? Was it patronage? All belonged to it. Was it influence? What more? Did not the school, the college, the church, the press, the secret orders, the municipality, the corporation (railroads, telegraphs, express companies), the voluntary association, all, all yield it to the utmost? Was it unanimity? Never was an Administration so supported in England or America. Five men and half a score of newspapers made up the opposition. Was it enthusiasm? The enthusiasm was fanatical. There has been nothing like it since the Crusades. Was it confidence? Sir, the faith of the people exceeded that of the patriarch. They gave up Constitution, law, right, liberty, all at your demand for arbitrary power that the rebellion might, as you promised, be crushed out in three months and the Union restored. Was credit needed? You took control of a country, young, vigorous, and inexhaustible in wealth and resources, and a Government almost free from public debt, and whose good faith had never been tarnished. Your great national loan bubble failed miserably, as it deserved to fail; but the bankers and merchants of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston lent you more than their entire banking capital. And when that failed, too, you forced credit by declaring your paper promises to pay a legal tender for all debts. Was money wanted? You had all the revenues of the United States, diminished, indeed, but still in gold. The whole wealth of the country, to the last dollar, lay at your feet. Private individuals, municipal corporations, the State governments, all in their frenzy gave you money or means with reckless prodigality. The great Eastern cities lent you $150,000,000. Congress voted first $250,000,000 and next $500,000,000 more in loans; and then first $50,000,000, then $10,000,000; next $90,000,000, and in July last $150,000,000 in treasury notes; and the Secretary has issued also a paper "postage currency," in sums as low as five cents, limited in amount only by his discretion. Nay, more: already since the 4th of July, 1861, this House has appropriated $2,017,864,000, almost every dollar without debate and without a recorded vote. A thousand millions have been expended since the 15th of April, 1861; and a public debt or liability of $1,500,000,000 already incurred. And to support all this stupendous outlay and indebtedness a system of taxation, made up and expressed from the first. I learned it from Chatham: "My lords, you cannot conquer America." And you have not conquered the South. You never will. It is not in the nature of things possible; much less under your auspices. But money you have expended without limit, and blood poured out like water. Defeat, debt, taxation, sepulchers, these are your trophies. In vain the people gave you treasure and the soldier yielded up his life. "Fight, tax, emancipate, let these," said the gentleman from Maine [Frederick A. Pike] at the last session, "be the trinity of our salvation." Sir, they have become the trinity of your deep damnation. The war for the Union is, in your hands, a most bloody and costly failure. The President confessed it on the 22d of September, solemnly, officially, and under the broad seal of the United States. And he has now repeated the confession. The priests and rabbis of abolition taught him that God would not prosper such a cause. War for the Union was abandoned; war for the negro openly begun, and with stronger battalions than before. With what success? Let the dead at Fredericksburg and Vicksburg answer.

And now, sir, can this war continue? Whence the money to carry it on? Where the men? Can you borrow? From whom? Can you tax more? Will the people bear it? Wait till you have collected what is already levied. How many millions more of "legal tender"—to-day forty-seven per cent. below the par of gold—can you float? Will men enlist now at any price? Ah, sir, it is easier to die at home. I beg pardon; but I trust I am not "discouraging enlistments." If I am, then first arrest Lincoln, Stanton, and Halleck, and some of your other generals; and I will retract; yes, I will recant. But can you draft again? Ask New England—New York. Ask Massachusetts. Where are the nine hundred thousand? Ask not Ohio—the Northwest. She thought you were in earnest, and gave you all, all—more than you demanded.

> "The wife whose babe first smiled that day,
> The fair, fond bride of yester eve,
> And aged sire and matron gray,
> Saw the loved warriors haste away,
> And deemed it sin to grieve."

Sir, in blood she has atoned for her credulity; and now there is mourning in every house and distress and sadness in every heart. Shall she give you any more?

But ought this war to continue? I answer, no—not a day, not an hour. What then? Shall we separate? Again I answer, no, no, no! What then? And now, sir, I come to the grandest and most solemn problem of statesmanship from the beginning of time; and to the God of Heaven, Illuminer of hearts and minds, I would humbly appeal for some measure, at least, of light and wisdom and strength to explore and reveal the dark but possible future of this land.

CAN THE UNION OF THESE STATES BE RESTORED? HOW SHALL IT BE DONE?

And why not? Is it historically impossible? Sir, the frequent civil wars and conflicts between the states of Greece did not prevent their cordial union to resist the Persian invasion; nor did even the thirty years' Peloponnesian war, springing in part, from the abduction of slaves, and embittered and disastrous as it was—let Thucydides speak—wholly destroy the fellowship of those states. The wise Romans ended the three years' social war after many bloody battles and much atrocity by admitting the states of Italy to all the rights and privileges of Roman citizenship—the very object to secure which these States had taken up arms. The border wars between Scotland and England, running through centuries, did not prevent the final union, in peace and by adjustment, of the two kingdoms under one monarch. Compromise did at last what ages of coercion and attempted conquest had failed to effect. England kept the crown, while Scotland gave the king to wear it; and the memories of Wallace and the Bruce of Bannockburn became part of the glories of British history. I pass by the union of Ireland with England—a union of force, which God and just men abhor; and yet precisely "the Union as it should be" of the abolitionists of America. Sir, the rivalries of the houses of York and Lancaster filled all England with cruelty and slaughter; yet compromise and intermarriage ended the strife at last, and the white rose and the red were blended in one. Who dreamed a month before the death of Cromwell that in two years the people of England, after twenty years of civil war and usurpation, would, with great unanimity, restore the house of Stuart in the person of its most worthless prince, whose father but eleven years before they had beheaded? And who could have foretold in the beginning of 1812 that within some three years Napoleon would be in exile upon a desert island and the Bourbons restored? Armed foreign intervention did it; but it is a strange history. Or who, then, expected to see a nephew of Napoleon, thirty-five years later, with the consent of the people, supplant the Bourbon and reign Emperor of France? Sir, many states and people, once separate, have become united in the course of ages through natural causes and without conquest, but I remember a single instance only in history of states or people once united, and speaking the same language, who have been forced permanently asunder by civil strife or war, unless they were separated by distance or vast natural boundaries. The secession of the Ten Tribes is the exception: these parted without actual war; and their subsequent history is not encouraging to secession. But when Moses, the greatest of all statesmen, would secure a distinct nationality and government to the Hebrews, he left Egypt and established his people in a distant country. In modern times the Netherlands, three centuries ago, won their independence by the sword; but France and the English Channel separated them from Spain. So did our Thirteen Colonies; but the Atlantic Ocean divorced us from England. So did Mexico and other Spanish colonies in America; but the same ocean divided them from Spain. Cuba and the Canadas still adhere to the parent government. And who now, North or South, in Europe or America, looking into history, shall presumptiously say that because of civil war the reunion of these States is impossible? War, indeed, while it lasts, is disunion, and, if it lasts long enough, will be final, eternal separation first and anarchy and despotism afterward. Hence I would hasten peace now, to-day, by every honorable appliance.

Are there physical causes which render reunion impracticable? None. Where other causes do not control, rivers unite; but mountains, deserts, and great bodies of water—oceani dissociabiles[1]—separate a people. Vast forests originally and the lakes now also divide us—not very widely or wholly—from the Canadas, though we speak the same language and are similar in manners, laws, and institutions. Our chief navigable rivers run from north to south. Most of our bays and arms of the sea take the same direction. So do our ranges of mountains. Natural causes all tend to Union, except as between the Pacific Coast and the country east of the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic. It is "manifest destiny." Union is empire. Hence, hitherto we have continually extended our territory, and the Union with it, south and west. The Louisiana purchase, Florida, and Texas all attest it. We passed desert and forest, and scaled even the Rocky Mountains, to extend the Union to the Pacific. Sir, there is no natural boundary between the North and the South, and no line of latitude upon which to separate; and if ever a line of longititude shall be established it will be east of the Mississippi valley. The Alleghanies are no longer a barrier. Highways ascend them everywhere, and the railroad now climbs their summits and spans their chasms, or penetrates their rockiest sides. The electric telegraph follows, and, stretching its connecting wires along the clouds, there mingles its vocal lightnings with the fires of heaven.

And now, sir, is there any difference of race here so radical as to forbid reunion? I do not refer to the negro race, styled now, in unctuous official phrase by the President, "Americans of African descent." Certainly, sir, there are two white races in the United States, both from the same common stock, and yet so distinct—one of them so peculiar—that they develop different forms of civilization, and might belong, almost, to different types of mankind. But the boundary of these two races is not at all marked by the line which divides the slaveholding from the non-slaveholding States. If race is to be the geographical limit of disunion, then Mason and Dixon's can never be the line.

Speaking of the natural causes which had formed the Union, Mr. Vallandigham said:

And now, sir, what one of them is wanting? What one diminished? On the contrary, many of them are stronger today than in the beginning. Migration and intermarriage have strengthened the ties of consanguinity. Commerce, trade, and production have immensely multiplied. Cotton, almost unknown here in 1787, is now the chief product and export of the country. It has set in motion three-fourths of the spindles of New England, and given employment, directly or remotely, to full half the shipping, trade, and commerce of the United States. More than that: cotton has kept the peace between England and America for thirty years; and, had the people of the North been as wise and practical as the statesmen of Great Britain, it would have maintained Union and peace here. But we are being taught in our first century and at our own cost the lessons which England learned through the long and bloody experience of eight hundred years. We shall be wiser next time. Let not cotton be king, but peacemaker, and inherit the blessing.

A common interest, then, still remains to us. And union for the common defence, at the end of this war, taxed, indebted, impoverished, exhausted, as both sections must be, and with foreign fleets and armies around us, will be fifty-fold more essential than ever before. And finally, sir, without union, our domestic tranquility must forever remain unsettled. If it cannot be maintained within the Union, how, then, outside of it, without an exodus or colonization of the people of the one section or the other to a distant country? Sir, I repeat that two governments so interlinked and bound together every way by physical and social ligaments cannot exist in peace without a common arbiter. Will treaties bind us? What better treaty than the Constitution? What more solemn, more durable? Shall we settle our disputes, then, by arbitration and compromise? Sir, let us arbitrate and compromise now, inside of the Union. Certainly it will be quite as easy.

And now, sir, to all these original causes and motives which impelled to union at first must be added certain artificial ligaments which eighty years of association under a common Government have most fully developed. Chief among these are canals, steam navigation, railroads, express companies, the post-office, the newspaper press, and that terrible agent of good and evil mixed—"spirit of health, and yet goblin damned"—if free, the gentlest minister of truth and liberty; when enslaved, the supplest instrument of falsehood and tyranny—the magnetic telegraph. All these have multiplied the speed or the quantity of trade, travel, communication, migration, and intercourse of all kinds between the different States and sections; and thus, so long as a healthy condition of the body-politic continued, they became powerful cementing agencies of union. The numerous voluntary associations, artistic, literary, charitable, social, and scientific, until corrupted and made fanatical; the various ecclesiastical organizations, until they divided; and the political parties, so long as they remained all national and not sectional, were also among the strong ties which bound us together. And yet all of these, perverted and abused for some years in the hands of bad or fanatical men, became still more powerful instrumentalities in the fatal work of disunion; just as the veins and arteries of the human body, designed to convey the vitalizing fluid through every part of it, will carry also, and with increased rapidity, it may be, the subtle poison which takes life away.

Nor is this all. It was through their agency that the imprisoned winds of civil war were all let loose at first with such sudden and appalling fury; and, kept in motion by political power, they have ministered to that fury ever since. But, potent alike for good and evil, they may yet, under the control of the people, and in the hands of wise, good, and patriotic men, be made the most effective agencies, under Providence, in the reunion of these States.

Other ties also, less material in their nature, but hardly less persuasive in their influence, have grown up under the Union. Long association, a common history, national reputation, treaties and diplomatic intercourse abroad, admission of new States, a common jurisprudence, great men whose names and fame are the patrimony of the whole country, patriotic music and songs, common battlefields, and glory won under the same flag. These make up the poetry of union; and yet, as in the marriage relation and the family with similar influences, they are stronger than hooks of steel. He was a wise statesman, though he may never have held an office, who said, "Let me write the songs of a people and I care not who makes their laws." Why is the "Marseillaise" prohibited in France? Sir, "Hail Columbia" and the "Star Spangled Banner"—Pennsylvania gave us one and Maryland the other—have done more for the Union than all the legislation and all the debates in this Capitol for forty years; and they will do more yet again than all your armies, though you call out another million men into the field. Sir, I would add "Yankee Doodle"; but first let me be assured that Yankee Doodle loves the Union more than he hates the slaveholder.[1]

What, then, I ask, is the immediate, direct cause of disunion and this civil war? Slavery, it is answered. Sir, that is the philosophy of the rustic in the play—"that a great cause of the night is lack of the sun." Certainly slavery was in one sense—very obscure indeed—the cause of the war. Had there been no slavery here, this particular war about slavery would never have been waged. But far better say that the negro is the cause of the war; for, had there been no negro here, there would be no war just now. What then? Exterminate him? Who demands it? Colonize him? How? Where? When? At whose cost? Sir, let us have an end of this folly.

But slavery is the cause of the war. Why? Because the South obstinately and wickedly refused to restrict or abolish it at the demand of the philosophers or fanatics and demagogues of the North and West. Then, sir, it was abolition, the purpose to abolish or interfere with and hem in slavery, which caused disunion and war. Slavery is only the subject, but abolition the cause, of this civil war. I will not be stopped by that cry of mingled fanaticism and hypocrisy about the sin and barbarism of African slavery. Sir, I see more of barbarism and sin, a thousand times, in the continuance of this war, the dissolution of the Union, the breaking up of this Government, and the enslavement of the white race by debt and taxes and arbitrary power. The day of fanatics and sophists and enthusiasts, thank God, is gone at last; and though the age of chivalry may not, the age of practical statesmanship is about to return. Sir, there is fifty-fold less of anti-slavery sentiment to-day in the West than there was two years ago; and, if this war be continued, there will be still less a year hence. The people there begin, at last, to comprehend that domestic slavery in the South is a question, not of morals, or religion, or humanity, but a form of labor, perfectly compatible with the dignity of free white labor in the same community, and with national vigor, power, and prosperity, and especially with military strength. They have learned, or begin to learn, that the evils of the system affect the master alone, or the community and State in which it exists; and that we of the free States partake of all the material benefits of the institution, unmixed with any part of its mischiefs. They believe also in the subordination of the negro race to the white where they both exist together, and that the condition of subordination, as established in the South, is far better every way for the negro than the hard servitude of poverty, degradation, and crime to which he is subjected in the free States. All this, sir, may be "pro-slaveryism," if there be such a word. Perhaps it is; but the people of the West begin now to think it wisdom and good sense. We will not establish slavery in our own midst; neither will we abolish or interfere with it outside of our own limits.

Sir, you cannot abolish slavery by the sword; still less by proclamations, though the President were to "proclaim" every month. Of what possible avail was his proclamation of September? Did the South submit? Was she even alarmed? And yet he has now fulmined another "bull against the comet"—brutum fulmen—and, threatening servile insurrection with all its horrors, has yet coolly appealed to the judgment of mankind, and invoked the blessing of the God of peace and love! But declaring it a military necessity, an essential measure of war to subdue the rebels, yet, with admirable wisdom, he expressly exempts from its operation the only States and parts of States in the South where he has the military power to execute it.

Neither, sir, can you abolish slavery by argument. As well attempt to abolish marriage or the relation of paternity. The South is resolved to maintain it at every hazard and by every sacrifice; and if "this Union cannot endure part slave and part free," then it is already and finally dissolved. Talk not to me of "West Virginia." Tell me not of Missouri, trampled under the feet of your soldiery. As well talk to me of Ireland. Sir, the destiny of those States must abide the issue of the war. But Kentucky you may find tougher. And Maryland—

"E'en in her ashes live their wonted fires."

Nor will Delaware be found wanting in the day of trial.

But I deny the doctrine. It is full of disunion and civil war. It is disunion itself. Whoever first taught it ought to be dealt with as not only hostile to the Union, but an enemy of the human race. Sir, the fundamental idea of the Constitution is the perfect and eternal compatibility of a union of States "part slave and part free"; else the Constitution never would have been framed nor the Union founded; and seventy years of successful experiment have approved the wisdom of the plan. In my deliberate judgment a confederacy made up of slaveholding and non-slaveholding States is, in the nature of things, the strongest of all popular governments. African slavery has been, and is, eminently conservative. It makes the absolute political equality of the white race everywhere practicable. It dispenses with the English order of nobility, and leaves every white man, North and South, owning slaves or owning none, the equal of every other white man. It has reconciled universal suffrage throughout the free States with the stability of government.

What, then, sir, with so many causes impelling to reunion, keeps us apart to-day? Hate, passion, antagonism, revenge, all heated seven times hotter by war. Sir, these, while they last, are the most powerful of all motives with a people, and with the individual man; but fortunately they are least durable. They hold a divided sway in the same bosoms with the nobler qualities of love, justice, reason, placability; and, except when at their height, are weaker than the sense of interest, and always, in States at least, give way to it at last. No statesman who yields himself up to them can govern wisely or well; and no State whose policy is controlled by them can either prosper or endure. But war is both their offspring and their ailment, and while it lasts all other motives are subordinate. The virtues of peace cannot flourish, cannot even find development in the midst of fighting; and this civil war keeps in motion the centrifugal forces of the Union, and gives to them increased strength and activity every day. But such, and so many and powerful, in my judgment, are the cementing or centripetal agencies impelling us together that nothing but perpetual war and strife can keep us always divided.

And now, sir, if it be the will of all sections to unite, then upon what terms? Sir, between the South and most of the States of the North, and all of the West, there is but one subject in controversy—slavery. It is the only question, said Mr. Calhoun twenty-five years ago, of sufficient magnitude and potency to divide this Union; and divide it it will, he added, or drench the country in blood if not arrested. It has done both. But settle it on the original basis of the Constitution, and give to each section the power to protect itself within the Union, and now, after the terrible lessons of the past two years, the Union will be stronger than before, and, indeed, endure for ages. Woe to the man, North or South, who, to the third or fourth generation, should teach men disunion.

And now the way to reunion: what so easy? Behold to-day two separate governments in one country, and without a natural dividing line; with two presidents and cabinets, and a double congress; and yet each under a constitution so exactly similar, the one to the other, that a stranger could scarce discern the difference. Was ever folly and madness like this? Sir, it is not in the nature of things that it should so continue long.

But why speak of ways or terms of reunion now? The will is yet wanting in both sections. Union is consent and good will and fraternal affection. War is force, hate, revenge. Is the country tired at last of war? Has the experiment been tried long enough? Has sufficient blood been shed, treasure expended, and misery inflicted in both the North and the South? What then? Stop fighting. Make an armistice—no formal treaty. Withdraw your army from the seceded States. Reduce both armies to a fair and sufficient peace establishment. Declare absolute free trade between the North and South. Buy and sell. Agree upon a zollverein. Recall your fleets. Break up your blockade. Reduce your navy. Restore travel. Open up railroads. Reëstablish the telegraph. Reunite your express companies. No more Monitors and ironclads, but set your friendly steamers and steam ships again in motion. Visit the North and West. Visit the South. Exchange newspapers. Migrate. Intermarry. Let slavery alone. Hold elections at the appointed times. Let us choose a new President in sixty-four. And when the gospel of peace shall have descended again from Heaven into their hearts, and the gospel of abolition and of hate been expelled, let your clergy and the churches meet again in Christian intercourse, North and South. Let the secret orders and voluntary associations everywhere reunite as brethren once more. In short, give to all the natural and all the artificial causes which impel us together their fullest sway. Let time do his office—drying tears, dispelling sorrows, mellowing passion, and making herb and grass and tree to grow again upon the hundred battlefields of this terrible war.

"But this is recognition." It is not formal recognition, to which I will not consent. Recognition now, and attempted permanent treaties about boundary, travel, and trade, and partition of Territories, would end in a war fiercer and more disastrous than before. Recognition is absolute disunion; and not between the slave and the free States, but with Delaware and Maryland as part of the North and Kentucky and Missouri part of the West. But wherever the actual line, every evil and mischief of disunion is implied in it. And for similar reasons, sir, I would not at this time press hastily a convention of the States. The men who now would hold seats in such a convention would, upon both sides, if both agreed to attend, come together full of the hate and bitterness inseparable from a civil war. No, sir; let passion have time to cool and reason to resume its sway. It cost thirty years of desperate and most wicked patience and industry to destroy or impair the magnificent temple of this Union. Let us be content if within three years we shall be able to restore it.

But certainly what I propose is informal, practical recognition. And that is precisely what exists to-day, and has existed, more or less defined, from the first. Flags of truce, exchange of prisoners, and all your other observances of the laws, forms, and courtesies of war are acts of recognition. Sir, does any man doubt to-day that there is a Confederate Government at Richmond, and that it is a "belligerent"? Even the Secretary of State has discovered it at last, though he has written ponderous folios of polished rhetoric to prove that it is not. Will continual war, then, without extended and substantial success, make the Confederate States any the less a government in fact?

"But it confesses disunion." Yes, just as the surgeon who sets your fractured limb in splints, in order that it may be healed, admits that it is broken. "But the Government will have failed to 'crush out the rebellion.'" Sir, it has failed. You went to war to prove that we had a Government. With what result? To the people of the loyal States it has, in your hands, been the Government of King Stork, but to the Confederate States, of King Log. "But the rebellion will have triumphed." Better triumph to-day than ten years hence. But I deny it. The rebellion will at last be crushed out in the only way in which it ever was possible. "But no one will be hung at the end of war." Neither will there be, though the war should last half a century, except by the mob or the hand of arbitrary power. But really, sir, if there is to be no hanging, let this Administration, and all who have done its bidding everywhere, rejoice and be exceeding glad.

And now, sir, allow me a word upon a subject of very great interest at this moment, and most important it may be in its influence upon the future—FOREIGN MEDIATION. I speak not of armed and hostile intervention, which I would resist as long as but one man was left to strike a blow at the invader. But friendly mediation—the kindly offer of an impartial power to stand as a daysman between the contending parties in this most bloody and exhausting strife—ought to be met in a spirit as cordial and ready as that in which it is proffered. It would be churlish to refuse. Certainly it is not consistent with the former dignity of this Government to ask for mediation; neither, sir, would it befit its ancient magnanimity to reject it. As proposed by the Emperor of France,[1] I would accept it at once. Now is the auspicious moment. It is the speediest, easiest, most graceful mode of suspending hostilities. Let us hear no more of the mediation of cannon and the sword. The day for all that has gone by. Let us be statesmen at last.

Very grand, indeed, would be the tribunal before which the great question of the union of these States and the final destiny of this continent for ages should be heard, and historic through all time the embassadors who should argue it. And, if both belligerents consent, let the subjects in controversy be referred to Switzerland, or Russia, or any other impartial and incorruptible power or state in Europe. But at last, sir, the people of these several States here, at home, must be the final arbiter of this great quarrel in America; and the people and States of the Northwest, the mediators who shall stand, like the prophet, betwixt the living and the dead, that the plague of disunion may be stayed.

The speech of Mr. Vallandigham was replied to by John A. Bingham [O.].

[1] Napoleon III.

THE UNION WORTH THE COSTLIEST SACRIFICE

JOHN A. BINGHAM, M. C.

My colleague tells us that the war ought to stop; that it should not continue a day nor an hour. He is for the Union, he tells us, and against the employment of the only means by which the Union can be this day maintained, the armed power of the people themselves. There can be no Union as it was, unless by arms you sustain, over all the Republic, the Constitution as the supreme law of the land; and yet the gentleman says the war ought to stop; that it should not continue a day nor an hour. Half of his speech is devoted to the task of satisfying the people that he is for the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was. Let us see. He tells us frankly that he voted neither men nor money to carry on the war. Suppose all the representatives in this hall had followed his example, had acted as he declares he has acted in the cause of the Union, what would have been the result? No bill authorizing the enlistment of volunteers in defence of your flag, no appropriation of money for arming, equipping, and keeping in the field six hundred thousand defenders of the Union, no arm lifted to support the tottering pillars of the Republic, shaking in this wild storm of rebellion. All would have been abandoned. The gentleman who says he is for the Union as it was would have abandoned all to the tender mercies of this armed rebellion, which has multiplied those graves all over the land to which the gentleman refers with so much tenderness, and so much regret for those who fill them; fallen, as he says, by reason of this unconstitutional war. The gentleman could not find it in his heart to denounce the rebellion as unconstitutional, but only the war on the part of the Government for the suppression of that rebellion is unconstitutional.

This is the last phase of that democracy which has brought this ruin upon the country. I do not say that everybody of the party to which the gentleman belongs was of his mind; but I do say, and I challenge contradiction in saying it, that, but for the aid and comfort which that gentleman and his party have given to this rebellion from its inception to this hour, this ruin, to which he points so significantly to-day, wrought by this terrible conflict of arms, and which has reached almost every hearthstone in the land, never had been. In my judgment, the gentleman, and those of his party who have agreed and coöperated with him, are not clear of the blood shed in this war. I am as tolerant of conflicting opinions as the gentleman or any other man; but I cannot be expected to be tolerant of the charge made by the gentleman this day, that those who stand by the country and by the Constitution, by reason of their fidelity to duty, violate the Constitution; nor can I be tolerant of the demand that the only means by which the Government can be maintained shall be withdrawn from its support, and the country left naked to its enemies. That is the point I make with the gentleman to-day. He seems to assume that there is no difficulty in the way to a restoration, a speedy restoration of peace and of the Union, if your armies are disbanded, if the war for the Union only ceases, and ceases at once. There is not a word of denunciation from the gentleman's lips against this rebellion, and he assumes and takes it for granted that secession is a constitutional right; and by way of glorifying these infernal architects of our country's ruin inquires, were not our fathers rebels like unto them? I thank him for his candor in so plainly announcing his opinion, though constrained to differ with him in his opinions and his conclusions.

My colleague, who talks to-day about the Union as it was, is the same gentleman who introduced, in February, 1861, in aid of this rebellion, the proposition to "divide the United States into four sections," and to arm, by an amendment to the Constitution, the rebellious section of country—the fifteen slave States—with the power to legalize secession, in utter disregard of every free State in the Union, and without the consent of any of them. I do not think that a gentleman occupying that position upon the records of the country has a right to denounce anybody as opponents of the Constitution and the Union; much less do I suppose it becomes him to assume that he is the special guardian of the "Constitution as it is and the Union as it was."

The gentleman was very correct in remarking that it would be a most singular spectacle, indeed, to have two separate governments within the limits of territory which God and nature had designed should be under one government, and be the common heritage of one people. I agree with him; and yet the gentleman managed and contrived a device by which the American people, if they had accepted the proposition, would have consented that that very result might be accomplished.

And yet the gentleman is for "the Union as it was." The gentleman seems to be horrified by the thought of two separate governments existing upon this common heritage of one people, which God, by its mountains, and its lakes, and its magnificent rivers, has declared shall never be partitioned. His premises and his conclusions are strangely at fault with each other. The gentleman is for the Union, and at the same moment for disunion. Disband your armies, and let the war for the Union cease, says the gentleman.

What then? The South would be independent of the North, and the South would be triumphant over your violated Constitution and shattered Union. The gentleman so assumed, and hence his resolutions of this session contemplate and speak of "a final treaty of peace" with these rebels as a foreign and independent power. The gentleman further assumes—and I would like to know by what authority—that if we withdraw our armies, if we lay down our arms, if we cease to make war upon the rebels, they will come back into the Union under a treaty of peace. I would like to know by what authority he says so. If he knows it, he ought to give the House the benefit of his information. If it is a mere matter of speculation with him, why, of course, he has a right to indulge in his speculations, but we may be pardoned if we question the correctness of them. Has he any definite information? The gentleman is silent upon that subject.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—Will you allow me time to finish my speech?

MR. BINGHAM.—That is an unreasonable request.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—Then I have said all I desire to say to the gentleman.

MR. BINGHAM.—I supposed the gentleman had. I have this to say in reply to the gentleman, that I doubt very much whether the gentleman is authorized to speak for these rebels to that extent. To whatever extent he may be their mouthpiece, I venture to doubt his authority to say for them that if we lay down our arms and surrender to them, and allow them to proclaim their independence and their triumph over us and over our common Government, they will then consent to come back and be governed by the Constitution and the laws. I have no doubt that the gentleman may say many things by their authority, but that is one thing I do not think he is allowed to say by his master, Jefferson Davis, yet.

Here the speaker discussed the conduct of President Buchanan's Administration as based on the policy proposed by Mr. Vallandigham, and charged that this conduct had brought on the war.

And with such a rôle as was thus played in the capital of the nation by that Democratic cabinet council, this gentleman who helped to put them there has the effrontery to come here and arraign men for making war on these innocent, unoffending rebels. According to his logic we should have sat silent, and allowed those gentlemen to plunder the people of the money in their treasury on the one hand, and to rob them of the means of self-defence and self-preservation on the other. The suggestion of the gentleman is in perfect keeping with the conduct of that Cabinet. Disband your army, he says. Leave the field to these rebels. Allow them to proclaim themselves to all the world independent of your authority. Allow the Union to be dissevered, and thereupon go to work and settle the difficulty, in the language of the gentleman's resolution, by "a final treaty of peace." That would be a spectacle for gods and men to look on with wonder—the Government of the United States engaged in a final treaty of peace with Robert Toombs and Jefferson Davis, and John B. Floyd and John Letcher of Virginia, and John Slidell and James Mason, with the gentleman from Ohio chief in their counsel.

But the gentleman, not content with simply making this suggestion, comes here to-day to discredit the Government in the face of the world, and says, with an air of triumph, "how can you carry on the war? Can it continue? Can you borrow more money? Can you obtain any more revenue by taxation?" And he undertakes to answer, for all the loyal people of this great country, "no." I ask him again for his authority. I deny the correctness of his conclusion. I would despair of the Republic if I thought that the millions who people all this broad land of ours, from the rock-bound coast of New England to the golden gates of the Pacific, were, like the gentleman from Ohio, ready to lay their hands upon their mouths, and their mouths in the dust,[1] crying before these armed rebels and thieves, "unclean, unclean, unclean." The people, sir, occupy no such position, thank God, and I trust they never will; because I believe that the spirit of the Puritans, at which the gentleman affects to sneer to-day, runs through their veins. "Ah," says my colleague, "you can borrow no more money; you can raise no more revenue by taxation." I take it that, in this instance, the wish of my colleague is father to the thought. He would, if he could, have those who hold the purse-strings in this land withhold from the Government the means of support. I have the right to infer, from his words, that he would, if he could, induce the loyal people of the land to withhold the payment of taxes in support of their own Government. And yet he is for the Union as it was and for the Constitution as it is!

The gentleman refers to Washington, whose bones, he says, are disturbed by this unconstitutional war for the Union. Has the gentleman, when he talks thus—suggesting to the people a disregard of law, a withholding of taxes, a refusal to support their Government—forgotten those grand words of Washington, which ought to be written to-day over the lintel of every door in the land: "the Constitution which at any time exists is sacredly obligatory on all until changed by the act of the whole people"? I think that admonition of Washington a sufficient response to the suggestions of the gentleman to the good people of this land to pay no more taxes, not to submit to their own laws, to allow the Union to be dismembered, and the heritage, which God himself has declared should be the common heritage of one people, to be divided. And for what purpose? Why, that it may be united again. I suppose the gentleman's philosophy is that the best way to preserve a man's life is to kill him, in the first place, merely for the purpose of showing his skill in restoring him to life again. He would destroy the Union to-day by disbanding the army; he would destroy the Union to-day by destroying the public confidence in the Government; he would destroy it by withholding from the Government the revenues necessary to carry on the war. And after that is done, he would restore it by some strange machinery, by some curious power of enchantment which he possesses. I warn the gentleman to lay no such flattering unction to his soul. He who would put out the light now burning on your altars had better be careful, before he does that work, to inquire what earthly power shall that light relume.

My colleague would consent that the pillars of the temple of our liberties should be shaken down, in the vain belief that he has the power to rear them again in all their just and beautiful proportions. I trust in God that my colleague's day-dream is not to be realized. I feel the conviction that those who reared the proportions of this beautiful fabric of American empire were mighty men, whom God taught to build for glory and for beauty. They were men who are not seen in every generation, or in every century. They were men of that large discourse that looks before and after. They were men fitted of God to accomplish the great work of laying the foundations of a great and free commonwealth.

In this hour of peril my colleague tells us to follow the example of Moses. He said he was one of the greatest statesmen that ever lived. I think it most likely. He wants us to follow the example of Moses; but what he meant by the suggestion I am not sure that I fully comprehend.

OWEN LOVEJOY [Ill.].—To lead the slaves out of the house of bondage.

MR. BINGHAM.—He informed us that Moses, when he wanted to do justice to his people, when he wanted to restore the authority of good government, took care to leave the land of Egypt, and lead them out of that country. Does the gentleman mean by that suggestion that we ought to follow the lead of some Moses—himself for example—get up and leave this goodly heritage of ours to be occupied exclusively by those rebels in arms, who have sworn that they will not have this Government of the people to rule over them? I cannot infer anything else. And if that be what he means, then I have this to say to him: that the right of expatriation is a right secured under the Constitution and laws of the United States to all its citizens; and if it be according to his mind to gather up his bundle under his arm, and to go into distant parts in order to accommodate these rebels, he has a perfect right to exercise his privilege. But I beg leave to suggest that those of us who think otherwise shall be permitted to stand by the old flag, and to remain on our native heath undisturbed, so long as it shall please God to let us live.

If he meant anything else than this bright suggestion, I would like to know what he did mean? My friend on my left suggests that he meant to lead the people out of their bondage into the land of their liberty. [Laughter.]

I hope the gentleman will not repudiate the law of his great law-giver—and he is also my great law-giver and model statesman. If we have any respect for Moses's law, in my belief the first act to be done by the nation should be to proclaim to these rebels, in the words uttered by this great law-giver, which he received from the Almighty himself in the midst of the darkness and earthquake of the mountain: "Thou shalt not steal." [Laughter.] They are attempting to steal your country and mine; they are attempting to steal your property and mine; they are attempting to steal the heritage of your children and mine. I ask my colleague whether he will consent that they shall steal any portion of this common territory of our country or not?

MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—I will consent that my colleague may volunteer to prevent it, if he wishes.

Mr. Bingham.—Will my colleague really consent that I may volunteer? [Laughter.]

Mr. Vallandigham.—Yes, sir. My colleague and myself will be in the same category, at leisure after the 4th of March, and perhaps we may volunteer together.

Mr. Bingham.—I take courage from that, for the inference to be drawn, both from the spoken arguments of my colleague and his official conduct in this House, is that he would permit nobody to volunteer. [Applause in the gallery.]

The gentleman would disband your army, withhold all supplies, and permit me alone to volunteer against all these rebels in arms. That is magnanimity. Talk about volunteering, sneeringly, when you, who have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, stand by and see it torn and rent in tatters, and deny the right to maintain it by arms. When violent hands are laid upon the old flag of the Union, stained, as it is, all over with the blood of its defenders, shed by their assassins and murderers, you deny the right to uphold it, and refuse to vote supplies to your citizen soldiery, who peril all things earthly for the majesty of the law and in defence of their own institutions. You talk about volunteering! [Applause in the galleries.]

My colleague said that you cannot maintain this Union, or the authority of this Government, by force of arms; that you must do it by compromise; and he undertakes to make this good by some carefully considered references to history. There is one thing in the history of the world which he has overlooked, and that is this great fact, that there is not a single well-authenticated instance upon record of a great government, assailed by internal dissensions and armed rebellion, which submitted and surrendered to the rebellion and survived—not one. Yet the gentleman would have us, in the light of that great warning, lay down our arms, disband our armies, submit to the rebellion for the time being, and undertake to settle this great controversy afterward in favor of republican institutions by compromise! No government can survive a base surrender of its own authority to armed rebels. The rebels in that event become the government.

Mr. Speaker, I know the effect of such an appeal to the people of the country. I know that the good people of this land, who have given the first born of their homes for the defence of the Union and the Constitution and the suppression of the rebellion, love their noble sons and cherish them as they do the apple of their eye. I know that after their day's work is done, in the quiet twilight of the evening they mourn over their absence and the broken circle of their homes. I beg them to remember that, though by disbanding your army they may for the moment make whole again the golden circle of their homes, they may thereby lose to themselves and their children a country. I ask them to remember that beautiful utterance, than which none more beautiful ever fell from human lips, of one of the dying Fathers of the Republic, "I commit my spirit to God and my daughter to my country." How could he, how could any man, die in peace while leaving his child without a country and a government to shelter and protect it when he was gone?

No, sir, there is something more important to be considered here to-day than the question whether this life or that life, even though it be the noblest and the most promising in the land, shall survive this war, and that question is, shall the Republic live immortal among the nations, and cover with the ægis of its protection your children and mine, and all the children of this land, when we ourselves shall be no more upon the earth? Yes, sir, the great question of to-day is, shall the Republic live? Any sacrifice of blood, any present loss to us of "this intellectual being," is not too great to be made, if thereby we may maintain intact that Constitution which our fathers gave us.

The theme of Mr. Bingham's speech received simpler and briefer but even more effective treatment by the President a few months later.

On November 19, 1863, the National Cemetery of soldiers killed at the battle of Gettysburg was dedicated in the presence of a vast array of people assembled from all parts of the Union upon the battlefield. The orator of the day was Edward Everett. At the close of his long address, composed in the finished periods of that "classic" order of American oratory of which he was the greatest living master, when the thunder of applause that it evoked had ceased, President Lincoln rose and spoke a few heart-felt words which so moved the deeps of emotion in his hearers that many sat spell-bound and silent after the speaker had finished. As the President's letter to Mr. Everett, written on the following day, indicates Mr. Lincoln inferred from this reception that the speech was a "failure," but he was quickly disabused of that idea by evidences coming from every part of the Union of the deep impression it had made on the hearts of his countrymen.

"These Dead Shall Not Have Died in Vain"

Speech of President Lincoln at Gettysburg

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

The declaration that "the war is a failure" was embodied in the next national platform of the Democracy [1864], but the party's candidate for President, General George B. McClellan, virtually repudiated it. Lincoln was triumphantly reëlected, and in his second inaugural address, on March 4, 1865, justified the prosecution of the war until slavery, the curse from which it sprang, should forever be abolished.

"The Almighty Has His Purposes"

Second Inaugural of President Lincoln

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes his aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not, that we may be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully.

The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offences! for it must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offences which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through his appointed time, he now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offence came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him? Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations.

CHAPTER XI

Conscription

Henry Wilson [Mass.] Proposes in the Senate Bill to Draft Soldiers—His Speech on the Bill—It Is Passed—Debate in the House on the Bill: in Favor, William M. Davis [Pa.], James H. Campbell [Pa.], John H. Bingham [O.]; Opposed, Charles J. Biddle [Pa.], Chilton A. White [O.], Clement L. Vallandigham [O.], James C. Robinson [Ill.], Samuel S. Cox [O.], Daniel W. Voorhees [Ind.]—Bill Is Passed—Conscription by the South.

ON February 16, 1863, Henry Wilson [Mass.] brought before the Senate a bill for a draft of soldiers between the ages of twenty and forty-five to prosecute the war.

It was passed upon the same day after considerable debate and amendment. After a long and heated discussion in the House it was passed by that body, with various amendments, on February 25. The House amendments were accepted by the Senate on March 2, and the bill was approved by President Lincoln on March 3.

In its final form its preamble read as follows:

Whereas there now exist in the United States an insurrection and rebellion against the authority thereof, and it is, under the Constitution of the United States, the duty of the Government to suppress insurrection and rebellion, to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, and to preserve the public tranquillity; and, whereas, for these high purposes, a military force is indispensable, to raise and support which all persons ought willingly to contribute; and, whereas, no service can be more praiseworthy and honorable than that which is rendered for the maintenance of the Constitution and Union, and the consequent preservation of free government; be it enacted, etc.

The Conscription Act

Congress, February 16-25, 1863

Senator Wilson.—The needs of the nation demand that we should fill the regiments now in the field, worn and wasted by disease and death, by enrolling and drafting the population of the country under the constitutional authority "to raise and support armies."

That grant of power carries with it, in the language of "The Federalist," "all the powers requisite to the complete execution of its trust."

Sir, this grant to Congress of power "to raise and support armies" carries with it the right to do it by voluntary enlistment or by compulsory process. If men cannot be raised by voluntary enlistment then the Government must raise men by involuntary means, or the power to raise and support armies for the public defence is a nullity. James Monroe said, in a letter to the chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, in 1814, that—

"It would be absurd to suppose that Congress could not carry this power into effect otherwise than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals. It might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain."

It is a high and sacred duty, resting alike upon all the citizens of the Republic, upon the sons of toil and misfortune and the more favored few, to labor, to suffer, ay, to die, if need be, for their country. Never since the dawn of creation have the men of any age been summoned to the performance of a higher or nobler duty than are the men of this generation in America. The passage of this great measure will clothe the President with ample authority to summon forth the sons of the Republic to the performance of the high and sacred duty of saving their country, now menaced, and the periled cause of civilization and freedom in America, and of winning the lasting gratitude of coming ages, and that enduring renown which follows every duty nobly and bravely done. The enactment of this bill will give confidence to the Government, strength to the country, and joy to the worn and weary soldiers of the Republic around their camp fires in the land of the rebellion.

There was unanimous acceptance by the Senate of the principles of the bill, the discussion being upon its details. In the House, however, the principle was strenuously opposed, chiefly by the Northern "Peace" Democrats, when the bill came up for discussion on February 23. A provision to punish by fine or imprisonment any one who should violently resist the draft or who should counsel or aid any person to resist it was the particular object of attack.

Charles J. Biddle [Pa.] objected to the bill. He said the effect of it was to turn the militia, the constitutional defence of the people against any aggression of their rights, into a regular army, the unquestioning instrument of the Government.

The Executive, empowered, as the very word shows, only to execute known laws, establishes "martial law," that is, "the will of a conqueror," over all the people of the North. I feel a personal interest, an interest as a citizen, that things should not go on thus; for I believe it is at the constant risk of lighting up the flame of social revolution around your hearthstones and mine. Let us be warned in time. Have you noted the significant circumstance of men fresh from unjust imprisonment in Federal dungeons being received with high public honors and elevated to high positions?

William M. Davis [Pa.].—Will the gentleman inform the House who it is that will inaugurate a revolution in the North—the Republican party or the party with which the gentleman acts?

Mr. Biddle.—I think, sir, it will be an outraged people, without respect to party. I believe that the spirit which animated Hampden and the men of the English Revolution is not extinct in the age in which we live. That flame was brightened by the great example of the men of our own Revolution.

James H. Campbell [Pa.] replied to his colleague (Mr. Biddle).

Mr. Speaker, in the early stages of this rebellion it became necessary to exercise an extreme power to arrest the traitors who were circulating through the Northern States hatching treason and poisoning the minds of the people, because at that time the life of this nation was in daily and hourly peril; no man knew the extent of the conspiracy against the Union; we were surrounded by spies and traitors everywhere. They were in the legislative bodies of the country; they were with the armies in the field; they were in every town, village, and hamlet of the North; and I commend the President and War Department for the vigor with which they caused traitors to be arrested and incarcerated, until it could be ascertained where the country stood, and proper measures could be perfected for their trial and conviction.

Sir, in all ages and under all civilized governments there have been instances of the exercise of extreme power whenever the life of the nation has been in peril. Extreme peril makes extreme necessity; and nations, like individuals, must act accordingly. When the assassin enters your house at night you do not pause to take the ordinary measures that might be resorted to in broad daylight and under ordinary circumstances. You first defend the life of your family, and afterward take the necessary measures to convict and punish the culprit.

Let me tell gentlemen on the other side that, so far from condemning these arrests, it would be better for them if they could read the writing on the wall, and make their peace with liberty and their country while there is yet time. If they cannot see the evidence of a healthy reaction among the masses they are blind to the signs of the times. The error of the Government has been leniency. If it had given to traitors a drum-head court-martial and hempen cord, it would better have pleased the loyal men in the United States. [Applause in the galleries.] If I mistake not, the day is not far distant when the people will be so aroused against rebellion that traitors, their aiders and abettors, will call upon the rocks and mountains to cover them.

Now, sir, there was an intimation thrown out by my colleague —often repeated from that side of the House—that if we proceed with proper measures—measures which they are pleased to call unconstitutional—to make arrests and put down the rebellion, we will stir up revolution at the North. I am not afraid of any social or political revolution in the free States. If gentlemen see proper to inaugurate social or political armed revolution at the North, I hope they will do it at once; the sooner the traitorous effort is made the better. There is loyalty enough in the North to take care of any treason that can be found among the free States. Our soldiers in the army can take care of the rebels in front, and loyal men enough will rise up in the free States to dispose of the rebels within their limits. [Applause in the galleries.]

Until the last traitor is compelled to submit to lawful authority, to the Constitution and laws, we can have no peace; till that is done peace is infamy, peace is anarchy, peace is destruction, and no loyal and judicious man will advocate it. The rebels scout and scorn all propositions of peace, even if we were disposed to listen to them. There is no alternative but to conquer or be conquered; to live freemen or die slaves. And I am one of those who are ready to vote the last man and the last dollar for the accomplishment of the great object before us. I am ready to fight it out by land and by sea, as long as may be necessary to crush out the rebels themselves, and all their sympathizers at home and abroad. [Applause in the galleries.]

Chilton A. White [O.] followed Mr. Campbell in a speech against the bill.

This bill provides for the appointment of a provost marshal in every congressional district in the United States. It provides for the appointment of persons for taking the census of those who are subject to military duty. It provides for the appointment of draft commissioners. All these officers will be appointed by the executive officer of the United States, and they will be violent political partisans, holding the personal liberty and the personal security of every citizen within the congressional districts of the United States, as it were, in the hollow of their hands. These provost marshals are armed with the power to arrest for treasonable practices. In God's name, what does that mean? This is the most singular definition of crime I have ever seen embodied into any statutory enactment of this or any other country. What are treasonable practices? Who are to determine what they are? Are these provost marshals, many of them unskilled in the law, to determine that question? Why, it will have as many definitions and as many meanings as there are provost marshals to construe the statute. If a man gets up and argues upon the stump against this wicked, this corrupt, and this usurping Administration, he will be denounced as engaged in treasonable practices, according to the view of these political partisans, who are made the judges of the loyalty of every man in this country.

Why, sir, if the devil himself were to tax his ingenuity he could not invent a more complete device for destroying the liberty and happiness of the people than this bill, as illustrated in the light of the history of this country for the past eighteen months.

Treasonable practices! Why, sir, in the opinion of many of those gentlemen upon this floor who assume to be the especial guardians of the loyalty of the country, I have no doubt I would be considered as engaged in treasonable practices while denouncing this measure and this scheme, as I do denounce it here and now.

Oh, but it is said that these men are only to be arrested and detained for a short period of time, and for a temporary purpose, which will pass away with the occasion, and that after the draft is all over they are to be delivered over to the judicial tribunals of the country. Delivered over! what for? Is there any man here who ever expects that anybody will ever be tried for treasonable practices? No, sir; it is a device; it is a catch; it is an excuse; it is an apology, to afford some justification for this monstrous and outrageous provision. No trial is intended, and no judicial tribunal will ever hear of any of these treasonable practices. This clause is incorporated here to afford an apology for illegal arrests. Men will be arrested without oath, and without show of probable cause. They will be detained without the benefit of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the country. It is but the renewal of that reign of terror which we passed through but a few days before our election last fall.

But another new kind of trial is established and invented by this bill. If any person shall dissuade another from the performance of military duty he is to be considered as guilty of crime and subject to summary arrest and trial. What does that mean? Does it mean that if a man denounces the policy of this Administration as wicked, corrupt, and dangerous to the liberties of the people; if he denounces the acts of usurpation of which it has been guilty; if he denounces the monstrous policy upon which it at present conducts the war in open and flagrant violation of the Constitution, and in derogation of the rights and established institutions of the States, is he to be taken and held as discouraging persons from the performance of military duty? If so, then I suppose he would be held guilty, and would be subject to military arrest.

We all know what construction will be placed upon this provision. They are unjust and ingenious devices by which the people are to be deprived of this last vestige of liberty. All this might be borne if the injured citizen could appeal to the local State judicial tribunals for the redress of injuries thus inflicted upon him; but by your indemnity bill provision is made for taking all this class of cases, by a novel and unusual mode of appeal, to the United States courts; and when thus appealed you have provided that under the plea of the general issue evidence may be offered to show that the wrong was committed upon probable cause, or under color of authority derived from the President or a law of Congress, and such proof shall constitute a good and valid defence to the action, and the court shall so charge the jury, and the jury shall so find. Thus you declare by law what shall be a defence; you put the charge to the jury in the mouth of the court, and compel the jury to find accordingly. What more effectual immunity could be granted for the commission of these wrongs upon the rights and the liberties of the citizen than are here given? Not only the independence, but the very existence of the local State judicial tribunals is struck down so far as this class of cases is concerned, and it is sought to dog him into submission to these wrongs by compelling him to seek redress in distant courts, under circumstances of great inconvenience and at great cost; and as a further penalty for seeking redress it is provided that if he is non-suited, or fails in the action, he shall pay double costs.

When you have overthrown the constitutions of the States; when you have overthrown the judicial authorities of the States; when you have removed from the citizens every possible means for the protection of their personal liberty and property; when you have done all this, the only refuge which is left, the only appeal which the injured and outraged citizen can make, is to the God of justice and the God of right. And if these outrages are carried to the extent I apprehend they will be, that appeal, as God reigns in heaven, will be made. I tell you that in my section of the State of Ohio the spirit of our citizens will no longer tolerate these things. They will defend the rights of the citizen; and, if you close all the judicial tribunals and every mode of legal redress to them, they will plant themselves upon the constitution of their States and of the United States, and defend themselves in the possession of the rights and liberties guaranteed to them by those instruments, with and by all the means which God and nature have placed in their possession. They have already borne too much, and I tell you they will not bear more.

Why, gentlemen upon the other side of the House say there has not been enough of this thing; that there have not been as many political arrests as should have been made. And they talk about liberty, about free government, and about republican institutions. My God! what ideas of republican institutions, of free government, and of liberty must such men have! What do they mean by these words? Is it that kind of license which permits one party, because they have the power, to seize, without authority of law, condemn without trial, and imprison without process the partisans of another party? Is that the kind of free government they want? Is that the kind of republican institutions which it is desired to perpetuate in this country? Is that the liberty of which you boast so much? Sir, I want liberty, but I want it regulated by law, not by license, not subject to the capricious will of any one man. This bill strikes at the very roots of every immunity that belongs to the citizen. It not only affects his personal liberty, but it even affects the freedom of his speech; it puts a gag in his mouth and will subject him to arrest and imprisonment for words spoken. Why, sir, the theory of our Government is that even error of opinion may be tolerated so long as reason is left free to combat it, or until it seeks to perpetuate itself by force.

We are willing to extend to you, without let or hindrance on our part, all the rights we claim for ourselves. We invite you into the arena before the people, to a full, fair, and unrestrained discussion of the questions at issue between us. Bring to your aid every argument and every reason you can to support your sinking cause; and let it be understood that these same rights which we concede to you we claim and intend to exercise for ourselves, and no earthly power shall prevent us from doing so. God, by a law of His own making, made thought free and left each individual free to select his own form and mode for its expression; and it is not for you, gentlemen, to ascend the throne of the Almighty and attempt to set boundaries to the range of opinion or prescribe the forms of speech in which it shall be expressed, and to denounce your judgments upon men who do not think and speak according to prescribed forms. When God made man in His own image, the noblest of all sublunary beings, a creature endowed with reason and free will, an intellectual being, it became his high prerogative, each one for himself and not one for another, to exercise these faculties; not as he must answer to you, but as he must answer to his Creator, for himself, so he must use and improve his talents for himself; and it is only when opinion seeks to perpetuate itself by force, and not by argument and consent, that it may be met with force. In these respects our Government is but a reflex of the divine mind, and while we on our side support our cause by the persuasive influences of truth, reason, and argument, you on your side have no right to resort to coercive measures against us. If you do, I warn you that an eye for an eye and tooth for tooth will be the law. We intend to walk in the light of our own reason, forming our own judgments and pursuing our own conclusions, supporting them by the inherent power of truth, illustrated by such reason and argument as we can bring to bear. Were we, on all fitting and proper occasions, to refuse to do so, we would violate a trust reposed in us by God himself, and prove ourselves unworthy of our divine Master, fit subjects for degradation and slavery.

Now, sir, I wish to say that I believe this to be a bill that would strike down the rights of the States and the liberties of the citizen, and that, if attempted to be enforced and executed, it will lead to results and calamities in this country which will sadden all our hearts and the hearts of right-minded men everywhere. The time has passed when the people of this country will submit longer to the state of things which has been inaugurated by the party now in power. They know their rights, and, knowing them, they are bent and determined upon maintaining them at all costs and at all hazards. Gentlemen on the other side may take all the comfort they can from any apparent reaction they see going on in the country. We have suffered imprisonment; we have suffered wrongs, and insults, and indignities; our motives of patriotism have been impugned; thousands of our citizens are to-day languishing in your prisons and bastiles, snuffing the damp vapors of solitary dungeons, separated from their families, their business, and all the associations and endearments that cluster around home; and all, sir, for no other crime or offence than that their views and opinions do not exactly correspond with your own; men whose ruling passions are an uncompromising devotion to the Constitution and the Union, but differ with you as to the best means to be employed for their maintenance and support.

Clement L. Vallandigham [O.] followed his colleague in opposing the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss this bill at any great length in this House. I am satisfied that there is a settled purpose to enact it into a law, so far as it is possible for the action of the Senate and House and the President to make it such. I appeal, therefore, from you, from them, directly to the country; to a forum where there is no military committee, no previous question, no hour rule, and where the people themselves are the masters. I commend the spirit in which this discussion was commenced by the chairman of the Military Committee [Abraham B. Olin, of New York]. Only let me caution him that he cannot dictate to the minority here what course they shall pursue. But, sir, I regret that I cannot extend the commendation to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Campbell] who addressed the House a little while ago. If he or any other gentleman of the majority imagines that any one here is to be deterred by threats from the expression of his opinions, or from giving such votes as he may see fit to give, he has utterly misapprehended the temper and determination of those who sit on this side of the chamber. His threat I hurl back with defiance into his teeth. I spurn it. I spit upon it. That is not the argument to be addressed to equals here; and I therefore most respectfully suggest that hereafter we shall be spared personal denunciation and insinuations against the loyalty of men who sit with me here; men whose devotion to the Constitution and attachment to the Union of these States are as ardent and immovable as yours, and who only differ from you as to the mode of securing the great object nearest their hearts.

Mr. Campbell.—The gentleman will allow me——

Mr. Vallandigham.—I yield for explanation.

Mr. Campbell.—Mr. Speaker, it is a significant fact that the gentleman from Ohio has applied my remarks to himself and others on his side of the House. Why was this done? I was denouncing traitors here, and I will denounce them while I have a place upon this floor. It is my duty and my privilege to do so. And, if the gentleman from Ohio chooses to give my remarks a personal application, he can so apply them.

Mr. Vallandigham.—That is enough.

Mr. Campbell.—One moment.

Mr. Vallandigham.—Not another moment after that. I yielded the floor in the spirit of a gentleman, and not to be met in the manner of a blackguard. [Applause and hisses in the galleries.]

Mr. Campbell.—The member from Ohio is a blackguard. [Renewed hisses and applause in the galleries.]

James C. Robinson. [Ill.].—I rise to a question of order. I demand that the galleries be cleared. We have been insulted time and again by contractors and plunderers of the Government in these galleries, and I ask that they be now cleared.

Samuel S. Cox [O.].—I hope my friend from Illinois will not insist on that. Only a very small portion of those in the galleries take part in these disturbances. The fool-killer will take care of them.

Mr. Vallandigham.—I have already said that it is not my purpose to debate the general merits of this bill at large, and for the reason that I am satisfied that argument is of no avail here. I appeal, therefore, to the people. Before them I propose to try this great question—the question of constitutional power, and of the unwise and injudicious exercise of it in this bill. We have been compelled, repeatedly, since the 4th of March, 1861, to appeal to the same tribunal. We appealed to it at the recent election. And the people did pronounce judgment upon our appeal.

Talk to me, indeed, of the leniency of the Executive! too few arrests! too much forbearance by those in power! Sir, it is the people who have been too lenient. They have submitted to your oppressions and wrongs as no free people ought ever to submit. But the day of patient endurance has gone by at last. Mistake them not. They will be lenient no longer. Abide by the Constitution, stand by the laws, restore the Union if you can restore it—not by force; you have tried that and failed—Try some other method now—the ancient, the approved, the reasonable way—the way in which the Union was first made. Surrender it not now—not yet—never. But unity is not union; and attempt not, at your peril—I warn you—to coerce unity by the utter destruction of the Constitution and of the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. Union is liberty and consent: unity is despotism and force. For what was the Union ordained? As a splendid edifice to attract the gaze and admiration of the world? As a magnificent temple—a stupendous superstructure of marble and iron, like this Capitol, upon whose lofty dome the bronzed image—hollow and inanimate—of freedom is soon to stand erect in colossal mockery, while the true spirit, the living goddess of liberty, veils her eyes and turns away her face in sorrow, because, upon the altar established here and dedicated by our fathers to her worship, you, a false and most disloyal priesthood, offer up, night and morning, the mingled sacrifices of servitude and despotism? No, sir. It was for the sake of the altar, the service, the religion, the devotees that the temple of the Union was first erected; and, when these are all gone, let the edifice itself perish. Never—never—never will the people consent to lose their own personal and political rights and liberties to the end that you may delude and mock them with the splendid unity of despotism.

Sir, what are the bills which have passed, or are still before, the House? The bill to give the President entire control of the currency—the purse—of the country. A tax bill to clothe him with power over the whole property of the country. A bill to put all power in his hands over the personal liberties of the people. A bill to indemnify him, and all under him, for every act of oppression and outrage already consummated. A bill to enable him to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in order to justify or protect him, and every minion of his, in the arrests which he or they may choose to make—arrests, too, for mere opinions' sake. Sir, some two hundred years ago men were burned at the stake, subjected to the horrors of the Inquisition, to all the tortures that the devilish ingenuity of man could invent—for what? For opinions on questions of religion—of man's duty and relation to his God. And now, to-day, for opinions on questions political, under a free Government, in a country whose liberties were purchased by our fathers by seven years' outpouring of blood and expenditure of treasure—we have lived to see men, the born heirs of this precious inheritance, subjected to arrest and cruel imprisonment at the caprice of a President, or a Secretary, or a constable. And, as if that were not enough, a bill is introduced here to-day, and pressed forward to a vote, with the right of debate, indeed—extorted from you by the minority—but without the right to amend, with no more than the mere privilege of protest—a bill which enables the President to bring under his power, as Commander-in-Chief, every man in the United States between the ages of twenty and forty-five—three millions of men. And, as if not satisfied with that, this bill provides, further, that every other citizen, man, woman, and child, under twenty years of age and over forty-five, including those that may be exempt between these ages, shall be also at the mercy—so far as his personal liberty is concerned—of some miserable "provost marshal" with the rank of a captain of cavalry who is never to see service in the field; and every congressional district in the United States is to be governed—yes, governed—by this petty satrap—this military eunuch—this Baba—and he even may be black—who is to do the bidding of your Sultan, of his Grand Vizier. Sir, you have but one step further to go—give him the symbols of his office—the Turkish bow-string and the sack.

What is it, sir, but a bill to abrogate the Constitution, to repeal all existing laws, to destroy all rights, to strike down the judiciary and erect upon the ruins of civil and political liberty a stupendous superstructure of despotism. And for what? To enforce law? No, sir. It is admitted now by the legislation of Congress, and by the two proclamations of the President, it is admitted by common consent that the war is for the abolition of negro slavery, to secure freedom to the black man. You tell me, some of you, I know, that it is so prosecuted because this is the only way to restore the Union; but others openly and candidly confess that the purpose of the prosecution of the war is to abolish slavery. And thus, sir, it is that the freedom of the negro is to be purchased, under this bill, at the sacrifice of every right of the white men of the United States.

Sir, I am opposed, earnestly, inexorably opposed, to this measure. If there were not another man in this House to vote against it, if there were none to raise his voice against it, I, at least, dare stand here alone in my place, as a Representative, undismayed, unseduced, unterrified, and heedless of the miserable cry of "disloyalty," of sympathy with the rebellion and with rebels, to denounce it as the very consummation of the conspiracy against the Constitution and the liberties of my country.

Where, now, are your taunts and denunciations, heaped upon the Confederate Government for its conscription, when you, yourselves, become the humble imitators of that government and bring in here a conscription act more odious even than that passed by the Confederate Congress at Richmond? What is this bill? A confession that the people are no longer ready to enlist; that they are not willing to carry on this war longer, until some effort has been made to settle this great controversy in some other way than by the sword. And yet, in addition to the one million two hundred and thirty-seven thousand men who have voluntarily enlisted, you propose now to force the entire body of the people, between the ages of twenty and forty-five, under military law and within the control of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the army for three years, or during the war—which is to say "for life"; aye, sir, for life, and half your army has already found, or will yet find, that their enlistment was for life, too.

Sir, what does all this mean? You were a majority at first; the people were almost unanimously with you, and they were generous and enthusiastic in your support. You abused your power and your trust, and you failed to do the work which you promised. You have lost the confidence, lost the hearts of the people. You are now in a minority at home. And yet what a spectacle is exhibited here to-night! You, an accidental, temporary majority, condemned and repudiated by the people, are exhausting the few remaining hours of your political life in attempting to defeat the popular will, and to compel, by the most desperate and despotic of expedients ever resorted to, the submission of the majority of the people, at home, to the minority, their servants here. Sir, this experiment has been tried before in other ages and countries and its issue always, among a people born free or fit to be free, has been expulsion or death to the conspirators and tyrants.

Have a care, have a care, I entreat you, that you do not press these measures too far. I shall do nothing to stir up an already excited people—not because of any fear of your contemptible petty provost marshals, but because I desire to see no violence or revolution in the North or West. But I warn you now, that whenever, against the will of the people, and to perpetuate power and office in a popular Government which they have taken from you, you undertake to enforce this bill, and, like the destroying angel in Egypt, enter every house for the first-born sons of the people—remember Poland. You cannot and will not be permitted to establish a military despotism.

What do you propose to make the duty of each provost marshal in carrying out the draft? Among other things, that he shall "inquire into and report to the provost marshal-general"—what? Treason No. Felony? No. Breach of the peace, or violation of law of any kind? No; but "treasonable practices"; yes, treasonable practices. What mean you by these strange, ominous words? Whence come they? Sir, they are no more new or original than any other of the cast-off rags filched by this Administration from the lumber-house of other and more antiquated despotisms. The history of European tyranny has taught us somewhat of this doctrine of constructive treason. Treasonable practices! Sir, the very language is borrowed from the old proclamations of the British monarchs some hundreds of years ago. It was this that called forth that English act of Parliament of twenty-fifth Edward III, from which we have borrowed the noble provision against constructive treason in the Constitution of the United States. Arbitrary arrests for no crime known, defined, or limited by law, but for pretended offences, herded together under the general and most comprehensive name of "treasonable practices," had been so frequent in the worst periods of English history, that in the language of the act of Henry IV, "no man knew how to behave himself or what to do or say for doubt of the pains of treason." The statute of Edward III had cut all these fungous, toadstool treasons up by the root; and yet, so prompt is arbitrary power to denounce all opposition to it as treasonable that, as Lord Hale observes—

"Things were so carried by parties and factions in the succeeding reign of Richard II, that this statute was but little observed but as this or that party got the better. So . . . it came to pass that almost every offence that was or seemed to be a breach of the faith and allegiance due to the king was, by construction, consequence, and interpretation, raised into the offence of high treason."

But steadily, in better times, the people and the Parliament of England returned to the spirit and letter of the act of Edward III, passed by a Parliament which now, for five hundred years, has been known and honored as Parliamentum benedictum, the "blessed Parliament"—just as this Congress will be known, for ages to come, as "the accursed Congress." Among many other acts, it was declared by a statute, in the first year of the fourth Henry's reign, that "in no time to come any treason be judged, otherwise than as ordained by the statute of King Edward III." And for nearly two hundred years it has been the aim of the lawyers and judges of England to adhere to the plain letter, spirit, and intent of that act, "to be extended," in the language of Erskine in his noble defence of Hardy, "by no new or occasional constructions—to be strained by no fancied analogies—to be measured by no rules of political expediency—to be judged of by no theory—to be determined by the wisdom of no individual, however wise—but to be expounded by the simple, genuine letter of the law."

Such, sir, is the law of treason in England to-day; and so much of the just and admirable statute of Edward as is applicable to our form of government was embodied in the Constitution of the United States. And yet what have we lived to hear in America daily, not in political harangues or the press only, but in official proclamations and in bills in Congress! Yes, your high officials talk now of "treasonable practices" as glibly "as girls of thirteen do of puppy dogs." Treasonable practices! Disloyalty! Who imported these precious phrases and gave them a legal settlement here? Your Secretary of War. He it was who by command of our most noble President authorized every marshal, every sheriff, every township constable, or city policeman in every State in the Union to fix, in his own imagination, what he might choose to call a treasonable or disloyal practice, and then to arrest any citizen at his discretion, without any accusing oath and without due process or any process of law. And now, sir, all this monstrous tyranny, against the whole spirit and the very letter of the Constitution, is to be deliberately embodied in an act of Congress! Your petty provost marshals are to determine what treasonable practices are and "inquire into," detect, spy out, eavesdrop, insnare, and then inform, report to the chief spy at Washington. These, sir, are now to be our American liberties under your Administration. There is not a crowned head in Europe who dare venture on such an experiment. How long, think you, this people will submit? But words, too—conservation or public speech—are to be adjudged "treasonable practices." Men, women, and children are to be haled to prison for free speech. Whoever shall denounce or oppose this Administration; whoever may affirm that war will not restore the Union, and teach men the gospel of peace, may be reported and arrested upon some old grudge, and by some ancient enemy, it may be, and imprisoned as guilty of a treasonable practice.

Sir, there can be but one treasonable practice under the Constitution in the United States. "Treason against the United States," says the Constitution, "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." [Here a Republican member nodded several times and smiled.] Ah, sir, I understand you. But was Lord Chatham guilty of legal treason, treasonable aid and comfort, when he denounced the war against the colonies and rejoiced that America had resisted? Was Burke, or Fox, or Barré guilty when defending the Americans in the British Parliament and demanding conciliation and peace? Were even the Federalists guilty of treason, as defined in the Constitution, for "giving aid and comfort" to the enemy in the war of 1812? Were the Whigs in 1846? Was the Ohio Senator liable to punishment, under the Constitution, and by law, who said, sixteen years ago, in the Senate chamber, when we were at war in Mexico: "If I were a Mexican as I am an American, I would greet your volunteers with bloody hands and welcome them to hospitable graves?" Was Abraham Lincoln guilty because he denounced that same war while a Representative on the floor of this House? Was all this "adhering to the enemy, giving him aid and comfort" within the meaning of this provision?

A MEMBER.—The Democratic papers said so.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—Sir, I am speaking now as a lawyer and as a legislator to legislators and lawyers acting under oath and the other special and solemn sanctions of this chamber, and not in the loose language of the political canvass.

The speaker here denounced the treatment accorded those who had been arrested by the Government.

Newspapers, the Bible, letters from home, except under surveillance, a breath of air, a sight of the waves of the sea, or of the mild blue sky, the song of birds, whatever was denied to the prisoner of Chillon, and more, too; yes, even a solitary lamp in the casemate, where a dying prisoner struggled with death, all have been refused to the American citizen accused of disloyal speech or opinions by this most just and merciful Administration.

Says the Constitution:

"The accused shall enjoy the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

And yet your Secretary of State, the "conservative" Seward—the confederate of Thurlow Weed, that treacherous, dissembling foe to constitutional liberty and the true interests of his country—forbade his prisoners to employ counsel, under penalty of prolonged imprisonment.

And here is another order to the same effect, signed by William H. Seward himself, and read to the prisoners at Fort Warren on the 29th of November, 1861:

"Discountenancing and repudiating all such practices"—

The disloyal practice, forsooth, of employing counsel—

"the Secretary of State desires that all the State prisoners may understand that they are expected to revoke all such engagements now existing and avoid any hereafter, as they can only lead to new complications and embarrassments to the cases of prisoners on whose behalf the Government might be disposed to act with liberality."

Most magnanimous Secretary! Liberality toward men guilty of no crime, but who, though they had been murderers or pirates, were entitled by the plain letter of the Constitution to have "the assistance of counsel for their defence." Sir, there was but one step further possible, and that short step was taken some months later when the prisoners of state were required to make oath, as the condition of their discharge, that they would not seek their constitutional and legal remedy in court for the wrongs and outrages inflicted upon them.

Sir, incredible as all this will seem some years hence, it has happened, all of it, and more yet untold, within the last twenty months in the United States. Under executive usurpation and by virtue of presidential proclamations and cabinet orders it has been done without law and against Constitution; and now it is proposed to sanction and authorize it all by an equally unconstitutional and void act of Congress. It is a vain thing to seek to cloak all this under the false semblance of law. Liberty is no more guarded or secured and arbitrary power no more hedged in and limited here than under the executive orders of last summer. We know what has already been done, and we will submit to it no longer. Away, then, with your vain clamor about disloyalty, your miserable mockery of treasonable practices. We have read with virtuous indignation in history ages ago of an Englishman whose favorite buck the king had killed and who suffered death as a traitor for wishing, in a fit of vexation, that the buck, horns and all, were emboweled in the body of the king. But what have we not lived to see in our own time? Sir, not many months ago this Administration, in its great and tender mercy toward the six hundred and forty prisoners of state, confined for treasonable practices at Camp Chase near the capital of Ohio, appointed a commissioner, an extra-judicial functionary, unknown to the Constitution and laws, to hear and determine the cases of the several parties accused and with power to discharge at his discretion or to banish to Bull's Island in Lake Erie. Among the political prisoners called before him was a lad of fifteen, a newsboy upon the Ohio River, whose only offence proved, upon inquiry, to be that he owed fifteen cents—the unpaid balance of a debt due to his washer-woman—possibly a woman of color—who had him arrested by the provost marshal as guilty of "disloyal practices." For four weary months the lad had lain in that foul and most loathsome prison, under military charge, lest, peradventure, he should overturn the Government of the United States; or, at least, the administration of Abraham Lincoln!

And yet, Senators and Representatives, catching up the brutal cry of a bloodthirsty but infatuated partisan press, exclaim "the Government has been too lenient, there ought to have been more arrests!"

Well did Hamilton remark that "arbitrary imprisonments have been in all ages the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny"; and, not less truly, Blackstone declares that they are "a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government" than executions upon the scaffold. And yet, to-night, you seek here, under the cloak of an act of Congress, to authorize these arrests and imprisonments, and thus to renew again that reign of terror which smote the hearts of the stoutest among us, last summer, as "the pestilence which walketh in darkness."

Sir, if your objects are constitutional, you have power abundantly under the Constitution, without infraction or usurpation. The men who framed that instrument made it both for war and peace. Nay, more, they expressly provide for the cases of insurrection and rebellion. You have ample power to do all that of right you ought to do—all that the people, your masters, permit under their supreme will—the Constitution. Confine, then, yourselves within these limits, and the rising storm of popular discontent will be hushed.

Here the speaker denounced arbitrary arrests as illegal even under the suspension of habeas corpus.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [William P. Sheffield] said, very justly, that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus does not authorize arrests except upon sworn warrant, charging some offence known to the law and dangerous to the public safety. He is right. It does not; and this was so admitted in the bill which passed the Senate in 1807. The suspension only denies release upon bail, or a discharge without trial, to parties thus arrested. It suspends no other right or privilege under the Constitution—certainly not the right to a speedy public trial by jury in a civil court. It dispenses with no "due process of law," except only that particular writ. It does not take away the claim for damages to which a party illegally arrested, or legally arrested, but without probable cause, is entitled.

And yet it has been assumed by the party in power that a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is a suspension of the entire Constitution and of all laws, so far as the personal rights of the citizen are concerned. Why, then, sir, stop with arbitrary arrests and imprisonments? Does any man believe that it will end here? Not so have I learned history. The guillotine! the guillotine! the guillotine follows next.

Sir, when one of those earliest confined in Fort La Fayette—I had it from his own lips—made complaint to the Secretary of State of the injustice of his arrest and the severity of the treatment to which he had been subjected in the exercise of arbitrary power, no offence being alleged against him, "why," said the Secretary, with a smile of most significant complacency, "my dear sir, you ought not to complain; we might have gone further." Light flashed upon the mind of the gentleman and he replied: "Ah! that is true, sir; you had just the same right to behead as to arrest and imprison me."

Sir, it is this which makes revolutions. A gentleman upon the other side asked this afternoon which party was to rise now in revolution. The answer of the able and gallant gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Biddle] was pertinent and just—

"No party, but an outraged people." It is not, let me tell you, the leaders of parties who begin revolutions. Never. Did any one of the distinguished characters of the Revolution of 1776 participate in the throwing of the tea into Boston Harbor? Who was it? Who, to-day, can name the actors in that now historic scene? Good men agitate; obscure men begin real revolutions; great men finally direct and control them. And if, indeed, we are about to pass through the usual stages of revolution, it will not be the leaders of the Democratic party—not I, not the men with me here to-night—but some man among the people, now unknown and unnoted, who will hurl your tea into the harbor; and it may even be in Boston once again; for the love of liberty, I would fain believe, lingers still under the shadow of the monument on Bunker Hill. But, sir, we seek no revolution—except through the ballot-box. The conflict to which we challenge you is not of arms but of argument. Do you believe in the virtue and intelligence of the people? Do you admit their capacity for self-government? Have they not intelligence enough to understand the right, and virtue enough to pursue it? Come then: meet us through the press, and with free speech and before the assemblages of the people and we will argue these questions, as we and our fathers have done from the beginning of the Government—"Are we right or you right, we wrong or you wrong?" And by the judgment of the people we will, one and all, abide. We have a Constitution yet, and laws yet. To them I appeal. Give us our rights; give us known and fixed laws; give us the judiciary; arrest us only upon due process of law; give us presentment or indictment by grand juries; speedy and public trial; trial by jury and at home; tell us the nature and cause of the accusation; confront us with witnesses; allow us witnesses in our behalf, and the assistance of counsel for our defence; secure us in our persons, our houses, our papers, and our effects; leave us arms, not for resistance to law or against rightful authority, but to defend ourselves from outrage and violence; give us free speech and a free press; the right peaceably to assemble; and, above all, free and undisturbed elections and the ballot; take our sons, take our money, our property, take all else; and we will wait a little, till, at the time and in the manner appointed by Constitution and law, we shall eject you from the trusts you have abused and the seats of power you have dishonored, and other and better men shall reign in your stead.

John A. Bingham [O.] replied to his colleague.

The argument to which we have listened to-night, with what degree of patience we could, has been characterized by two most remarkable assumptions. The one is that the gentleman from Ohio, who addressed the House [Mr. Vallandigham], and those whom he is supposed to represent, are the sole guardians of the Constitution of the United States of America. And the other is that, when he and his especial associates will it, that great instrument will perish in the fierce breath of revolution. In my judgment, sir, these assumptions are unworthy of my colleague, as they are unworthy of any man who has grown to man's estate under the shelter of the Constitution of the United States. The care of that Constitution is in the hands of the people, the whole people, who ordained it for the establishment of justice and the security of liberty. That great people the gentleman no more represents than I do. When they choose basely to surrender the sacred trust of the Constitution it will fall; but, so long as it pleases them to stand by it, it will be maintained.

If this be so, how comes it that the gentleman should assume that he is sole interpreter and protector of the Constitution, and that, by a breath of his mouth, it may be destroyed? Why, sir, it is but a few days ago that, upon this floor, in the very spirit of the speech which he has made to-night, my colleague undertook to demonstrate, by mutilating a letter of the Secretary of State, that the Constitution of the United States does not allow the American people to protect and maintain by force of arms their Government and their nationality against armed treason.

Mr. Vallandigham.—I have spoken many times here; I have never referred to the gentleman; yet, since the beginning of this session, he has felt himself called upon not only to attempt to reply to what I have said, but to draw me into a wrangle upon this floor, a thing for which he is eminently qualified but for which I have the most sovereign contempt and of which I shall take no notice whatever.

Mr. Bingham.—As the gentleman interrupted me for no purpose of denial or explanation he has no right to interrupt me either to question my motives or announce his contempt for all who choose to dissent from his arrogant assumptions. I suppose, from the tone and temper of my colleague's interruption, that he deems me guilty of the great crimen læsæ majestatis,[1] if I dare to lisp when his majesty rises in his place here and assumes to speak the law of the land.

He is not clothed, sir, with any such power over either my person as a citizen or my right as a Representative. The gentleman makes a virtue of necessity and, after rambling through half an hour of his speech to show that we were breaking through the intrenchments of the Constitution, that we were trampling upon the right of habeas corpus, of freedom of speech, of freedom of the press, and of the right of trial by jury; after denouncing us in set phrases for all this, he now rises and complains that I should venture to strike back, and says that I seek to draw him into a wrangle. Why, the gentleman is the last man on this footstool that I would want to have any wrangle with. [Laughter.] Now, that expression may be a little ambiguous, and the gentleman may have the benefit of it. [Laughter.] Perhaps the gentleman felt that the world would understand, when he calls attention to the fact that I once before in my life, and I believe only once, ventured to reply to a speech of his, I thereby sought to immortalize myself by coupling my name with so distinguished a person as himself! If that is the gentleman's idea, I beg him to count me out. [Laughter.] But, sir, whatever false motives the gentleman may attribute to me, I wish him to understand that I shall not sit silent here when I see a deliberate attempt made on this floor to convince this House, on the one hand, and the people of this country, on the other, that we have no right by law to authorize, and compel, if you please, the employment of all the able-bodied men of the country to crush out rebellion against the supremacy of the Government, the Constitution, and the laws. Go read those words that the gentleman dwelt upon with such emphasis the other day, and feel the blush of shame mount to your cheek that any American citizen of this Republic should utter such a sentiment.

Talk about freedom of speech, talk about the right of trial by jury, talk about personal liberty, talk about the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, talk about your construction of 25 Edward III, and then come here and proclaim to this House that "only an imperial or despotic government could subjugate thoroughly disaffected and insurrectionary members of the State!"

The gentleman to-night has sought to justify this remarkable utterance. Hence his elaborate argument to show the limitation of the provision of the Constitution, that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up any unnecessary time in the discussion of this great and important question; but, as the gentleman has seen fit to attempt to justify his words that the United States Government has not the constitutional right to subjugate traitors and suppress armed rebellion by force, I deem it my duty to refer the House to the construction of the statute of 25 Edward III, which the gentleman says is literally the same as the treason clause of the Constitution of the United States. Let this construction of the statute of Edward go out with the gentleman's argument, in order that the antidote may go along with the poison which he attempts to infuse into the public mind. The construction of that statute before the Constitution was made, and, therefore, before its provisions were incorporated into the Constitution, was that the words "adhering to the enemy," etc., applied to cases only of adherence to a foreign, not a domestic, enemy. What then? Whoever adheres to a domestic enemy engaged in rebellion is, according to the legal construction of that great statute, instead of being indictable under the second clause thereof, indictable under the first clause, and to be held chargeable with levying war. That is all there is of it.

For the sake of the argument, grant it that words encouraging treason and inciting to treason do not constitute the crime of treason, does it result that such utterances are not a crime, and, as such, to be so declared and punished under the Constitution of the United States? I know, sir, that by a high authority it is said: "It seems clearly to be agreed that, by the common law and the statute of Edward III, words spoken amount only to a high misdemeanor and no treason." Grant this to be the true construction of the statute of Edward III, as the same stand incorporated in the treason clause of our Constitution, what comfort can my colleague derive from that construction in support of his argument against the bill now under discussion, that you may not provide, as in this bill is provided, to punish, not as treason but as "a high misdemeanor," the utterance of words spoken, written, or printed, with intent to counsel and advise resistance to the laws, or to dissuade drafted soldiers from the performance of their duty?

I suppose that the reference of my colleague to the provision of the statute of 25 Edward III, defining treason, was to proclaim in advance that all of this legislation which provides for punishing as a crime those who, in any way, aid in encouraging desertion or forcible resistance to the laws is unconstitutional; that you cannot punish persons who favor this rebellion, except those who actually take up arms and levy war against the Republic. I do not believe it. I wish to say, in addition, that, notwithstanding his suggestion that the Supreme Court would declare this law unconstitutional and deny the power of the Government to punish and restrain the "treasonable practices" defined in and prohibited by this bill, in my opinion that court will never so decide; never, sir. The gentleman says that, if you pass this and kindred bills for the suppression of this rebellion, then we must have revolution. The people only can make revolution. I rather think that my colleague is not well informed about the purposes of the people to say that they will rush into revolution. He may be ready for revolution, and, doubtless, he may wish to lead that revolution; but are the people ready to assent to that? So long as the people are faithful to the great trust of maintaining free representative government they will take care of a revolution either inaugurated by him or any of his associates who howl against the Executive for protecting and defending that Government against armed rebellion.

What is the gentleman's argument against this bill? One objection by him urged is that the bill provides for what he is pleased to call arbitrary arrests. What is the provision? Simply that whoever shall resist any draft of men enrolled under this act, or counsel or aid any person to resist such draft, or assault any officer in making such draft, shall, for the time being, be subject to summary arrest by the provost marshal, and shall be delivered to the civil authorities, and, upon trial and conviction, be subject to fine and imprisonment. That is what my colleague calls arbitrary arrests. His logic, I suppose, is that men may resist a lawful draft, may aid resistance thereto, may brutally assault drafting officers, but shall not be interrupted in their crime until affidavit is made before and warrant obtained from some United States commissioner or judge, remote, it may be, hundreds of miles. He would not allow the marshals of the United States to be the conservators of the public peace, nor even the judges of the United States to be conservators of the peace, though the steps of the temple of justice and the laws may be stained by the blood of the citizen shed by lawless violence in their presence, and in forbidden resistance to the laws which they are sworn to support and execute. The gentleman's argument means, though he has not the candor plainly to declare it, that traitors and all their aiders have the right to go on with their crime and murder until legally arrested upon complaint and warrant in due form of law, and only after such legal arrest to be made to answer for their crimes upon the verdict of an impartial jury of the State and district in which they may have committed their offences.

We are not to arrest them summarily, for that is arbitrary, he argues, but we are to proceed literally according to the provisions of the Constitution.

If the argument is good for such aiders of the rebellion it is of equal force as to the rebels, for they are persons as well as their aiders, and, like them, are included in the provisions of the Constitution cited. What sort of logic and reason is this upon a question of this sort when three hundred thousand rebels are in arms? Does not the gentleman himself see that there is a hiatus in his logic wide enough to drive a coach and six through?

Now, let us see how this rule, as stated by him, would work practically. Jefferson Davis has three hundred thousand rebels drawn up in line of battle before the capital of the United States, and you are mustering your forces under this conscription act to beat back this rebel host. While this is going on, the gentleman from Ohio stands with the Constitution in hand and calls out to the people all over the North to refuse to come to the rescue of their imperiled capital and violated Constitution because the act under which they are summoned is unconstitutional. By such utterances would my colleague keep back from the field all the loyal people of this land, while traitors in arms were seizing their capital, burning their towns, laying waste their fields, and setting at defiance and overthrowing their Government and laws. While this ruin is being wrought the people are to be greeted with the cry of my colleague: "Hold back! these rebels are citizens, and, though they may be guilty of treason, you must not interfere with them, nor with those who aid them, except you act strictly under the warrants and indictments known to the law." That is the substance of his argument.

The gentleman, not content with his endeavor to fetter the Government by requiring the jury rather than the army to try traitors, complains that we are interfering with the freedom of speech, and again he quotes the Constitution and attempts to hold it up as a shield between these men who commit or aid and abet this great treason against the Republic, and the right and duty of the people to crush them by force under the express sanction of law. I understand that the freedom of speech which is guaranteed by the Constitution is not that freedom of speech which consists in saying that these rebels in arms "ought to be induced to invade the Northern States," and rob and burn the habitations of Northern people. My colleague is learned in the reading of the Constitution, and I would be glad to have him point out a single line ever written by an American citizen or uttered by an American jurist whose opinion is entitled to any consideration which ever gave any such interpretation as that to the guaranties of the Constitution of the United States. No, sir; freedom of speech is the inborn right of every man, whether citizen or stranger, but it is a right which he may not exercise to the detriment of the commonwealth, and, therefore, for its abuse he is to be held responsible, as he is to be held responsible for the abuse of any other element of his personal liberty. The right of locomotion is as sacredly guarded under your Constitution as is the right of freedom of speech; but, if a citizen, in the exercise of his right of locomotion, sees fit to creep burglariously into the habitation of his neighbor and thereby commit felony it is in vain that he holds up the Constitution as a shield and tells us that that secures him the right of liberty and property. He has the right to play the honest man and loyal citizen, but he has not the liberty to play the part of a common thief or a burglar.

So it is with this guaranteed freedom of speech. I say it is the right of the people to punish and imprison every man in this land who, either by oral, written, or printed words, urges or advises any portion of the American people to quench in blood this last, great experiment of republican government. If there is any man here now who has the effrontery to deny that proposition, I should like to hear him.

The gentleman says that habeas corpus can only be suspended within the limits of the rebellion. That is a remarkable suggestion. I suppose, according to that doctrine, that when this rebellion was confined to the corporate limits of Charleston and Sullivan's Island, it would have been highly improper to have suspended the privilege at Columbia or Georgetown in South Carolina, where they were beating up recruits to swell their cowardly cohorts to ten thousand strong, designed to do murder on the seventy brave men within the walls of Fort Sumter. Who ever heard before of such an interpretation as that being put upon your Constitution? I say here, and I challenge contradiction, that the fair construction of that provision is this, that the people, through their representatives, are the sole judges of the extent to which the privilege of the writ may be suspended in time of rebellion or invasion; and if, in their opinion, the public safety in time of such rebellion or invasion requires a suspension of the privilege of the writ in all cases throughout the limits of the Republic, it is their right to declare it and their duty to execute it.

Well, sir, the gentleman says that the suspension of the privilege of the writ does not confer the power of arrest. I answer that the power to suspend the privilege of the writ for the public safety necessarily implies the power of arrest and detention. But the gentleman says you must give all persons charged with conspiracy a speedy trial. Does not he know that by the provision of the Constitution, if a citizen commit treason or other crime against the United States, in South Carolina or North Carolina, he must be tried within the State and district in which he commits the offence? Meantime you have no courts there to try such offenders, and, according to the gentleman's argument, you must not restrain them of their liberty by summary arrest, but allow them to go at large and practice their treason and conspiracy, and give aid and comfort to the enemy, until such time as your civil process and courts are again restored and the supremacy of your laws acknowledged or enforced within the limits of such jurisdiction! Does any man fail to see that such objections to this needful legislation are, after all, disguise it as you may under professions of love for the Constitution and the rights of the people guaranteed under the Constitution, but another attempt to aid this rebellion and secure to it an easy triumph over the Constitution and laws?

Ah, but, says the gentleman, your bastiles are open to receive these victims of executive despotism. I should have been glad if the gentleman had particularized who these persons are that have such a claim upon his sympathy. There was a man arrested for inciting the mob at Baltimore. The gentleman was careful not to name him. It is a name that is in bad association. It is the name by which was designated the first of murderers, on whose brow was set the damning blotch of fratricide. This man was arrested and sent to the "bastile"; and my colleague arises in his place and cries out: "A violation of the Constitution." According to his logic, Kane should have been left at large to incite men to cast iron bars from the tops of their houses in Baltimore upon the heads of our citizen soldiery.

There was another arrest made, to which I suppose the gentleman refers, although he was not pleased to name the party, in our own State. I remember well, Mr. Speaker—who does not remember?—that, about the time that arrest was made in Ohio, for seven long days a battle raged before Richmond. During that protracted struggle, while that field of conflict was covered with the thick darkness of battle and the shadow of death, and in all the loyal homes of our people hands were raised in silent prayer for the Republic and its defenders, a cry came up from the banks of the York and the James Rivers:

Help! help! help! brothers of the free North and West, or we perish, and our banner of glory and of beauty goes down before the armed legions of treason. In response to that call the people rushed to the conflict from the hills of New England to the golden sands of California, filling the continent with their shout—

"We are coming, we are coming,
Six hundred thousand more."

It was in the presence of this sublime uprising of the freemen of this land for the defence of their homes and country, and the rescue from an unequal struggle of your gallant army, that a partisan in Ohio, it is said, dared to outrage and disgrace humanity by saying to his neighbors: "Stop, brother Democrats, stay at home and vote; and let the army of the Union perish." It is said that man was arrested by order of the President.

SEVERAL MEMBERS.—Who was he?

MR. BINGHAM.—I prefer to let history, the avenger, name him.

SAMUEL S. COX [O.].—Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

MR. BINGHAM.—I do not yield.

MR. COX.—I know my colleague will oblige me.

MR. BINGHAM.—This does not affect my colleague.

MR. COX.—It affects one of my constituents.

MR. BINGHAM.—I have said, Mr. Speaker, that such an utterance is said to have been made and published, and that the author of it was arrested.

MR. COX.—Why was he not tried?

MR. BINGHAM.—I now submit to the country that, if there were any such utterance made, the author of it should not only be arrested and imprisoned, but that the man who, in such an hour of peril, would attempt to keep back citizens from the defence of their homes and the relief of their brothers in arms, should not only be imprisoned, but should be hung by the neck, without judge or jury, till he be dead. [Applause.]

Daniel W. Voorhees [Ind.] closed the debate.

Mr. Speaker, it is either my good fortune or my bad fortune never to have been a member of a legislative body until I took my seat in this Congress. Consequently, I may not be so familiar with the rules of propriety that obtain among members of deliberative bodies as others who have had more experience. But, I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that, with my limited experience, I have observed the course of this debate with amazement, and with some degree of honest indignation.

This debate was opened by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Olin] with a lecture to this side of the House, informing us how he desired we should discuss this question. We were desired to behave ourselves and to pursue a certain line of conduct marked out for us in advance by his magisterial authority. The air of a testy, domineering pedagogue pervaded the style and substance of all his remarks.

After him comes the strap-and-button gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Campbell], who howled forth his threats on this floor like some angry animal in pursuit of prey. Possibly it has affected somebody's nerves. Doubtless it did affect his own. I must say, however, that it did not affect mine at all, except as a gust of harsh and discordant sound is always more or less jarring to my nervous system. It passed by this side of the House as mere wind, somewhat unpleasant and disgusting, but entirely harmless. I submit that the military and malicious gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right thus to afflict and annoy the persecuted minority in this hall.

After him, in the order of debate, on the other side, comes that strange and eccentric gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham] who so often holds this House and these galleries in listening and wondering suspense and attention. In his private intercourse he is one of the kindest and most amiable gentleman whom I ever had the good fortune to meet; but on this floor a stranger would take him to be, not merely Cato the Censor, for I believe Cato was very dignified, and certainly the gentleman from Ohio hardly ever is [laughter], but some furious actor in a play, whose part required him to scold and rave at every human being who was so unfortunate as to fall beneath his dreadful scowl. He is stormy and terrible to those who know him not, but to those who know him well gentle as summer and as tender as the dove who woos his mate. I am apologizing for his manner to those who do not understand him. His terrific outbreaks here against the minority may be regarded as a sort of pleasant episode to the grave proceedings of this House, a little ridiculous, but perfectly innocent. It is only his manner that is severe, not his matter. He starts out by telling us that the language of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vallandigham], who held spell-bound this House from the position in which I stand, with one of the ablest arguments I ever heard, was all unworthy of a member of this body. Who constituted him a judge of his colleagues? Where does he find the authority to arraign his peers on this floor? Sir, there is but one reply to language and conduct like this. We reject with scorn your unasked advice; we spurn your offensive lectures; we despise your puerile threats; we defy the malice which actuates them; we hold you and your outrageous insolence in sovereign and most unmitigated contempt.

Sir, it ill becomes gentlemen who have met with repudiation at the hands of their people; who, for their policy and conduct on this floor, have been rejected by their own constituents, and who stand condemned before the country, to come here and lecture Democratic members. In common decency you ought to keep silent, as mere cumberers of the ground whose days are numbered. Popular majorities have been piled up against you by thousands and tens of thousands. Loyal people have spoken your knell; the funeral bell has been tolled over your political graves by patriotic hands; the grass is growing green on the sod which covers you. And yet you dare come here to lecture living men! We bear in our bodies political vitality; you are political ghosts, specters from political graveyards, where the people buried you last fall, and wrote on your tombstones: "No resurrection." How dare you lecture the living, who yet stand on the shores of time, and who have something to do with earthly affairs? [Laughter.] I invoke the spell of decency and of regard for propriety, and, in the name of that spell, I exorcise these spirits, and tell them "down, down, to whence you came." [Laughter.]

You talk about what is worthy and unworthy. Shall I accept gibbering and squeaking political ghosts, who will troop home on the 4th of March to the vast charnel-house of repudiated politicians, as my masters? I own but one master in this Government—it is the sovereign people.

The days of this Congress are drawing to a close and we may as well have a plain talk among ourselves before we part. If you propose at this time, with Government credit at sixty per cent. below par; if you propose, with $2,500,000,000 of indebtedness; if you propose, with a distracted country, with the agricultural pursuits depressed, and the whole land groaning from the effects of this war; if you propose, in full view of all these things, to tax the people, in addition to what is necessary to sustain the Government, to an unlimited extent—perhaps hundreds of millions—for the purpose of accomplishing compensated emancipation, for the purpose of flooding the free States with free negroes, then you may make up your minds for trouble. The money will not be paid, and you cannot compel it. You will find at last who owns and controls this Government. The people will assert the original divine right of the oppressed and outraged. They will say to you, in the language of the Constitution: "We, the people, made this Government; you are not our masters, but our servants."

A strange error has crept into the public mind. Men talk as if they could force and coerce public sentiment. The very theory of our Government forbids it. The theory of our Government is that, not Abraham Lincoln, not his Cabinet, not you men whose lingering footsteps are just departing from these places forever, constitute this Government, but that the people made it all, and constitute all its parts. They made it and they will uphold it in the mode which satisfies themselves. But not only that; they will make you obey the Constitution in its spirit, which is the concentrated will of the people.

For the purpose of uniting public sentiment and of prosecuting the war with unity of purpose I presume comes the proclamation of the President of September. Ten days before he issued it he said, himself, to the Chicago ministers that he had not the power to promulgate such a document and that it would do no good if he did. In that he was right, for once. But I suppose he gave way to pressure. He was pressed. By whom? By Horace Greeley, that political harlot, who appeared in a praying attitude in behalf of twenty million people. He gave way to pressure brought to bear, too, by the Governor of Massachusetts [John A. Andrew]. He gave way to the pressure and, I have no doubt, experienced relief. This was Jacksonian, very. It showed what is known as backbone. I have an immense respect for an Executive who violates his oath under the pressure of impertinent meddlers. But the President was told of the moral and military effect of such a proclamation, and I presume he believed all he heard was true. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham] was unfortunate in his musical recitation of the New England song a few minutes ago:

"We are coming, Father Abraham, Six hundred thousand strong."

for if anybody is on the way here to swell the broken ranks of the army under the inspiration of that proclamation he is tarrying long. His arrival has not been noticed in the papers.

Lo! the mountain had labored, and the mouse came forth! Massachusetts, this hour, instead of crowding the highways and byways with her sons, has her Senator [Henry Wilson] in the other end of the Capitol, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, pressing a conscript bill through the Senate, when his own State stands in defiance of the call made upon her last summer. To-day her quota is not full, and her Governor has become an itinerant recruiting sergeant in search of negroes to fill up the regiments of Massachusetts troops under the call made last fall by the President of the United States. This is the response of Massachusetts to the proclamation.

And the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House [Abraham B. Olin], comes here and has to admit his State is delinquent thirty thousand troops, under the calls already made upon her.

Mr. Olin.—And that deficiency is principally owing to a deficiency of troops which ought to have been sent from the city of New York, where the Democracy of the Five Points has held undisputed sway. [Laughter.]

Mr. Voorhees.—You propose to put the black man alongside of the loyal white soldier. You propose to buy negroes, steal negroes, fight for negroes, obtain negroes in any way, and then humiliate and disgrace the white soldier by his presence and contact in the ranks.

You have thus outraged and insulted all classes of citizens, but the soldier most of all. Is it strange, then, that no more volunteers come to the standard of war? You have betrayed the loyal heart of the country, and that betrayal rises up in judgment against you; and its offspring, the birth of that betrayal, is this fearful, odious, and despotic conscription bill.

No conservative general can stand before the consuming flames that emanate from the seething caldron, the boiling cesspool of fanaticism which controls this Administration. Aye, sir, you struck down McClellan at the head of the army. You struck him down because he was in the way of your radical abolition schemes. It was another step in the betrayal of the people. Go with me to the townships in Indiana, Mr. Speaker; go to the hamlets, go to the school-houses and meet there the loyal farmers who pay their taxes from their well-worn pocketbooks—not your flash speculators in stocks on Wall street; not your political or banking gamblers and swindling contractors, who control this Government and who surround this Capitol like jackals and unclean beasts, like kites and carrion crows, watching and snuffing for plunder amid the misfortunes that have befallen the country; not that class of men, but men who are devoted to the old Constitution, who worship reverently after the old forms of religion, who love their country and maintain their own honor—go and ask these men, upon whom you have to rely for this Government, what they think of the removal of George B.

McClellan from the command of their sons. They will tell you that their sons love him as no chieftain was ever loved by his troops since the days of the great Napoleon. They will tell you that, in spite of all jealousies and assailants, he is the only man who has ever gained a battle at the head of the army of the Potomac; and, as plain people, they will tell you that, in their minds, his removal was caused by the machinations, the mischievous machinations, of the radical element which prevails here, and which is now running the Government to destruction in this Capitol. This, sir, is the firm belief of the country, and you will have to meet it.

You may call us disloyal if it will ease your hearts any, but our opinion upon this side of the House is just as firm, just as sharply and clearly made up, that the majority of this House has been disloyal in the acts I have enumerated and in the general scope of its conduct to the Constitution of the country as if you had been convicted of overt treason, and stood ready to be executed according to law.

But there is another feature in the conduct of this Administration and its supporters that goes as a reason why troops cannot now be brought into the field as volunteers, and a despotic conscription bill has to be passed. The people of the country have seen public economy disregarded. They have seen thieves and plunderers in the high places of the Government not only unrebuked, but rewarded by promotion to higher honors in place and profit. They have seen fortunes more than mountain high made in a single night by political favorites. No, sir; keep still, sir. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [John Covode, who made a remark in his seat] can speak feelingly and knowingly and understandingly, I have no doubt, upon the subject to which I allude. He has his friend, the late Secretary of War, the late minister to Russia, the late candidate for United States Senator in Pennsylvania, I presume, in his mind. I have no doubt it is a delicate point with him. I have by my side, however, my very distinguished and reliable friend from Massachusetts [Henry L. Dawes], who always comes to my relief, and, if I cannot prove by him that Simon Cameron and some of his friends are plunderers and public thieves, I will give up the case. [Laughter.]

These contractors and lobby thieves surrounding this Capitol, creating a swell mob in these galleries, the greediest of the greedy, the hungriest of all animals that ever infested in droves and packs the haunts of political offal, are the men who are loudest and most persistent for the continued prosecution of this war.

No abuse can be denounced that we do not hear the cry of treason from their hungry lips. What does it matter to them that the poor soldier lies stiff in the snow upon his thin blanket? They go upon the motto, "Put money in thy purse." If you think that the people are blind to this state of affairs you are mistaken. They know that these loathsome cormorants are encamped here to eat out their substance. They know that they are the Hessians of this war, and that no peace will be permitted to revisit this bleeding land so long as villainy can find pay in the coffers of the Government, if this evil brood can prevent it.

But, sir, I thank God that the hand-writing is on the wall. The corrupt and impious feast of Belshazzar, the king, his princes, his parasites and concubines, is about over. The fingers of the American people are busily engaged in writing a doom against those who have turned the temple of our fathers into a den of thieves.

The people have seen other things, however, to discourage them in the prosecution of this war. They have seen you take advantage of the political condition of the country—you men who represent the spindles and looms of New England; they have seen you coming here and forcing on the agricultural portions of the country a tariff which is a robbery, a direct plunder on honest labor; they have seen you develop the most selfish, greedy, degrading element of the human heart—the love of gain by unfair means—taxing the whole country for the purpose of carrying out merely personal interests. To-day the Western farmer, the Western mechanic, pays three or four times the ordinary price for the articles which he has to buy from you and which he can buy nowhere else.

The people understand it well. They know that this increase of price does not go into the treasury of their beloved country; that it does not go even into the coffers "where thieves break through and steal"; but that it goes directly into the pockets of the millionaire, the nabob, the monopolist of the manufacturing districts. They know all that. It makes them tired of war. They are sore at heart and see no hope of success, justice, union, or constitutional liberty at your hands.

Further, I say to you, gentlemen, that, as the Lord God reigns in heaven, you cannot go on with your system of provost marshals and police officials arresting free white men for discharging what they conceive to be their duty within the plain provisions of the Constitution and maintain peace in the loyal States. Blood will flow. You cannot and you shall not forge our fetters on our limbs without a struggle for the mastery.

The great American heart is fired anew with the love of liberty, and the people are arousing like the giant after his sleep. They have erected their heads and warn you not to lay the weight of your finger, of your smallest finger, on one of the great muniments of personal freedom which adorn the history of the world. If you do, it is at your most deadly peril.

Conscription by the South

Conscription in the Southern States, says Alexander Johnston in his "American Political History," preceded, and, to some extent, compelled, the adoption of conscription by the Federal Government. The act of

SOUTHERN VOLUNTEERS

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

April 16, 1862, with the amendment of September 27, 1862, was rather a levy en masse than a conscription. It made no provision for draft, but placed all white men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, resident in the Confederate States, and not legally exempt, in the Confederate service.

July 18, 1863, by proclamation, President Jefferson Davis put the conscription law into operation, and directed the enrolment to begin at once. February 17, 1864, a second conscription law was passed. It added to the former conscript ages those between seventeen and eighteen, and between forty-five and fifty, who were to do duty as a garrison and reserve corps. It excepted certain classes, such as one editor to each newspaper, one apothecary to each drug store, and one farmer to each farm employing fifteen able-bodied slaves, and provided that all persons who should neglect or refuse to be enrolled should be placed in the field service for the war. No substitutes were or could be accepted, for every person able to do military duty was himself already conscripted.

Very little resistance was made to this sweeping levy, for the Government of the Confederate States showed little mercy to opposition of any kind. Only through the conscription were the Southern armies filled for the last two years of the war, and its enforcement was so rigorous and inquisitorial that toward the end of the war the Confederacy generally had more men in the field than it could provide with arms.

Civil vs. Military Authority

Stephens [Ga.] as Envoy of the Confederacy.

THE draft ordered by the conscription met with little resistance outside of New York City and a few Democratic counties in Ohio.

In New York the law was put into operation on July 11, 1863. On the following Monday a mob broke into the office of the provost marshal, destroyed the wheel which contained the names of possible conscripts, and, setting fire to the building and preventing the firemen from extinguishing the flames, caused it to be burned to the ground. On the Superintendent of Police endeavoring to enforce order, he was set upon and barely escaped with his life. The police being unable to cope with the disorder, New York City regiments at the front were telegraphed for; they were unable to arrive for four days, and during this time the mob, increasing in number, committed many outrages, hanging negroes, and, after driving the little inmates into the street, pillaging and burning a colored orphan asylum. Collecting in Printing House Square on Monday they were about to destroy the offices of the newspapers which supported the Administration—particularly the Tribune—when Governor Horatio Seymour caused them to desist temporarily from executing their design by speaking to them from the steps of the City Hall. On Tuesday he issued a proclamation against rioting, but this had no effect. On the return of the troops the mob dispersed.

The draft, however, was not enforced in the city for some time. On August 3 Governor Seymour appealed to the President to suspend execution of the law until the courts could decide on its constitutionality, which had been questioned. The President replied that the draft must go on, leaving the question of constitutionality to be decided later.

> My purpose is to be in my action just and constitutional, and yet practical, in performing the important duty with which I am charged: of maintaining the unity and the free principles of our common country.

The draft was resumed on August 19, and was concluded in an orderly fashion.

Arrest of Vallandigham

A less tragic yet politically more important development of Northern resistance to military authority occurred in Ohio during the summer and fall of 1863. General Ambrose E. Burnside in his new department (headquarters Cincinnati) issued an edict known as "General Order No. 38," forbidding acts committed for the benefit of the enemy, and stating that persons committing such offences would be tried as spies or traitors, or sent over into the lines of their friends, the rebels.

Clement L. Vallandigham, whose term in Congress had expired in March, and who had been defeated for reëlection, repeated in various public speeches the sentiments he had uttered in the House of Representatives, assailing such acts of the Administration as the conscription law as unconstitutional and despotic.

On May 4 General Burnside arrested Mr. Vallandigham at his home in Dayton, and brought him to headquarters at Cincinnati for trial by court-martial. His counsel, ex-Senator George E. Pugh, applied for a writ of habeas corpus, which the judge refused, on the ground that the action of General Burnside was in the interest of public safety. Mr. Vallandigham was tried on the 6th, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment in a Federal fortress. General Burnside designated Fort Warren in Boston Harbor as the place of incarceration. The President, however, changed this sentence into the alternative presented by Order No. 38, and sent the prisoner over into the Confederate lines. From the South Mr. Vallandigham ran through the blockade, finally arriving in Canada.

Public meetings were held all over the country to denounce the Administration for its despotic act. General Burnside, fearing that he had been unwise in bringing this storm of criticism upon the Government, offered his resignation. In reply the President telegraphed him on May 29 as follows:

> When I shall wish to supersede you I will let you know. All the Cabinet regretted the necessity of arresting, for instante, Vallandigham, some perhaps doubting there was a real necessity for it; but, being done, all were for seeing you through with it.

The brunt of seeing Burnside through, however, fell on the President, and ably did he fulfil the difficult task. Opposed to him were some of the shrewdest constitutional lawyers in the country. At their instigation able resolutions in denunciation of Vallandigham's arrest as unconstitutional were passed at various public meetings. The President chose to reply to the resolutions passed at Albany, N. Y., on May 19. To this Governor Seymour had sent an address, in which he said: "If this proceeding is approved by the Government, and sanctioned by the people, it is not merely a step toward revolution—it is revolution; it will not only lead to military despotism—it establishes military despotism." The resolutions closed with a denunciation of "the blow struck at a citizen of Ohio" as "aimed at every citizen of the North," and "against the spirit of our laws and Constitution." They earnestly called on the President "to reverse the action of the military tribunal which has passed a cruel and unusual punishment upon the party arrested, prohibited in terms by the Constitution," and to restore him to liberty.

The President took his time in preparing a reply, with the result that the letter, when it was finished on June 12, proved to be one of his notable papers, comparable for its cogent argument to his Cooper Union address.

Military Arrests Justifiable

President Lincoln

He began by analyzing the resolutions of the meeting and showing that their movers and himself had a common purpose, the maintenance of the nation, differing only in the choice of measures for effecting that object. "The meeting, by their resolutions, assert and argue that certain military arrests, . . . for which I am ultimately responsible, are unconstitutional. I think they are not." He then argued that these arrests were not made for "treason," as charged, but on "totally different grounds," i. e., for purely military reasons. He narrated the manner in which the enemy with which the country was in open war had, under cover of "liberty of speech," "liberty of the press," and "habeas corpus," kept a corps of spies in the North, which had aided the secessionist cause in a thousand ways. "Yet," said the President, "thoroughly imbued with a reverence for the guaranteed rights of individuals, I was slow to adopt the strong measures which by degrees I had been forced to regard as being within the exceptions of the Constitution, and as indispensable to the public safety." But the evil had to be dealt with, and by more effective means than afforded by the civil courts, on whose juries sympathizers with the accused were apt to sit, "more ready to hang the panel than to hang the traitor." And again, said Lincoln, there are crimes against the country which may be so conducted as to evade the cognizance of a civil court, such as dissuading a man from volunteering or inducing a soldier to desert. These are cases clearly coming under that clause of the Constitution which permits suspension of the writ of habeas corpus "when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, public safety may require it."

The President then proceeded to draw a distinction between civil and military law. He said:

> The former is directed at the small percentage of ordinary and continuous perpetration of crime, while the latter is directed at sudden and extensive uprisings against the Government, which, at most, will succeed or fail in no great length of time. In the latter case arrests are made not so much for what has been done, as for what probably would be done. The latter is more for the preventive and less for the vindictive than the former. In such cases the purposes of men are much more easily understood than in cases of ordinary crime. The man who stands by and says nothing when the peril of his Government is discussed cannot be misunderstood. If not hindered, he is sure to help the enemy; much more if he talks ambiguously—talks for his country with "buts," and "ifs," and "ands."

The President showed how greatly the country had suffered through deferring arrests for treason, by citing the cases of John C. Breckinridge, Robert E. Lee, Joseph E. Johnston, and other commanders in the Confederate service who had all been within the power of the Government after the outbreak of the war, and who were well known to be traitors at the time. Said the President:

> In view of these and similar cases, I think the time not unlikely to come when I shall be blamed for having made too few arrests rather than too many.

Mr. Lincoln then examined the contention of the committee that even during a war military arrests were unconstitutional outside of the region of hostilities. To this the President replied:

> Inasmuch, however, as the Constitution itself makes no such distinction, I am unable to believe that there is any such constitutional distinction. I concede that the class of arrests complained of can be constitutional only when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require them; and I insist that in such cases they are constitutional wherever the public safety does require them, as well in places to which they may prevent the rebellion extending as in those where it may be already prevailing; as well where they may restrain mischievous interference with the raising and supplying of armies to suppress the rebellion, as where the rebellion may actually be; as well where they may restrain the enticing men out of the army, as where they would prevent mutiny in the army. . . .
>
> Mr. Vallandigham's arrest was made because he was laboring, with some effect, to prevent the raising of troops, to encourage desertions from the army, and to leave the rebellion without an adequate military force to suppress it. He was not arrested because he was damaging the political prospects of the Administration or the personal interests of the commanding general, but because he was damaging the army, upon the existence and vigor of which the life of the nation depends. He was warring upon the military, and this gave the military constitutional jurisdiction to lay hands upon him. If Mr. Vallandigham was not damaging the military power of the country, then his arrest was made on mistake of fact, which I would be glad to correct on reasonably satisfactory evidence.

With an argument appealing even more to the hearts than the heads of his critics, Mr. Lincoln continued:

> I understand the meeting whose resolutions I am considering to be in favor of suppressing the rebellion by military force—by armies. Long experience has shown that armies cannot be maintained unless desertion shall be punished by the severe penalty of death. The case requires, and the law and the Constitution sanction, this punishment. Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert? . . . I think that, in such a case, to silence the agitator and save the boy is not only constitutional, but a great mercy.

In fine, said the President:

I can no more be persuaded that the Government can constitutionally take no strong measures in time of rebellion, because it can be shown that the same could not be lawfully taken in time of peace, than I can be persuaded that a particular drug is not good medicine for a sick man because it can be shown not to be good food for a well one. Nor am I able to appreciate the danger apprehended by the meeting, that the American people will by means of military arrests during the rebellion lose the right of public discussion, the liberty of speech and the press, the law of evidence, trial by jury, and habeas corpus throughout the indefinite peaceful future which I trust lies before them, any more than I am able to believe that a man could contract so strong an appetite for emetics during temporary illness as to persist in feeding upon them during the remainder of his healthful life.

The President gently rebuked the memorialists for introducing partisan politics into the affair by designating themselves as "Democrats" rather than "American citizens." Nevertheless he accepted the challenge, and showed that Andrew Jackson, the idol of the Democratic party, had made a military arrest of the author of a denunciatory newspaper article, and refused the service upon himself of a writ of habeas corpus, being fined for so doing; thirty years later, after a full discussion of the constitutional aspects of the case, a Democratic Congress refunded him principal and interest of the fine.

At the conclusion of his letter the President stated that he had been pained when he learned of Mr. Vallandigham's arrest, and he promised to release him with pleasure when he felt assured that the public safety would not suffer by it.

Treason Made Odious

On June 11 the Ohio Democratic convention nominated Vallandigham for governor of the State upon a platform which protested against the emancipation proclamation, military arrests in loyal States, and, in particular, the banishment of Vallandigham. A committee presented these resolutions to the President, and on June 29 he replied to them in the tenor of his letter to the Albany meeting, elaborating the constitutional argument, and closing with the following proposition:

Your nominee for governor . . . is known . . . to declare against the use of an army to suppress the rebellion. Your own attitude, therefore, encourages desertion, resistance to the draft, and the like, because it teaches those who incline to desert and to escape the draft to believe it is your purpose to protect them and to hope that you will become strong enough to do so. . . .

I cannot say I think you desire this effect to follow your attitude; but I assure you that both friends and enemies of the Union look upon it in this light. It is a substantial hope, and, by consequence, a real strength to the enemy. If it is a false hope, and one which you would willingly dispel, I will make the way exceedingly easy. I send you duplicates of this letter, in order that you, or a majority, may, if you choose, indorse your names upon one of them, and return it thus indorsed to me, with the understanding that those signing are thereby committed to the following propositions, and to nothing else:—

1. That there is now rebellion in the United States, the object and tendency of which is to destroy the national Union; and that, in your opinion, an army and navy are constitutional means for suppressing that rebellion.

2. That no one of you will do anything which, in his own judgment, will tend to hinder the increase, or favor the decrease, or lessen the efficiency of the army and navy, while engaged in the effort to suppress that rebellion; and,—

3. That each of you will, in his sphere, do all he can to have the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the army and navy, while engaged in the effort to suppress the rebellion, paid, fed, clad, and otherwise well provided for and supported.

And with the further understanding that upon receiving the letter and names thus indorsed I will cause them to be published, which publication shall be, within itself, a revocation of the order in relation to Mr. Vallandigham.

The committee, put upon the defensive by this clever device of the President, took the only attitude which was possible short of capitulation, and rejected the proposition as an insult to their loyalty.

Distinguished members of the Democratic party in other States took the same position as the Ohio committee. Ex-President Franklin Pierce delivered a carefully prepared oration at a great Democratic meeting held in Concord, N. H., in midsummer. He said:

"Moral Force, Not Arms, Will Save the Union"

Franklin Pierce

Do we not all know that the cause of our calamities is the vicious intermeddling of too many of the citizens of the Northern States with the constitutional rights of the Southern States, coöperating with the discontents of the people of those States? And now, war! war, in its direst shape—war, such as it makes the blood run cold to read of in the history of other nations and of other times—war, on a scale of a million of men in arms —war, horrid as that of barbaric ages, rages in several of the States of the Union, as its more immediate field, and casts the lurid shadow of its death and lamentation athwart the whole expanse, and into every nook and corner of our vast domain. Nor is that all; for in those of the States which are exempt from the actual ravages of war, in which the roar of the cannon, and the rattle of the musketry, and the groans of the dying are heard but as a faint echo of terror from other lands, even here in the loyal States, the mailed hand of military usurpation strikes down the liberties of the people and its foot tramples on a desecrated Constitution. Aye, in this land of free thought, free speech, and free writing—in this Republic of free suffrage, with liberty of thought and expression as the very essence of republican institutions—even here, in these free States, it is made criminal . . . for that noble martyr of free speech, Mr. Vallandigham, to discuss public affairs in Ohio—aye, even here, the temporary agents of the sovereign people, the transitory administrators of the government, tell us that in time of war the mere arbitrary will of the President takes the place of the Constitution, and the President himself announces to us that it is treasonable to speak or to write otherwise than as he may prescribe; nay, that it is treasonable even to be silent, though we be struck dumb by the shock of the calamities with which evil counsels, incompetency, and corruption, have overwhelmed our country.

This fearful, fruitless, fatal civil war has exhibited our amazing resources and vast military power. It has shown that, united, even in carrying out, in its widest interpretation, the Monroe Doctrine, on this continent, we could, with such protection as the broad ocean which flows between ourselves and European powers affords, have stood against the world in arms. I speak of the war as fruitless; for it is clear that, prosecuted upon the basis of the proclamations of September 22 and September 24, 1862, prosecuted, as I must understand those proclamations, to say nothing of the kindred brood which has followed, upon the theory of emancipation, devastation, subjugation, it cannot fail to be fruitless in everything except the harvest of woe which it is ripening for what was once the peerless Republic.

Now, fellow citizens, after having said thus much, it is right that you should ask me, What would you do in this fearful extremity? I reply, From the beginning of this struggle to the present moment my hope has been in moral power. There it reposes still. When, in the spring of 1861, I had occasion to address my fellow citizens of this city, from the balcony of the hotel before us, I then said I had not believed, and did not then believe, aggression by arms was either a suitable or possible remedy for existing evils. All that has occurred since then has but strengthened and confirmed my convictions in this regard. I repeat, then, my judgment impels me to rely upon moral force, and not upon any of the coercive instrumentalities of military power. We have seen, in the experience of the last two years, how futile are all our efforts to maintain the Union by force of arms; but, even had war been carried on by us successfully, the ruinous result would exhibit its utter impracticability for the attainment of the desired end. Through peaceful agencies, and through such agencies alone, can we hope to 'form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity': the great objects for which, and for which alone, the Constitution was formed. If you turn round and ask me, What if these agencies fail, what if the passionate anger of both sections forbids, what if the ballot-box is sealed? Then, all efforts, whether of war or peace, having failed, my reply is, You will take care of yourselves; with or without arms, with or without leaders, we will, at least, in the effort to defend our rights as a free people, build up a great mausoleum of hearts, to which men who yearn for liberty will, in after years, with bowed heads and reverently, resort, as Christian pilgrims to the sacred shrines of the Holy Land.

Governor Horatio Seymour [N. Y.] addressed a large gathering in New York City about the same time. He said:

The Revolutionary Doctrine of Public Necessity

Governor Seymour

A few years ago we stood before this community to warn them of the dangers of sectional strife; but our fears were laughed at. At a later day, when the clouds of war overhung our country, we implored those in authority to compromise that difficulty: for we had been told by that great orator and statesman, Burke, that there never yet was a revolution that might not have been prevented by a compromise opportunely and graciously made. [Great applause.] Our prayers were unheeded. Again, when the contest was opened, we invoked those who had the conduct of affairs not to underrate the power of the adversary—not to underrate the courage, and resources, and endurance of our own sister States. This warning was treated as sympathy with treason. You have the results of these unheeded warnings and unheeded prayers; they have stained our soil with blood; they have carried mourning into thousands of homes; and to-day they have brought our country to the very verge of destruction. Once more I come before you to offer again an earnest prayer, and beg you to listen to a warning. Our country is not only at this time torn by one of the bloodiest wars that has ever ravaged the face of the earth, but, if we turn our faces to our own loyal States, how is it there? You find the community divided into political parties, strongly arrayed, and using with regard to each other terms of reproach and defiance. It is said by those who support more particularly the Administration that we, who differ honestly, patriotically, sincerely, from them with regard to the line of duty, are men of treasonable purposes and enemies to our country. ["Hear, hear."] On the other hand, the Democratic organization look upon this Administration as hostile to their rights and liberties; they look upon their opponents as men who would do them wrong in regard to their most sacred franchises. I need not call your attention to the tone of the press, or to the tone of public feeling, to show you how, at this moment, parties are thus exasperated, and stand in defiant attitudes to each other. A few years ago we were told that sectional strife, waged in words like these, would do no harm to our country; but you have seen the sad and bloody results. Let us be admonished now in time, and take care that this irritation, this feeling which is growing up in our midst, shall not also ripen into civil troubles that shall carry the evils of war into our own homes.

Upon one point all are agreed, and that is this: Until we have a united North we can have no successful war. Until we have a united, harmonious North we can have no beneficent peace. How shall we gain harmony? How shall the unity of all be obtained? Is it to be coerced? I appeal to you, my Republican friends, when you say to us that the nation's life and existence hang upon harmony and concord here, if you yourselves, in your serious moments, believe that this is to be produced by seizing our persons, by infringing upon our rights, by insulting our homes, and by depriving us of those cherished principles for which our fathers fought, and to which we have always sworn allegiance. [Great applause.]

We only ask that you shall give to us that which you claim for yourselves, and that which every freeman, and every man who respects himself, will have—freedom of speech, the right to exercise all the franchises conferred by the Constitution upon American citizens. [Great applause.] Can you safely deny us these? Will you not trample upon your own rights if you refuse to listen? Do you not create revolution when you say that our persons may be rightfully seized, our property confiscated, our homes entered? Are you not exposing yourselves, your own interests, to as great a peril as that with which you threaten us? Remember this, that the bloody, and treasonable, and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a government. [Applause.]

To-day the great masses of conservatives who still battle for time-honored principles of government, amid denunciation, contumely, and abuse, are the only barriers that stand between this Government and its own destruction. If we should acquiesce in the doctrine that, in times of war, constitutions are suspended, and laws have lost their force, then we should accept a doctrine that the very right by which this Government administers its power has lost its virtue, and we would be brought down to the level of rebellion itself, having an existence only by virtue of material power. When men accept despotism they may have a choice as to who the despot shall be. The struggle then will not be, Shall we have constitutional liberty? But, having accepted the doctrine that the Constitution has lost its force, every instinct of personal ambition, every instinct of personal security, will lead men to put themselves under the protection of that power which they suppose most competent to guard their persons.

In conclusion he said:

We stand to-day amid new-made graves, in a land filled with mourning; upon a soil saturated with the blood of the fiercest conflict of which history gives us an account. We can, if we will, avert all these calamities and evoke a blessing. If we will do what? Hold that Constitution, and liberties, and laws are suspended?—shrink back from the assertion of right? Will that restore them? Or shall we do as our fathers did, under circumstances of like trial, when they combated against the powers of a crown? They did not say that liberty was suspended; that men might be deprived of the right of trial by jury; that they might be torn from their homes by midnight intruders? [Tremendous and continued applause.] If you would save your country and your liberties, begin right; begin at the hearthstones, which are ever meant to be the foundations of American institutions; begin in your family circle; declare that your privileges shall be held sacred; and, having once proclaimed your own rights, take care that you do not invade those of your neighbor. [Applause.]

The Ohio Democrats went into the campaign foredoomed to defeat. The Republican party determined to "make treason odious" by piling up an enormous majority of votes against him. They nominated John Brough, a "War Democrat," to make the issue as clear as possible. By a State law the soldiers in the field were permitted to vote, and they, as well as the citizens at home, cast their ballots under conditions which would be far from satisfactory to a ballot reformer of the present day. Brough won the election with over 100,000 votes to spare. Soon after his defeat, Vallandigham returned openly to Ohio, evidently daring the Government to arrest him again. The President, however, realizing that Vallandigham's power to injure the draft was broken, ignored his presence in the country. Undoubtedly he would have taken a similar course from the beginning, had not Burnside's action in arresting Vallandigham forced him to carry out an autocratic policy. For Lincoln did not approve of supplying martyrs to the opposition, and, therefore, when forced to do so, he contrived to make them as unheroic, and even ridiculous, as possible. Brilliant orator though he was, Clement L. Vallandigham's connection with his party became a positive detriment to it, and he soon retired from politics to devote himself to law, in the practice of which he met his death in a strange and tragic fashion. In defending a man accused of murder he shot himself, as he was illustrating the manner in which his client might have discharged his pistol by accident while drawing it from his pocket.

The political campaign of 1863 in other States as well as in Ohio was waged along the lines laid down by the President, with the result of sweeping gubernatorial victories for the Administration.

The President not only sounded the keynote of the campaign, and formulated the Administration's platform, but wrote, as it were, the campaign text-book of his party, reviewing the acts of the Administration and supporting its policies so completely and cogently that nothing essential could be added. All this he did in an address which he sent to a mass-meeting of "unconditional Union men" at Springfield, Ill., and which was there read on September 3 amid the greatest enthusiasm.

Justification of His Administration

President Lincoln

After tendering the nation's gratitude to those "noble men whom no partisan malice or partisan hope can make false to the nation's life," the President plunged at once into a justification of his course.

There are those who are dissatisfied with me. To such I would say: You desire peace, and you blame me that we do not have it. But how can we attain it? There are but three conceivable ways: First, to suppress the rebellion by force of arms. This I am trying to do. Are you for it? If you are, so far we are agreed. If you are not for it, a second way is to give up the Union. I am against this. Are you for it? If you are, you should say so plainly. If you are not for force, nor yet for dissolution, there only remains some imaginable compromise. I do not believe any compromise embracing the maintenance of the Union is now possible. All I learn leads to a directly opposite belief. The strength of the rebellion is its military, its army. That army dominates all the country and all the people within its range. Any offer of terms made by any man or men within that range, in opposition to that army, is simply nothing for the present, because such man or men have no power whatever to enforce their side of a compromise, if one were made with them.

To illustrate. Suppose refugees from the South and peace men of the North get together in convention and frame and proclaim a compromise embracing a restoration of the Union. In what way can that compromise be used to keep Lee's army out of Pennsylvania? Meade's army can keep Lee's army out of Pennsylvania, and, I think, can ultimately drive it out of existence. But no paper compromise to which the controllers of Lee's army are not agreed can at all affect that army. In an effort at such compromise we should waste time which the enemy would improve to our disadvantage; and that would be all. A compromise, to be effective, must be made either with those who control the rebel army, or with the people first liberated from the domination of that army by the success of our own army. Now, allow me to assure you that no word or intimation from that rebel army, or from any of the men controlling it, in relation to any peace compromise, has ever come to my knowledge or belief. All charges and insinuations to the contrary are deceptive and groundless. And I promise you that, if any such proposition shall hereafter come, it shall not be rejected and kept a secret from you. I freely acknowledge myself the servant of the people, according to the bond of service—the United States Constitution—and that, as such, I am responsible to them.

But to be plain. You are dissatisfied with me about the negro. Quite likely there is a difference of opinion between you and myself upon that subject. I certainly wish that all men could be free, while I suppose you do not. Yet I have neither adopted nor proposed any measure which is not consistent with even your view, provided you are for the Union. I suggested compensated emancipation, to which you replied you wished not to be taxed to buy negroes. But I had not asked you to be taxed to buy negroes, except in such way as to save you from greater taxation to save the Union exclusively by other means.

You dislike the emancipation proclamation, and perhaps would have it retracted. You say it is unconstitutional. I think differently. I think the Constitution invests its commander-in-chief with the law of war in time of war. The most that can be said—if so much—is that slaves are property. Is there—has there ever been—any question that, by the law of war, property, both of enemies and friends, may be taken when needed? And is it not needed whenever taking it helps us, or hurts the enemy? Armies, the world over, destroy enemies' property when they cannot use it; and even destroy their own to keep it from the enemy. Civilized belligerents do all in their power to help themselves or hurt the enemy, except a few things regarded as barbarous or cruel. Among the exceptions are the massacre of vanquished foes and non-combatants, male and female.

But the proclamation, as law, either is valid or is not valid. If it is not valid it needs no retraction. If it is valid it cannot be retracted, any more than the dead can be brought to life. Some of you profess to think its retraction would operate favorably for the Union. Why better after the retraction than before the issue? There was more than a year and a half of trial to suppress the rebellion before the proclamation was issued, the last one hundred days of which passed under an explicit notice that it was coming, unless averted by those in revolt returning to their allegiance. The war has certainly progressed as favorably for us since the issue of the proclamation as before.

I know as fully as one can know the opinions of others that some of the commanders of our armies in the field, who have given us our most important victories, believe the emancipation policy and the use of colored troops constitute the heaviest blows yet dealt to the rebellion, and that at least one of those important successes could not have been achieved when it was but for the aid of black soldiers.

Among the commanders who hold these views are some who have never had any affinity with what is called "abolitionism," or with "Republican party politics," but who hold them purely as military opinions. I submit their opinions as entitled to some weight against the objections often urged that emancipation and arming the blacks are unwise as military measures, and were not adopted as such in good faith.

You say that you will not fight to free negroes. Some of them seem willing to fight for you; but no matter. Fight you, then exclusively, to save the Union. I issued the proclamation on purpose to aid you in saving the Union. Whenever you shall have conquered all resistance to the Union, if I shall urge you to continue fighting, it will be an apt time then for you to declare you will not fight to free negroes. I thought that in your struggle for the Union, to whatever extent the negroes should cease helping the enemy, to that extent it weakened the enemy in his resistance to you. Do you think differently? I thought that whatever negroes can be got to do as soldiers leaves just so much less for white soldiers to do in saving the Union. Does it appear otherwise to you? But negroes, like other people, act upon motives. Why should they do anything for us if we will do nothing for them? If they stake their lives for us they must be prompted by the strongest motive, even the promise of freedom. And the promise, being made, must be kept.

The letter closed with a glowing exordium, such as those which, in the days of the fight for free territory, had roused his auditors to a frenzy of enthusiasm. In classic phrase it pictured the soldiers and sailors of the Union marching on to certain victory. It paid tribute to the courage of the negro troops, and with Cromwellian ire contrasted their patriotism with the hypocritical pretensions of the "malignants" of the peace party. Yet its oratorical fever was restrained from soaring into bombast by a ballast of common sense, and its tense feeling was relieved by a touch of grotesque humor, to which, as President even more than as citizen, Lincoln was wont to give loose in his most serious moments. Virtually his "last stump-speech," it was unquestionably his most characteristic and best one.

The signs look better. The Father of Waters again goes unvexed to the sea. Thanks to the great Northwest for it; nor yet wholly to them. Three hundred miles up they met New England, Empire, Keystone, and Jersey, hewing their way right and left. The sunny South, too, in more colors than one, also lent a helping hand. On the spot, their part of the history was jotted down in black and white. The job was a great national one, and let none be slighted who bore an honorable part in it. And, while those who have cleared the great river may well be proud, even that is not all. It is hard to say that anything has been more bravely and well done than at Antietam, Murfreesboro, Gettysburg, and on many fields of less note. Nor must Uncle Sam's web feet be forgotten. At all the watery margins they have been present. Not only on the deep sea, the broad bay, and the rapid river, but also up the narrow, muddy bayou, and wherever the ground was a little damp, they have been and made their tracks. Thanks to all: for the great republic—for the principle it lives by and keeps alive—for man's vast future—thanks to all.

Peace does not appear so distant as it did. I hope it will come soon, and come to stay, and so come as to be worth the keeping in all future time. It will then have been proved that among free men there can be no successful appeal from the ballot to the bullet, and that they who take such appeal are sure to lose their case and pay the cost. And then there will be some black men who can remember that with silent tongue, and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well-poised bayonet, they have helped mankind on to this great consummation, while I fear there will be some white ones unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they strove to hinder it.

Still, let us not be over-sanguine of a speedy final triumph. Let us be quite sober. Let us diligently apply the means, never doubting that a just God, in his own good time, will give us the rightful result.

That reference in the address to offers of compromise made by representatives of the Confederacy was evoked by various propositions made for self-advertisement by irresponsible parties such as Fernando Wood, a Democratic politician of New York, who boldly confessed his sympathy with the South and virtually offered himself as a mediator. To him Lincoln had replied (on December 12, 1862):

Understanding your phrase, "The Southern States would send representatives to the next Congress," to be substantially the same as that "the people of the Southern States would cease resistance, and would reinaugurate, submit to, and maintain the national authority within the limits of such States, under the Constitution of the United States," I say that in such case the war would cease on the part of the United States, and that if, within a reasonable time, "a full and general amnesty" were necessary to such end, it would not be withheld. I do not think it would be proper now for me to communicate this formally or informally to the people of the Southern States. My belief is that they already know it; and when they choose, if ever, they can communicate with me unequivocally. Nor do I think it proper now to suspend military operations to try any experiment of negotiation.

It is true, however, that a no less responsible party than Alexander H. Stephens, Vice-President of the Confederacy, had presented to the Navy Department on July 4, 1863, a request that he be permitted to come to Washington bearing "a communication in writing from Jefferson Davis, Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces of the Confederate States, to Abraham Lincoln, Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States," but there was no statement of the nature of the communication. As the request studiously avoided recognition of the President in other than the military capacity of that office, Mr. Lincoln very wisely and properly ordered the Secretary of the Navy [Gideon Welles] to reply:

The request of A. H. Stephens is inadmissible. The customary agents and channels are adequate for all needful communication and conference between the United States forces and the insurgents.

CHAPTER XIII

"Bayonets at the Polls"

Lazarus W. Powell [Ky.] Introduces Bill in Senate to Prevent Military Interference with Elections—Debate: in Favor of Bill, Senator Powell, James A. McDougall [Cal.], Reverdy Johnson [Md.]; Opposed, Jacob M. Howard [Mich.], James Harlan [Ia.].

OWING to charges that there had been military interference by the order of the President with elections held in the border States during the summer and autumn of 1863, Lazarus W. Powell [Ky.] introduced in the Senate on January 5, 1864, a bill to prevent officers of the army and navy from interfering in elections in the States. This was finally referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported against it, and presented an elaborate report justifying the action of the President. On March 3 Senator Powell's bill was brought before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Military Interference with Elections

Senate, March 3-5, 1864

On March 3 and 4 Senator Powell spoke in favor of the bill.

It cannot be doubted that upon the keeping of the elective franchise absolutely free depends the very existence of our form of government and our republican institutions. Free States in all ages have regarded the purity of the elective franchise as of the greatest and most vital importance, and have enacted severe penal laws for the punishment of those who interfered by force or fraud to prevent free elections. I believe there is no government on the face of the earth in which elections have been carried on for the purpose of appointing any of the officers of the government, save and except the United States of America, that has not had laws to punish, and severely punish, those who should interfere with the freedom of the elective franchise. All the republics of antiquity had the severest laws punishing those who interfered with the freedom of their elections.

By the laws of Great Britain persons convicted of bribery, force, or fraud at elections are punished severely. At the common law bribery and kindred offences were crimes, and the British statutes punished persons guilty of such offences on conviction with fines of £500, and deprived them of the privilege ever after of voting or holding any office of trust or honor under that government. One section of this bill provides that the soldiers of the army of the United States shall not be permitted to be kept within one mile of any poll where an election is going on, on the day of election. I find similar provisions in the English law.

Mr. Tucker, in his notes to Blackstone's Commentaries, in reference to the British law requiring soldiers to be removed from the place of voting, says, "A similar regulation in the election of Representatives to Congress seems highly proper and necessary." It is strange to me that we have never had such a law on our statute book. I suppose the only reason for the absence of such a law is that our elections have been regulated heretofore by officers appointed by the States, and it is only very recently that the armies of the United States have attempted to interfere in our elections.

By the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and by the constitution of every State in the Union, the military is to be kept in strict subordination to the civil power; and I suppose that those who went before us never thought we should have rulers so wicked and corrupt as to use the machinery of the Federal Government for the purpose of prostrating the freedom of elections in the States; otherwise, I am sure that such laws as the one before us would have been enacted long before this. I find upon examination that seven of the States of the Union have enacted statutes to prevent soldiers making their appearance on election day at the places where the elections are held—Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Maine, and Massachusetts. The constitution of the State of Maryland provides that, upon conviction for the offence of giving or receiving bribes or influencing any man to give an illegal vote, not only the man giving the bribe, but the man giving the illegal vote shall forever after be disqualified from voting and from holding any office of trust, honor, or profit under the State government. Every State in the Union has severe penal laws, providing for the punishment of all who in any way interfere to prevent free elections.

With us, Mr. President, sovereignty resides in the people, and the people by the exercise of free suffrage declare their will and appoint their agencies to carry on the government. He who attempts to interfere with this most inestimable right, whether he be President, major general, or citizen, is an enemy to the Republic and deserves the harshest punishment. In order to have free elections, there must be free speech and a free press; the sovereign people must have an opportunity of forming an enlightened public opinion upon the questions at issue, which can only be done after full and free discussion. Free speech and a free press in a government like ours are the soul of republican institutions; free suffrage is the very heart-strings of civil liberty. To be free, the elections must be conducted in accordance with laws so framed as to prevent fraud, force, intimidation, corruption, and venality, superintended by election judges and officers independent of the executive or any other power of the Government; the military must not interfere, but be kept in strict subordination to the law, which should be so framed as to prevent absolutely such interference. The only duty of the Executive is to see that the law is faithfully executed. The Executive must not use the power intrusted to him to prevent free elections.

It is certainly a subversion of the very foundation of the Government for the Executive to use the force and the power that the Government has placed in his hands for defensive purposes to overthrow the free suffrages of the people and to appoint those to power who will be his truckling menials, his subservient agents to carry out his will, to aid him it may be to overthrow the liberties of the people whom they should represent, betray the Constitution that they should preserve and protect, destroy everything that makes the Government desirable and worthy of the support of an honest and free people. Yet, sir, such things have been done, and I regret to say that there are those in the Senate chamber who not only do not denounce, but who approve these usurpations, these plain, palpable violations of the Constitution of their country.

Mr. President, let us for a moment see what are the powers of the President of the United States. From whence does he derive this power to regulate elections and to appoint representatives of the people? for when stripped of its verbiage that is really what has been done in many parts of the States of Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, and Delaware. Where, I ask, does the Executive of the United States derive such power? He certainly does not derive it from the Constitution.

He is commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and under that clause I suppose those who oppose the bill claim that the President can rightfully exercise the power that he has exercised in overthrowing the freedom of elections in Maryland and other States. They claim it under the war power, which I will notice in another part of my remarks. The President is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." What laws are they that the President shall see faithfully executed? The Constitution declares that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

These are the laws that the President is to see faithfully executed. Whenever he goes beyond that he is a usurper. The President, under the Constitution, can exercise no implied power. All the implied powers that can be exercised under our Government must be exercised by another and a different body of magistracy, to wit, the legislative; and that is the express language of the Constitution.

In the States to which I have alluded, the President, or those acting under his orders, have prescribed the qualifications of voters and the qualifications of candidates for office, and that, too, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. This is a grave charge, but it is one that I will make good by testimony that none can doubt. Let us see who it is that has the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters. I suppose that no Senator will deny that as to all State offices the States have the power to prescribe the qualifications of the officer as well as of the voter. That power not having been delegated by the Constitution to the general Government, the States necessarily retain it. But there is an express provision of the Constitution. The tenth amendment, which declares "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people," and the Constitution very clearly indicate who are qualified voters for members of Congress. The second section of the first article of the Constitution declares who shall be qualified electors for members of Congress. It fixes the qualification as the one ordained by the State government for the members of the most numerous branch of their legislature. That is the fundamental law of the land; but in violation of that provision of the Constitution the military have seen fit, by military orders, to fix the qualifications of voters in the States. They have gone further, and fixed the qualifications for office. Not only the military have done this, but the President of the United States himself has done it. I am not going to waste all my time upon those who do the chief magistrate's bidding, but it is my purpose to-day to expose his atrocious violations of the Constitution. I trust that I shall speak of the President in a manner that is courteous, but I certainly shall do it in very plain language. The charges that I have to make I trust will not be misunderstood by anyone. I will not deal in innuendo, insinuation, or hint, but I will make the charge directly, and I have the proof to sustain it.

The Committee on Military Affairs, who made a very elaborate report, which I have before me, and which I shall presently review, justify the military in all they have done in controlling elections. The sole object of the committee in their report seems to be the justification and vindication of the military authorities for their atrocious assault on the rights of the States and the liberties of the people and their wicked and illegal interference in elections; and they assault every person who says or does anything tending to prove that the military have usurped powers that belong to the civil officers of the States and to the people. The committee justify the President and the military authorities for this interference in elections upon the ground that it was right and proper that the military arm should have been so used to protect the voters, "the loyal voters," as they are called in the report. The Constitution prescribes the duty of the chief magistrate on this subject in article four:

The President of the United States has no authority or power to send his military into one of the adhering States for the purpose of preventing domestic violence at the polls unless he has been invited to do so by the State authorities.

But for this provision of the Constitution a corrupt, venal, or ambitious President could by means of the military force, under some imaginary plea of domestic violence, invade any State in this Union on the eve of an election, and dictate the persons who should be returned as members of the other House of Congress, who should be returned as members of the legislature, who should be returned as governors of the States. In a word, if you allow him to use the army in this way without the invitation of the State authorities, a wicked and corrupt man would have it in his power to prostrate every State government in the Union, and to elect officers who would do his bidding, and thus overthrow the liberties of the people, and establish a consolidated despotism of which he would be the master.

The speaker referred in particular to military interference in the gubernatorial election in Kentucky, where Charles A. Wickliffe was the Democratic candidate.

The committee say that Mr. Wickliffe and the gentlemen who invited him to become a candidate desired rebels to vote.

The committee say that they invited those whose hands were red with the blood of Unionists, and who were loaded with the spoils of the plundered friends of the Union, to come to the polls. The committee were drawing upon their fancy for their facts in making such a statement, and a most distempered fancy it must have been. They could not have been deluded by the words "Southern rights," because this address states distinctly that the Southern rights men were not secessionists, and were not implicated in the rebellion.

The organization that put Mr. Wickliffe forward as a candidate was the Democratic party under its old name and under its old flag.

In this report the committee impugn the loyalty of Mr. Wickliffe; and upon what ground? Mr. Wickliffe was one of the first and stanchest Union men in the State of Kentucky. In the other end of this Capitol he voted men and money to carry on the war; and he never failed to do so until the last session, when he voted against an appropriation bill because the House would not insert a clause in it that the money should not be used for the purpose of freeing negroes and reducing States to provinces. It is well known that Mr. Wickliffe was a strong and warm friend of the war up to that time, until he thought the radical policy of the President was such as would destroy every hope of the restoration of the Union.

Well, sir, that sterling old patriot became the candidate of a party that were prevented from exercising the right of suffrage in Kentucky; and in order to justify that outrage and the striking of his name from the polls by the ruthless hand of the military, this committee say he is disloyal. I have no doubt if an angel of the Lord had appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and told them there had been military interference in the elections in Maryland and Kentucky, that it was seen and known by all who were present at the polls, the writer of the report of the committee would have asserted that the angel was disloyal. Every man—I do not care how elevated his position or upright his standing in society, or how devoted he may have been in the past or the present to the Union—who asserts that there was interference in the elections, the committee say is disloyal, or they impute some unworthy motive to him.

General Burnside, on the 31st of July, issued an order placing Kentucky under martial law, declaring that it was to prevent the rebel troops interfering in the election. There was no necessity for that order. At the time it was issued there were not in Kentucky more than about a thousand rebel soldiers, and they were cavalry in one portion of the State in rapid retreat; and on the day of election there were no Confederate soldiers in the State.

I will not now discuss the question as to whether General Burnside had the power to declare martial law. It is well known to the Senate that I hold there is no power in the Government, in the President, or any of his commanders, to declare martial law; but if it did exist it should be confined to besieged cities and localities occupied by the army. But certainly there is no power to declare martial law in the adhering States, when they are not occupied by the forces of the enemy.

General Burnside plainly and palpably violated the Constitution of his country when he issued that order interfering with elections. Let me ask, did Kentucky invite General Burnside to bring his forces there to protect the election? No, sir. The legislature did not do it; the governor, in the language of the day a loyal man, never invited him to do it.

What did General Burnside do? What were the orders issued by his subordinates? Here is an extract from one of them:

"Judges and clerks so appointed are hereby directed not to place the name of any person on the poll books to be voted for at said election who is not a Union man, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war."

There is appended to that order an oath which varies from the oath prescribed by the law of Kentucky. The constitution and laws of Kentucky do not require that a man shall be in favor of furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war to qualify him to hold office.

In many of the counties the name of the whole Democratic ticket was stricken from the poll book by the military authorities. In many voting places and in entire counties of Kentucky no man was allowed to vote for that ticket.

In many places the candidates were arrested. In the first congressional district Judge Trimble, the candidate for Congress, as loyal a man and as true to the Constitution and Union of his fathers as lives in the Union, was arrested by military authority. He was brought to the city of Henderson, a town just without his district, and there he was kept in military confinement near a month, until after the election was over. They told him that, if he would decline being a candidate for Congress, they would release him. He would not so degrade his manhood as to decline the canvass at the bidding of military tyrants and usurpers, and he was kept in prison. They found that he would be elected by a large majority notwithstanding his imprisonment, and then they sent the military over his district and had his name stricken from the polls in almost every voting precinct in the district. The gentleman who beat him got some four thousand votes in a district that polls about twenty thousand.

Mr. Anderson, who now occupies the seat in Congress from the first district in Kentucky, frankly acknowledges that he was elected by the bayonets.

Such were the terrorism and interference by the military that Mr. Wickliffe, the Democratic candidate for governor, in some six or seven of the strongest Democratic counties in the State, did not get a single vote, and in many other strong Democratic counties he received very few votes.

In the case of the Maryland election the speaker afforded proof that the President was directly responsible for military interference at the polls.

The Athenians were so watchful and so jealous of the right of free suffrage that a stranger who interfered in the assemblies of the people was regarded as a traitor, and was punished by their laws with death. Had President Lincoln and General Schenck lived in the time of the free commonwealth of Athens, and interfered with the assemblies of the people as they did with the right of free suffrage in Maryland, they would have been executed as traitors and felons, and would have justly deserved their fate.

The doctrine of those gentlemen who desire to clothe the Executive with this supreme power, with this absolute power, with this more than dictatorial power, places this great Republic in that humiliating attitude. I do not think that a citizen in a country governed by law was ever driven to the necessity of appealing to one man for protection. Sir, the citizen who for the time being fills the chief executive office is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed: that is his sworn duty. There is no liberty save in the supremacy of the law. In all free governments the citizen appeals to the law for protection.

Mr. President, all usurpers and all tyrants that have gone before us, those who have overthrown the liberties of every people who have lost their liberties, claim their powers under this plea of necessity. Cæsar, when he led his army from Gaul, crossed the Rubicon, and overthrew the liberties of his country, did it upon the plea of necessity, and tyrants the world over have done the same thing. The President seems to me to follow in the footsteps of Cæsar, Pompey, and Cromwell. The Chief Magistrate, I regret to say, seems to copy all the faults, while he has exhibited none of the virtues of those distinguished men.

Speaking of Cæsar Montesquieu says:

"He raised troubles in the city by his emissaries; he made himself master of all elections; and consuls, prætors, and tribunes purchased their promotions at their own price."

"He made himself master of all elections." That is what is being done here.

Mr. President, from the authorities I have read it seems that we are following in the footsteps of nations whose liberties have been overthrown and trampled down beneath the iron heel of military despotism.

Allow me to tell you, Senators, that one reason why the people have submitted so quietly, so uncomplainingly, to the many usurpations of the Executive is that they hoped in a short time to have the privilege of relieving themselves of the President by means of free suffrage; but if you allow the military to prevent free elections you not only stab the Republic in its very vitals, but you will by that means cause many persons who think that these usurpations of power ought to be resisted only at the ballot box to look about for other means to redress their grievances. If you do not wish blood to flow in this land, if you wish to preserve our institutions, allow the people the privilege of turning out every four years their President if they desire to do so.

Sir, the President and his satraps had better beware. A brave people will not stand these things always. A day of reckoning will come, and an awful day it will be to those guilty men who have overthrown and trodden under foot the Constitution and laws of their country, and unlawfully deprived the people of their dearest rights.

It is pleasant when we see that a gleam of light has broken in upon persons from whom we expected little good. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech of the most distinguished radical in America—a man of learning, a man of eloquence, indeed of rare elocution. I had thought that his whole soul was fully absorbed in this negro question, and that he could not talk without bringing it in. I mean Wendell Phillips. But while I think him a fanatic of the deepest dye, he differs from others of his party; he sometimes has lucid intervals. Allow me to read an extract from a speech of that eloquent man on this very point:

"But let me remind you of another tendency of the time. You know, for instance, that the writ of habeas corpus, by which government is bound to render a reason to the judiciary before it lays its hands upon a citizen, has been called the high-water mark of English liberty. The present Napoleon, in his treatise on the English Constitution, calls it the germ of English institutions. Lieber says that that, with free meetings like this, and a free press, are the three elements which distinguish liberty from despotism, and all that Saxon blood has gained in the battles and toils of two hundred years are these three things. Now, to-day, every one of these—habeas corpus, the right of free meeting, and free press—is annihilated in every square mile of the Republic. We live to-day, every one of us, under martial law or mob law. The Secretary of State puts into his bastile, with a warrant as irresponsible as that of Louis, any man whom he pleases; and you know that neither press nor lips may venture to arraign the government without being silenced.

"We are tending with rapid strides—you say, inevitable; I don't deny it, necessarily; I don't question it; we are tending to that strong government which frightened Jefferson; toward that unlimited debt, that endless army. We have already those alien and sedition laws which, in 1798, wrecked the Federal party and summoned the Democratic into existence. For the first time on the continent we have passports, which even Louis Bonaparte pronounced useless and odious. For the first time in our history, government spies frequent our great cities."

That, sir, is a very graphic and truly eloquent picture of the times in which we are, and I hope the country will take warning. We seem to have yielded everything to the military power, and I regret to say with a tameness and submission which, in my judgment, are unbecoming members of an American Congress.

A military republic we have, and we have a republic but in name—the animating principle, the security of the citizen in life, liberty, and property is gone.

There never was a time, it does not exist now, and has not existed since this unfortunate civil war commenced, in which it was necessary for the President to overthrow the Constitution and elevate the military above the civil power. There is power enough in the Constitution to furnish the President every dollar and every man needed for this war. Congress can give him the sword and the purse. What more can you confer? Nothing. Where, then, the necessity and the excuse for these wanton violations of the Constitution, this reckless overthrow of the liberties of the people, this setting at naught the laws and the constitutions of the States, this regulating of elections by the sword? None. None. The genius of our Government is founded upon the principle that the military shall be kept in strict subordination to the civil power. But the friends of the President claim it as a matter of necessity to save the life of the nation, when they must see that the President is trampling under his feet the Constitution, and crushing out the liberties of the people, and destroying every vital principle that gives value to free government.

But, sir, we have had other great chieftains before. There was a man who lived in this Republic that I suppose was thought by all wise and good men to be almost as great as Abraham Lincoln is thought to be by his cringing, truckling, and obsequious followers; that man was George Washington. He led our armies through a seven years' war in most trying times, when the organization of the civil authority was very defective; when there was great difficulty in procuring men for the army and money to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, many of the States failing to furnish their quotas of men and money. Did Washington, during that long and arduous struggle, ever think it necessary to subordinate the civil to the military authority? No, sir; no. In 1783, when he resigned his commission at Annapolis, Thomas Mifflin, President of the Continental Congress, addressed him as follows:

"You have conducted the great military contest with wisdom and fortitude, invariably regarding the rights of the civil power through all disasters and dangers."

This I regard as the highest and most deserved compliment that was ever bestowed upon mortal man.

Sir, I would that this vacillating, dissembling, weak, and I fear wicked and corrupt man in the White House had been infused with the wisdom, virtue, and patriotism that animated the soul and prompted the actions of the great Washington in our revolutionary struggle. Washington and his compatriots were engaged in a struggle for civil liberty; the sword was used only to resist the encroachment of tyrants, and was subordinated to the civil power. The resistance was successful. They then laid broad, deep, and strong the foundation of civil and religious liberty. They proclaimed the Constitution as the fundamental law, and threw it as a strong and impenetrable shield around the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. The Executive is now using the sword which should only be directed against the armed enemies of the Republic for the sacrilegious purpose of suppressing free speech, free press, and free suffrage, and the overthrow of the Constitution, the rights of the States, and the liberties of the people of the adhering States.

On March 23 Jacob M. Howard [Mich.] spoke against the bill.

This measure is brought forward at an unpropitious time, at a time when the country is engaged in a struggle against an immense armed rebellion which calls for the exertion of all the faculties, all the power of the Government, all its means, and for the exercise of every patriotic quality which belongs to American freemen. In the strictest sense of the law of nations it is a civil war, it has been so adjudged to be by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The two governments being, in respect to each other, not foreign and independent, but their citizens being citizens of the same common government, and in law subject to the same authority, there cannot be drawn between them that exact line of distinction which exists between the subjects of two belligerent foreign governments at war with one another; yet there is, because there must be somewhere, a test, recognized by the law of war, which is to determine the treatment that one party may exercise toward the subjects of the other, and by which one party may be known from the other. It is that line of demarcation which divides the loyal from the disloyal. It is the test and touchstone by which the heart of every citizen is to be tried and by which it is to be determined whether he is in favor of the old Government or whether he is opposed to it. All those who in their hearts are friendly to the old Government, who are willing to support and uphold it, are loyal—they have the rights of loyal belligerents; while all those who in their hearts are opposed to the old Government, or even indifferent to its preservation, who are willing to destroy and overthrow it, or to see it destroyed or overthrown, and especially those who directly or indirectly give actual aid and comfort to the rebellion, are disloyal, and are to be treated as enemies. I know of no other rule by which a distinction can be established between the two classes, those who are loyal and those who are disloyal.

In the midst of this clash of arms, while the whole hemisphere is lighted up by the lurid flames of war, extending from the Atlantic Ocean far west to the Rocky Mountains, while every loyal man is filled with anxiety for the final result of the contest, while along this frontier, marked by a line of bristling bayonets for more than fifteen hundred miles, the war is waging with fury, and the line itself constantly fluctuating, the Senator from Kentucky brings forward a bill prohibiting the military authorities, in any case, in any manner, to interfere with what he calls the freedom of election in the States, severely punishing military men for fighting battles, in certain cases, as well as for preventing the enemy himself from participating in State elections!

That honorable Senator will admit that for a measure so novel in its provisions, so extraordinary in the results which it aims to accomplish, there should be evidence of some great and intolerable evil which may be cured by such a measure. It is not sufficient that there may be a few trifling instances of wrong and misuse of military power; the evil should be so enormous as to address itself to the conscience of every member of the Senate, and the evidence of it so clear and overwhelming as to leave no doubt or hesitation in the mind. I shall show, I think, before I conclude my remarks, that there is no such evil; and that, if there be any evil of even considerable magnitude, the evidence of its existence has not been presented to us by the honorable Senator from Kentucky or any other member in such form as to deserve our serious attention.

And, sir, in limine, I have to say, in respect to this bill, that it contains a provision which, in my judgment, is utterly unsupported by any clause of the Constitution of the United States, and is as clearly obnoxious to the objection of unconstitutionality as any bill which has ever been presented to the Senate.

I beg to know from what provision of the Constitution it is that the Senator from Kentucky derives the power of employing the courts or other authorities of the United States to punish persons who may violate a State law regulating elections or defining the qualifications of State voters? Whence does he derive the power to punish by Federal sentences in Federal courts violations of a law which it is competent for a State and a State only to enact?

Will the Senator tell me in reply that Congress have a right to inflict this punishment upon a man because he is in the military or naval service of the United States? Such a proposition is not capable of argument. Men are placed in the military service of the United States for the purpose of acting in that capacity; and the power of Congress in such cases only goes to the extent of controlling and regulating their conduct according to the code of war; and there it stops. It cannot be pretended that because a man is a soldier in the army and goes home and commits a murder in the State to which he belongs Congress therefore may declare by a law that he shall be tried and punished for the murder in a Federal court. The crime in such a case is committed against the peace and dignity of the State, not against the peace and dignity of the United States; and, although if committed by him while in actual service and in the ranks, he might be punished by court-martial, yet the offence would be against the code of war and not the laws of the State.

Let us, then, sir, hear something less, if the Senator pleases, of these continued, bitter denunciations against the majority of this body for violations of the Constitution. For one, sir, I say to that Senator, I do not acknowledge him as a safe teacher. "Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis." Give us no such aid, no such defenders.

Mr. President, we are told by the Senator from Kentucky that the Government of the United States have no power to restrain persons who are rebels, or who are suspected to be rebels, from voting in the States. I do not agree with the Senator as to the power of the Government to prevent disloyal men voting at a State poll. In the present state of things every man who is not for us is against us. Every man, as I said before, who is not friendly to the Government of the United States in his heart is opposed to it. Every man who is not willing to use reasonable and ordinary means, military means, for defending and upholding it at such a moment as this, is an enemy of the United States, and deserves to be treated as an enemy.

Sir, I stand by the doctrine laid down in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. I hold that these persons whose hearts are against their Government, who are willing that the Government should be destroyed—and I go as far as to declare that those who are unwilling in such a crisis as this to come to the support of the Government and render it their aid, and even those who affect to occupy a position of mere indifference toward it, are also within the category of enemies of their country—ought not, in justice, to be suffered to go to the polls. There must be a distinction somewhere, in this war, between enemies and friends. A friend is the man whose heart is attached to the Government and who is willing, according to his means, to do something to uphold it. He is not the only enemy who takes up arms or furnishes supplies to those in arms, but who looks upon this struggle with indifference, whose heart has no pulsation in favor of the cause, but who is ready whenever an occasion presents itself to go over and join the rebels, or to welcome them when they come as invaders into our midst.

The Senator tells us that the military authorities have no right whatever to interfere in a State election; and if I understood him rightly he went so far as to declare that every person who is not prohibited by the laws of the State itself from voting has a right to vote, and that the United States have no authority to intervene for the purpose of preventing it, although he may be a rebel, stained from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet with the blood of loyal men. I am about to quote an authority which will perhaps have some weight with that Senator. I believe the first example of such interference in a State election was set by General McClellan while commander of the army of the Potomac. In response to a letter of request, addressed to him by Governor Hicks of Maryland, dated October 26, 1861, he issued the following order, dated October 29, 1861, to General N. P. Banks:

GENERAL: There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunion citizens on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next.

In order to prevent this the major-general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights.

He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement until after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently, and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election. For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the habeas corpus.

If this power exists in the Government of the United States in any of its departments, in time of war, then no State can interfere with its exercise, but the citizens of the State must submit it as to the exercise of any other Federal power, because it acts upon those citizens as individuals. In short, if the Government have this tutelary authority, if they have the right to treat rebels or rebel sympathizers, or those who aid and abet the rebellion, as enemies, as they undoubtedly have, then they may use it through the military arm or any other instrumentality to which they see fit to resort. They may thus prevent those enemies from exercising any of the rights of citizens in the State. For this we have at least the sanction of General McClellan—certainly, with a certain portion of the members of this body, a high authority; and I am very happy to be able for once to concur fully in the opinions of the general. The power is thus, as we see, sanctioned by that distinguished military leader, the heir-apparent of the Democratic party to the next Presidency, and the promising help and support, I suppose, of the cause of the Union as they would restore it. At all events, it is sufficient for my purpose that I have his complete sanction of the principle that it is the right of the military arm to interfere in State elections so far as to prevent traitors from voting, although they may happen to possess the formal qualifications of electors of the State. I think he was entirely right, and I am free to give him that praise.

If we have that power, as General McClellan agrees we have, then it belongs to us exclusively, and the States have nothing to do but to permit its exercise. It is a power peculiarly pertaining to the United States, and as much to be respected and obeyed as the judicial power of the Government. The two jurisdictions are here as separate and distinct as in any other case. The States have just as much right to trespass on any other constitutional power belonging to the Government as upon this.

Sir, in my judgment, the case comes clearly and distinctly within the principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Booth, in which the decision of the court was delivered by the present chief justice [Roger B. Taney]. (See 21 Howard's Reports, p. 524.)

And I say here that, whenever a military officer has issued an order for the purpose of keeping traitors away from the polls, and the order is regular in form, no State has in a time of rebellion or civil war any right to dispute or obstruct its operation; and whenever the governor of a State, a judge of election, or other State magistrate, undertakes to resist such an order, he brings himself within the principle laid down by the Supreme Court, asserting that such interference may be resisted even by violence. It is nothing more nor less than this, that the authority of the United States is supreme; and it rests with the Senator from Kentucky, and those who entertain his views, to establish the principle that the Government of the United States is not supreme in the treatment of its enemies. The Senator has not argued that question. He has assumed that it is not. It is with him a mere petitio principii, the assumption of the truth of a proposition that remains to be proved. Let him by fair and candid argument, by reference to the books of authority, show, if he can, that the Government of the United States in the prosecution of a war is not supreme and has no right to define and declare who are enemies of the United States and who are friends. He will find it a vain task; and I indulge the fancy that he will not be swift to undertake it.

Sir, the rebels on this subject have been our instructors.

They have found no constitutional difficulty in treating persons within their limits attached to the Government of the United States, and acknowledging their allegiance to it as enemies. Without scruple or hesitation they proceeded at an early day to enact a statute, now in force among them, by which every Union man born in a State still adhering to the Union is proscribed and expelled from their territorial limits.[1]

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky has made another novel discovery in the field of constitutional law, to which I must be indulged in paying some slight attention. He tells the Senate in his speech on this bill that the Government of the United States has no right whatever to send troops into any State unless it be at the request of the legislature while in session, or of the Executive when the legislature cannot be convened; and he is extremely earnest and confident on this point. He flatters himself that he has at length discovered the great touchstone by which this whole war is proved to be unconstitutional, and "coercion" a tyranny and an outrage. This is the first time in my professional life that I ever heard it asserted by a gentleman professing to be a judge of the principles of the Constitution, and a good lawyer, that the right of the Government of the United States to employ military force to put down an insurrection was derived from and is solely dependent upon that clause of the Constitution to which he refers. The clause declares that the Government of the United States shall protect each State against domestic violence when called upon by the State. The very language itself shows that the violence against which the State is to be protected is violence not against the authority of the United States, but against the authority of the State, and of the State only.

Domestic violence in a State is violence against the authority of the State, and that violence may be in perfect consistency with the loyalty of the persons who commit it to the Government of the United States.

It is merely local violence against the regular government of the State, and does not embrace an insurrection or rebellion against the Federal Government. And such is the meaning given to the clause in "The Federalist," if the Senator will see fit to consult it. It may be entirely consistent with the authority of the United States, like the Dorr rebellion, in Rhode Island, or the more ancient insurrection of Shay, in Massachusetts. The present war is a rebellion against the authority of the United States, not that of any one particular State, and is not therefore a case of mere domestic violence as mentioned in the clause on which the Senator relies.

This, however, is the Senator's logic: the States in rebellion are agitated by domestic violence; in such cases the Government of the United States cannot interpose, except upon the request of the legislature of the State when in session, or of the Executive when the legislature cannot be convened; and because the legislature and Executive of all the seceded States have omitted to apply to the Government of the United States for aid to put down this violence; ergo, the Government of the United States has no right to march its troops into those States; ergo, the whole war is unconstitutional, and we who are engaged in prosecuting this war within the limits of these seceded States are guilty of a perpetual violation of our oaths and of the Constitution of our country. Such is the Senator's logic.

The Senator seemed to forget that, aside from this particular clause, there is given to Congress in express terms power to suppress rebellion and insurrection against the Federal Government itself. We are now acting under this broader and general power. We are acting under a power by no means necessary to have been incorporated in the Constitution—the power to suppress rebellion and insurrection—because from the very nature of Government itself, from the very necessity of its being, the Federal Government, like every other government, must be held to have the right of self-defence, the right to put down resistance to its authority, the right to enforce its own laws, for that cannot be called a government which has no power to carry its own enactments into execution. It is of the very essence of all governments to command, and if a government may command, it is the duty of those who are commanded to obey; so that even without the clause expressly giving to Congress the power to put down an insurrection they would have plenary power so to do.

But the framers of the instrument saw fit to grant the power in express terms, as if in anticipation of this "State rights" objection. (See "The Federalist," 43.)

My conscience will not be troubled by the fanciful constitutional objection that the Government of the United States have no right to "subjugate a State." We have, sir, the same right to subjugate a State in insurrection as to subjugate a foreign country with which we are at war; and the Senator from Kentucky will find it impossible, I apprehend, to draw anything like a sensible distinction between the two cases.

The report of the committee alleges that at the date of a certain letter, which is included in the pamphlet, addressed to Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, and dated June 13, 1863, the business of recruiting blacks was in active progress. It is against that policy that the letter is particularly denunciatory. The writers of the letter used the following language:

"We hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception, and a dissolution of the Union the greatest of calamities.

"We would use all just and constitutional means adapted to the suppression of the one and the restoration of the other."

Again they say:

"It is now obvious that the fixed purpose of the administration is to arm the negroes of the South to make war upon the whites, and we hold it to be the duty of the people of Kentucky to enter against such a policy a solemn and most emphatic protest."

What is the plain implication from this language addressed to Mr. Wickliffe, that the writers hold the rebellion unjustifiable "in its inception"? Is it not tantamount to a declaration that, although in its inception the rebellion was utterly unjustifiable, it had, nevertheless, become otherwise in consequence of the acts of the Administration, and particularly the act authorizing the recruiting of black troops?

And the Senator says that, at the very time this solemn protest was entered by these leading gentlemen of Kentucky, there was no such thing in Kentucky as the recruiting of black troops.

What, then, is the pith and point of the declaration that the rebellion had become justifiable, although unjustifiable in its inception? Not because recruiting of black troops was going on in Kentucky, but because it was going on somewhere else, and because these troops were to be used as aids in suppressing the rebellion. Sir, this is an audacious presumption on the part of Kentucky. No, sir, I will not say Kentucky; I do not mean the people of Kentucky; I mean the demagogues who assume to be the leaders of the people of Kentucky. What right have they to dictate to the United States what troops they shall raise, or where they shall raise them, or how employ them, so long as the people of Kentucky are not affected by the proceeding?

Mr. President, if there ever was a necessity for the vigorous interposition of military authority to guard the polls against the intrusion of rebels, if there was ever a case in the history of the United States in which the strong arm of military power was invoked by every interest of community, it was the case of Kentucky; and I undertake to say that, without this interference, Kentucky, in all human probability, would to-day have been regularly installed as a member of the rebel confederation. Nothing but the loyal hearts and strong arms of Northern men who hurried from their homes has prevented that State, with all its glorious memories, going over to the rebellion.

I do not stand here to pretend, and I will not assert, that there may not have been abuses in the execution of some of the orders. But you may say the same of the execution of any law. Every power, every law is liable to be abused; but this is no reason for denying or extinguishing the power itself, for repealing it or for repealing the law.

The leader of the Democratic party, Mr. Wickliffe, was plainly unfriendly to the Government of the United States. He was their candidate for governor. The letter inviting him to stand as such declares that the writers "hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception," plainly, as I have already remarked, intimating that it had become justifiable. The writers of the pamphlet observe: "Mr. Wickliffe, in accepting the nomination which had thus been tendered him, expressed his hearty concurrence in our view"; that is, his hearty concurrence in the statement that the rebellion had become no longer unjustifiable. I submit, sir, that a man who, at such a time, can so far forget what is due to his country as to intimate that this rebellion had become a justifiable one was not a fit person to be voted for at the polls. And I say boldly that I think the military authorities in Kentucky did exactly right when they instructed the judges of election not to permit Mr. Wickliffe's name to appear on the poll list as a candidate for governor, although, notwithstanding several orders of that kind, he received a very considerable vote in Kentucky.

But, sir, there is no allegation, even in the pamphlet itself, that any one single individual known to be a true and loyal man was hindered from voting at the election in Kentucky on the 3d of August, 1863. It is very true, as the writers of the pamphlet remark, that the aggregate vote at that election compared with the number of male persons over twenty-one years old in 1862 was small. But the smallness of the vote shows not so much that voters were excluded from the polls as that multitudes kept away because of their own disloyal proclivities, while thousands upon thousands had emigrated or gone into the rebel army or into the Union army.

The declarations of the authors of the pamphlet show a different kind of loyalty from mine. It is the loyalty of neutrality, which is no loyalty, and just as inconsistent with the duty which a State and its people owe to the Government of the United States as open rebellion.

Neutrality, sir, Kentucky neutrality, what is it in law, and what would it be if practically carried out there or elsewhere? If the agreement said to have been made by General McClellan with Buckner recognizing the neutrality of the State had been carried into execution practically Kentucky would have been as effectually out of this Union as is now the State of South Carolina. Neutrality, let me say to the Senator, is an attribute belonging exclusively to a sovereign power, an independent nation. You cannot predicate neutrality of any community that does not possess the right of sovereignty as an independent nation, for there are certain rights and duties pertaining to neutrality which can be exercised only by an independent nation, and with which any subordinate or dependent condition is totally incompatible.

Sir, let us contemplate for a moment the condition that Kentucky would have been in if she had carried out effectually her idea of neutrality. The Government of the United States would have been disabled from recruiting a single man within her limits, such recruiting being forbidden by the laws of war and nations within neutral territory. Again, the United States could not have marched a single platoon across the border of Kentucky, although the enemy had been in her midst. The Ohio and the Mississippi would have been sealed up against the navigation of the United States. Kentucky would have been flourishing in all the peace and comfort of neutrality, keeping the Union forces away upon the one side and possibly inviting the rebels upon the other, while at the same time she would have been at complete liberty to carry on trade and commerce in everything not contraband of war with both the belligerent parties.

In short, she would have been enjoying a harvest of profits in her trade with the rebels, and a like harvest in her trade with the Union armies, and at the same time feeling none of the inconveniences of the war. Such, sir, was manifestly the idea at the bottom of Kentucky neutrality.

Is it founded upon the Constitution? Will the gentleman say that under that instrument it is the right of any one of the States to set up to be neutral in a war, whether a civil or a foreign war? No, sir. It is as plainly prohibited as open rebellion, and the claim is as incompatible with fidelity to the Government as the claim of nullification or secession.

Sir, it is amazing that a gentleman who has so much to say about the violation of the Constitution of the United States, a gentleman who has not hesitated to say upon this floor that if justice had been done to Abraham Lincoln for his imputed unconstitutional interference in State elections he would have been hanged like those who were denounced as traitors by the laws of Greece for voting at elections where they had no right—it is amazing that such a Senator can stand up here and advocate in the same breath the right of a State to assume the condition of neutrality in a war. It is nothing more nor less than actual secession, because it implies an utter repudiation of the obligations of the State to the general Government. Sir, I thank Heaven that the President of the United States at an early day rebuked this pretension.

The speaker then turned to the Maryland election. Referring to the proclamation of Governor Bradford he said:

This proclamation was a direct invitation to the judges of election and the people of Maryland to disregard the order [of Gen. Schenck], and, if need be, to resort to violence in resisting it. It was a threat to produce an insurrection, and to drive out the United States troops by force. The report of the Military Committee holds that the governor had no right to issue it, or to instruct the judges in this manner. The Senator from Kentucky, in his emphatic reply to this part of the report, tells us that the Governor of Maryland had "a right to issue a proclamation concerning elections." Who denies it? The Senator was combating a proposition the committee had not made.

Undoubtedly, sir, the Governor of Maryland, like any other governor, has a right to issue a proclamation on any subject connected with his duties; but neither the Governor of Maryland nor any other governor has the right to say to the judges of elections, "Your duties are such and such, and you must do so and so." The law, not the governor's proclamation, regulates their duties. And whatever may be that law, whether in the shape of a State statute or the order of a military man for the protection of the polls, such as that of General Schenck, it is nevertheless law, and Governor Bradford had no more right to say to the judges that they were not to obey General Schenck's order than to tell them they were not to obey a statute of the United States. It did not lie in the mouth of the Governor of Maryland to dispense them from that obligation.

Sir, if the judges of election had been as hasty as the governor, if they had resorted to the power of the county or other force for the purpose of resisting the execution of this order, it is easy to see that before the sun of the 3d of November went down below the western horizon the soil of ancient Maryland would have been stained with fraternal blood, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, of her sons would have been weltering in their gore; for it would inevitably have led to a violent collision between the troops of the United States and the people of Maryland.

The Senator alleges that the judges were prevented from executing the laws. In many cases, he says, they were imprisoned. Let me say, with the utmost personal respect for that Senator, that I have discovered no case, from the beginning to the end of this vast amount of written testimony, which shows or conduces to show that the judges of election were prevented in any case from executing the laws. If there be any such case, I hope the honorable Senator will be able to lay it before the Senate. There are but two cases in which the judges of election were arrested; the one the case in Kentucky, where the judges of election openly and contemptuously refused to recognize the military authority and to execute the orders, and were therefore placed under arrest; the other in Maryland, where an investigation ordered by the President showed that the persons arrested were not judges, but citizens, who had abandoned their posts as officers.

As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, in order to justify Congress in passing this bill, the proof of existing evils should be plain, indubitable, and irresistible. The times especially require it. Were it a time of peace, I admit the military authorities of the United States would have no power to interfere with State elections; but it is not a time of peace, but of war; a time in which the feelings of every man in the nation are taking a fixed direction, either in favor of the Government or against it; a time when it is absolutely necessary for the preservation not only of the Federal Government, but of the State governments, that a line of demarcation should be drawn between the loyal and the disloyal, between men who are friendly and men who are unfriendly; and I insist that, in view of the evidence before us, there is no sufficient reason for the passage of this bill had we even the power to pass it.

that such a person is in all respects and at all times subject to the laws of the Federal Government relating to him as a public enemy, and subject to those laws in exclusion of any conflicting law of a State. For a State cannot legally be engaged in war; the whole of the war power pertains exclusively to the Federal Government.

Reverdy Johnson [Md.] replied to Senator Howard.

Who is to ascertain what men are public enemies of the United States? Shall a citizen of Maryland, for instance, decide that I am not entitled to vote at an election in my own State? There is but one subject upon which the Federal Government has any authority to interfere with elections. Over the times, the places, and the manner, the Constitution gives to the several States the exclusive authority with two exceptions, which have nothing in the world to do with the manner in which the franchise is to be exercised or with the parties who are to exercise it. Upon all other subjects, therefore, than of time and manner, the jurisdiction of the States is just as paramount and exclusive as it was before the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. President, we hold our rights under the Constitution consecrated by the blood of our ancestors. We have proved ourselves worthy to enjoy them by meeting the enemies of our country upon the field and the ocean, and we are doing it now. Oh, save us, save us in the name of freedom, from the rule of military despotism!

On June 28 the motion to reconsider the vote on the bill was defeated by a vote of 19 to 23.

The bill was debated at various times until June 22, when, through the persistent efforts of Senator Powell, it was finally brought to a vote. Several amendments, however, were first offered by the Senator himself; the most important of which was one providing that soldiers may be stationed at the polls if "it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." This and other amendments were adopted.

Samuel C. Pomeroy [Kan.] then moved to add to Senator Powell's amendment the words: "or to keep the peace at the polls."

Senator Powell, James A. McDougall [Cal.] and others objected to this amendment as destroying the effect of the bill. It expressed, they declared, the very pretext upon which the recent outrage against the free ballot had been committed. This amendment, however, was adopted by a vote of 16 to 15. The bill was then passed by a vote of 19 to 13.

James Harlan [Ia.] moved to reconsider the passage of the bill. The motion was entered.

On June 23 Senator Howard spoke in favor of reconsidering the measure.

This bill gives permission for the employment of the military forces of the United States at elections only where there shall be armed enemies of the Federal Government at the polls, or where it shall be necessary to employ a military force to keep the peace. It therefore leaves the implication perfectly irresistible that in all other cases it shall not be lawful for the military authorities to employ their forces, although there might be thronging around the polls rebels who had just left the field of battle, and whose hands were crimsoned with the blood of loyal men. This bill allows notorious rebels to come to the polls and cast their ballots without the slightest fear of interference on the part of the military authorities.

It is said, Mr. President, that it is the exclusive privilege of the States to protect their own polls. But this is true only in a time of peace. For in a time of war a State government is not competent to extend to a person who is a public enemy of the National Government, and against whom and against whose class or community the United States as a nation is waging war, any political right or privilege whatever; and I do assert

CHAPTER XIV

The Thirteenth Amendment

[CONSTITUTIONAL ABOLITION OF SLAVERY]

Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] Moves in the Senate a Constitutional Amendment Abolishing Slavery—Debate: in Favor, Sen. Trumbull, Henry Wilson [Mass.], Daniel Clark [N. H.], Timothy O. Howe [Wis.], Reverdy Johnson [Md.], John P. Hale [N. H.], Charles Sumner; Opposed, Garrett Davis [Ky.], Willard Saulsbury [Del.], James A. McDougall [Cal.]—Resolution Is Carried in the Senate, and Defeated in the House—It Is Passed at the Next Session.

ON March 28, 1864, Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] introduced in the Senate, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the following proposed amendment to the Constitution:

ARTICLE XIII

Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Abolition of Slavery

SENATE, MARCH 28-APRIL 8, 1864

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Without stopping to inquire into all the causes of our troubles, and of the distress, desolation, and death which have grown out of this atrocious rebellion, I suppose it will be generally admitted that they sprung from slavery. If a large political party in the North attribute these troubles to the impertinent interference of Northern philanthropists and fanatics with an institution in the Southern States with which they had no right to interfere, I reply, if there had been no such institution there could have been no such alleged impertinent interference; if there had been no slavery in the South, there could have been no Abolitionists in the North to interfere with it. If, upon the other hand, it be said that this rebellion grows out of the attempt on the part of those in the interest of slavery to govern this country so as to perpetuate and increase the slaveholding power, and failing in this that they have endeavored to overthrow the Government and set up an empire of their own, founded upon slavery as its chief corner-stone, I reply, if there had been no slavery there could have been no such foundation on which to build. If the freedom of speech and of the press, so dear to freemen everywhere, and especially cherished in this time of war by a large party in the North who are now opposed to interfering with slavery, has been denied us all our lives in one-half the States of the Union, it was by reason of slavery. If these halls have resounded from our earliest recollections with the strifes and contests of sections, ending sometimes in blood, it was slavery which almost always occasioned them.

Senator Trumbull here reviewed the acts of the President and Congress relating to negroes, previously to the Emancipation Proclamation.

But, sir, had these laws, all of them, been efficiently executed they would not wholly have extirpated slavery. They were aimed only at the slaves of rebels. Congress never undertook to free the slaves of loyal men; no act has ever passed for that purpose.

At a later period, the President by proclamation undertook to free the slaves in certain localities. Notice of this proclamation was given in September, 1862, and it was to become effective in January, 1863. Unlike the acts of Congress, which undertook to free the slaves of rebels only, and of such as came under our control, the President's proclamation excepted from its provisions the regions of country subject to our authority, and declared free the slaves only who were in regions of country from which the authority of the United States was expelled, enjoining upon the persons proposed to be made free to abstain from all violence unless in necessary self-defence, and recommending them in all cases, when allowed, to labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

The force and effect of this proclamation are understood very differently by its advocates and opponents. The former insist that it is and was within the constitutional power of the President, as commander-in-chief, to issue such a proclamation; that it is the noblest act of his life or the age; and that by virtue of its provisions all slaves within the localities designated become ipso facto free; while others declare that it was issued without competent authority, and has not and cannot effect the emancipation of a single slave. These latter insist that the most the President could do, as commander of the armies of the United States, would be, in the absence of legislation, to seize and free the slaves which came within the control of the army; that the power exercised by a commander-in-chief, as such, must be a power exercised in fact, and that beyond his lines where his armies cannot go his orders are mere brutum fulmen,[1] and can work neither a forfeiture of property nor freedom of slaves; that the power of Frémont and Hunter, commanders-in-chief for a certain time in their departments, who assumed to free the slaves within their respective commands, was just as effective within the boundaries of their commands as that of the commander-in-chief of all the departments, who as commander could not draw to himself any of his presidential powers; and that neither had or could have any force except within the lines and where the army actually had the power to execute the order; that to that extent the previous acts of Congress would free the slaves of rebels, and if the President's proclamation had any effect it would be only to free the slaves of loyal men, for which the laws of the land did not provide.

I will not undertake to say which of these opinions is correct, nor is it necessary for my purposes to decide. It is enough for me to show that any and all these laws and proclamations, giving to each the largest effect claimed by its friends, are ineffectual to the destruction of slavery. The laws of Congress if faithfully executed would leave remaining the slaves belonging to loyal masters, which, considering how many are held by children and females not engaged in the rebellion, would be no inconsiderable number, and the President's proclamation excepts from its provisions all of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and a good portion of Louisiana and Virginia—almost half the slave States.

If then we are to get rid of the institution, we must have some more efficient way of doing it than by the proclamations that have been issued or the acts of Congress which have been passed.

Some, however, say that we may pass an act of Congress to abolish slavery altogether, and petitions are sent to Congress asking it to pass such a law. I am as anxious to get rid of slavery as any person; but has Congress authority to pass a law abolishing slavery everywhere, freeing the slaves of the loyal, the slaves of the friends of the Government as well as the slaves of the disloyal and of the enemies of the Government? Why, sir, it has been an admitted axiom from the foundation of this Government, among all parties, that Congress had no authority to interfere with slavery in the States where it existed. But it is said this was in a time of peace, and we are now at war, and Congress has authority to carry on war, and in carrying on war we may free the slaves. Why so? Because it is necessary; for no other reason. If we can do it by act of Congress it must be because it is a necessity to the prosecution of the war. We have authority to put down the enemies of the country; we have the right to slay them in battle; we have authority to confiscate their property; but, mark you, does that give any authority to slay the friends of the country, to confiscate the property of the friends of the country, or to free the slaves of the friends of the country?

But it said that freeing slaves would aid us in raising troops; that slaves are unwilling to volunteer and enter the public service unless other slaves are made free, and that we could raise troops better, sooner, and have a more efficient army if slavery were declared abolished. Suppose that were so, is it a necessity? Can we not raise an army without doing this? Has not the Congress of the United States unlimited authority to provide for the raising of armies by draft, by force to put any and every man capable of bearing arms into its service? Have we not already passed a law compelling men to enter the service of the Government in its defence and for the putting down this rebellion? Then there is no necessity to free the slaves in order to raise an army.

But it is a convenience, perhaps some will say. Sir, it is not because a measure would be convenient that Congress has authority to adopt it. The measure must be appropriate and needful to carry into effect some granted power, or we have no authority to adopt it. I can imagine a thousand things that would aid us to raise troops, which no one would contend Congress had authority to do. We now find that it is costing us a large sum of money to carry on this war. There are apprehensions in some quarters that the finances of the country will not be sufficient to prosecute it to the end. A measure that would enable us to carry on the war cheaper would certainly be one in aid of this war power. In consequence of the prosperity which prevails in the country, wages at this time are very high. Men are unwilling to enlist without large bounties and large pay, because they get high wages at home. Suppose we introduce a bill that no man shall be paid in any manufacturing establishment, at any mechanic art, or for his daily labor, more than ten cents a day, and we visit with penalties and punishment any man who shall give to his employee more than that sum; do you not think that would hold out an additional inducement to volunteer? But who would contend that Congress had any such authority? Manifestly it has not. Nor can I find the constitutional authority to abolish slavery everywhere by act of Congress as a necessity to prosecuting the war.

Then, sir, in my judgment, the only effectual way of ridding the country of slavery, and so that it cannot be resuscitated, is by an amendment of the Constitution forever prohibiting it within the jurisdiction of the United States. This amendment adopted, not only does slavery cease, but it can never be reëstablished by State authority, or in any other way than by again amending the Constitution. Whereas, if slavery should now be abolished by act of Congress or proclamation of the President, assuming that either has the power to do it, there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent any State from reëstablishing it. This change of the Constitution will also relieve us of all difficulty in the restoration to the Union of the rebel States when our brave soldiers shall have reduced them to obedience to the laws.

Henry Wilson [Mass.] followed in a speech, entitled "The Death of Slavery Is the Life of the Nation."

I think it is reasonable to suppose that if this proposed amendment passes Congress it will within a year receive the ratification of the requisite number of States to make it a part of the Constitution. That accomplished, and we are forever freed of this troublesome question. We relieve Congress of sectional strifes, and, what is better than all, we restore to a whole race that freedom which is theirs by the gift of God, but which we for generations have wickedly denied them.

Slavery is the conspirator that conceived and organized this mighty conspiracy against the unity and existence of the Republic. Slavery is the traitor that madly plunged the nation into the fire and blood and darkness of civil war. Slavery is the criminal whose hands are dripping with the blood of our murdered sons. Yes, slavery is the conspirator, the traitor, the criminal that is reddening the sods of Christian America with the blood of fathers and husbands, sons and brothers, and bathing them with the bitter tears of mothers, wives, and sisters.

Sir, slavery—bold, proud, domineering, with hate in its heart, scorn in its eye, defiance in its mien—has pronounced against the existence of republican institutions in America, against the supremacy of the Government, the unity and life of the nation. Slavery, hating the cherished institutions that tend to secure the rights and enlarge the privileges of mankind; despising the toiling masses as mudsills and white slaves; defying the Government, its Constitution and its laws, has openly pronounced itself the mortal and unappeasable enemy of the Republic. Slavery stands to-day the only clearly pronounced foe our country has on the globe. Therefore, every word spoken, every line written, every act performed, that keeps the breath of life in slavery for a moment, is against the existence of democratic institutions, against the dignity of the toiling millions, against the liberty, the peace, the honor, the renown, and the life of the nation. In the lights of to-day that flash upon us from camp and battlefield, the loyal eye, heart, and brain of America sees and feels and realizes that the death of slavery is the life of the nation! The loyal voice of patriotism pronounces, in clear accents, that American slavery must die that the American Republic may live!

Sir, under the Constitution, framed to secure the blessings of liberty, slavery strode into the chambers of legislation, the halls of justice, the mansions of the Executive, and, with menaces in the one hand and bribes in the other, it awed the timid and seduced the weak. Marching on from conquest to conquest, crushing where it could not awe, seduce, or corrupt, slavery saw institutions of learning, benevolence, and religion, political organizations and public men, aye, and the people, too, bend before it and acknowledge its iron rule. Seizing on the needed acquisitions of Louisiana and of Florida to extend its boundaries, consolidate its power, and enlarge its sway, slavery crossed the Mississippi and there established its barbarous dominion against the too feeble resistance of a not yet conquered people. Controlling absolutely the policy of the South, swaying the policy of the nation, impressing itself upon the legislation, the sentiments, and opinions of the North, slavery moved on to assured dominion. Under its aggressive advances emancipation societies, organized by the men of the revolutionary era in the first bright ardor of secured liberty, one by one disappeared; presses and churches forgot to remember those in bonds as bound with them, and recreant sons disowned the sentiments, opinions, and principles of a glorious ancestry. And slavery, in the pride of power, proclaimed itself in the halls of Congress, through its apostles and champions, its Calhouns and McDuffies, "a positive good," "the only stable basis of republican institutions," "the corner-stone of the republican edifice."

But amid this general defection from the faith of the statesmen and heroes of the revolutionary age, a fearless and faithful few clung to the teachings of Washington and Franklin, Jefferson and Jay, and their illustrious compeers. Unawed by its power, unseduced by its blandishments, they opposed to the aggressions of slavery—aye, to slavery itself—a stern and unyielding resistance. They proclaimed emancipation to be the duty of the master and the right of the slave. To advance the cause of emancipation and to improve the condition of free people of color they avowed their readiness to use "all means sanctioned by law, humanity, and religion." Slavery marked and branded these heroic men as political and social outlaws; compelling them, in the words of John G. Whittier, "to hold property, liberty, and life itself at the mercy of lawless mobs." Slavery cast its malign influence over all the land, maddening the brain and firing the heart of a deluded people against the fearless few who opposed its aggressions and pitied its hapless victims. Passion—blind, unreasoning passion—ruled the hour. Cities were lighted by the sacked and burning dwellings of a proscribed and hated race. Churches, institutions of learning, and presses were often forcibly closed or destroyed at the bidding of slavery by the lawless violence of "gentlemen of property and standing."

Slaves were held in the District of Columbia, and slave pens and the slave trade polluted and dishonored the national capital under the color of laws for which the people of America were responsible in the forum of nations and before the throne of Almighty God. Christian men and women, oppressed with the sin and shame, humbly petitioned Congress to relieve them from that sin and shame by making the national capital free. Slavery bade its tools—its Pattons, its Pinckneys, and its Athertons—violate the constitutional right of petition, and willing majorities hastened to register its decree. Slavery arraigned before the bar of the House of Representatives John Quincy Adams, the illustrious champion of the right of petition and the freedom of speech, and it expelled the fearless and faithful Giddings for the offence of daring to construe the Constitution of his country and interpret the law of nations. Slavery stepped upon the decks of Massachusetts ships in the harbor of Charleston, seized colored seamen, citizens of the commonwealth, and consigned them to prisons, to be fined, to be lashed, and to be sold into perpetual bondage. Massachusetts, mindful of the rights of all her citizens, sent Samuel Hoar, one of her most honored sons, to test the constitutional rights of her imprisoned citizens in the judicial tribunals. Slavery cast him violently from South Carolina, and enacted that whoever should attempt to defend the rights of colored seamen in the courts of that commonwealth should suffer the ignominy of imprisonment.

Slavery cast its devouring eye upon the broad, rich fields of Texas, and sent its pioneers to wrench them from the feeble grasp of the Mexican republic. By the pen of Calhoun, its great champion, slavery in the name of the nation demanded, in the face of Europe, the annexation of that slaveholding republic, to defeat ultimate emancipation there, and to tighten the fetters of the bondmen here. In obedience to the humiliating demand of slavery, Texas was forced into the Union by an unconstitutional joint resolution, and the nation plunged into a war with Mexico. When peace returned, it brought with it half a million square miles of free territory. The North, the humiliated North, timidly asked that this territory, made forever free by Mexican law, should be forever consecrated to freedom by national legislation; but slavery demanded the right to extend itself over these free Territories, and threatened the dismemberment of the Union if that claim was denied. California framed a constitution and asked admission as a free commonwealth, but slavery resisted her admission with menaces of disunion and civil war. To appease slavery, a pliant Congress organized Utah and New Mexico, so that slave masters could range over them with their fettered bondmen, gave fifteen thousand square miles of the free soil of New Mexico to slaveholding Texas, and with them $10,000,000, and enacted the unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian Fugitive Slave Act, that has dishonored and humiliated the nation before earth and heaven. Slavery then, in its hour of complete triumph, insolently demanded that the two great political parties, who had shrunk appalled before its menaces of disunion and civil war, who had betrayed the cause of freedom, humanity, and civilization in America, should now declare these its acts "finalities," and bid the people forever cease "agitation."

Having forced these parties to pronounce its legislation of 1850 a "finality in principle and substance," slavery strode like an imperial despot into these chambers and demanded the repeal of the Missouri prohibition of the 6th of March, 1820, and a faithless Congress and a subservient Executive hastened to open half a million square miles, in the central regions of the Republic, consecrated forever to freedom and free labor, to the footsteps of the bondman. Northern freemen went to that magnificent Territory to found there the institutions of freedom. Slavery made its brutal tools invade Kansas, seize the ballot box, elect a territorial legislature, enact inhuman and unchristian laws, bathe the virgin soil of that beautiful region with the blood of civil war, frame a slave constitution by fraud, and force it upon a free people. Faithfully did the propagandists of slavery labor in Kansas and in Congress, and in the executive departments of the Government, to execute its decrees. They invaded the Territory, they usurped the government, they enacted slave statutes, they robbed and burned, they murdered brave men contending for their lawful rights. In Congress, the champions of slavery were hardly less brutal than in the wilds of distant Kansas. My colleague [Mr. Sumner] portrayed the crimes of slavery against Kansas, and he was smitten down upon the floor of the Senate by "a brutal, murderous, and cowardly assault." The propagandists of slavery framed a slave constitution, sustained it by fraud and violence, and the weak and wicked administration of James Buchanan, in obedience to the imperative demands of slavery, attempted to force it by corruption through Congress upon an unwilling people, but for the first time slavery was baffled, defeated, dishonored. Freemen triumphed; Kansas came into the Union radiant with liberty.

Sir, slavery saw its waning power; it saw, too, that its criminal victories of the past were but barren and fruitless triumphs that turned to ashes on the lip. It then wrung from the Supreme Court the Dred Scott decision, by which it hoped to control the vast Territories of the Republic, even against the will of the actual settlers. It bade the legislature of New Mexico enact a slave code, and also a code for the enslavement of white laboring men. It sent Walker and his filibusters to Central America to win slave territory. It sighed for Cuba, which it could not clutch. It mobbed, flogged, expelled, and sometimes murdered Christian men and women in the South for no offence against law, humanity, or religion. It maddened the Southern brain and fired the Southern heart. It turned large masses of the people of the South against the institutions and the people of the North, against the Constitution and the old flag of their country. It came into the Thirty-sixth Congress threatening to dismember this Union of constellated commonwealths if the people of America should elect a President opposed to its admission into the Territories. It rushed into the Democratic national convention, and, as the first step toward disunion, severed the Democratic party. It then went into the presidential election, seeking defeat, yet threatening the vengeance of disunion and civil war if defeated. Regardless, however, of its treasonable menaces, the people went to the ballot boxes and made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States. Slavery instantly raised the banner of treason, dragged South Carolina with headlong haste into open rebellion, and forced other States swiftly to follow her example. Slavery organized conspiracies in the cabinet, conspiracies in Congress, conspiracies in the States, conspiracies in the army, conspiracies in the navy, conspiracies everywhere for the overthrow of the Government and the disruption of the Republic. At the bidding of slavery the oft-vaunted Southern Confederacy, the dream of slaveholding traitors for thirty years, rose upon the recognized basis that bondage was the normal condition of all men of the African race. Slavery bade those of its champions who were in the service of the nation leave cabinets and Senates, military posts and naval stations, for the service of the rebellion; and, at the bidding of slavery, Floyd, its truest exponent, left the cabinet when there seemed nothing more for him to steal; and Davis and Toombs, Slidell and Mason, Hunter and Benjamin, and their guilty compeers in treason, in solemn mockery left the chambers of Congress when the plots, conspiracies, treacheries, and perjuries imposed upon them by the great architect of ruin seemed accomplished.

Sir, not content with seizing forts, arsenals, arms, and public property everywhere within the rebel States, slavery bade the frowning batteries menacing Sumter fire upon the Star of the West sailing under the protecting folds of the national flag, and freighted with bread for starving soldiers; and when that act of armed treason failed to arouse to action an insulted but patient and forbearing country, slavery bade those rebel batteries open their fire on Sumter and its few starving but heroic defenders; and those consuming batteries, in obedience to its command, hurled shot and shell upon that devoted fortress till the glorious old flag of united America came down, and the rebel banner waved over the smoking ruins. And thus slavery, after an aggressive warfare of two generations upon the vital and animating spirit of republican institutions, upon the cherished and hallowed sentiments of a free and Christian people, upon the enduring interests and lasting fame of the nation, organizes a treasonable conspiracy, raises the standard of revolt, and plunges the nation into a bloody contest for the preservation of its menaced life. To the full comprehension of every man in America whose heart, brain, and soul have not been poisoned by its seductive arts and malign influence slavery is the cause, the whole cause, of this foul, wicked, and bloody rebellion. Every loyal American whose reason is unclouded sees that slavery is the prolific mother of all these nameless woes—these sunless agonies of civil war. He sees that every loyal soldier upon the cot of sickness, of wounds, and of death was laid there by slavery; that every wounded and maimed soldier hobbling along our streets was wounded and maimed by slavery; that the lowly grave of every loyal soldier fallen in defence of the country was dug by slavery; that mourning wives and sorrowing children were made widows and orphans by slavery. Before the tribunal of mankind of the present and of coming ages, before the bar of the ever-living God, the loyal heart of America holds slavery responsible for every dollar sacrificed, for every drop of blood shed, for every pang of toil, of agony, and of death, for every tear wrung from suffering or affection, in this godless rebellion now upon us. For these treasonable deeds, for these crimes against freedom, humanity, and the life of the nation, slavery should be doomed by the loyal people of America to a swift, utter, and ignominious annihilation.

But slavery, Mr. President, should not only be doomed to an ignominious death, to perish utterly from the face of the country, for the treasonable crime of levying war upon the Government, but the safety if not the existence of the nation demands its extermination. The experience of nearly three years of civil war has demonstrated to the full comprehension of every loyal and intelligent man in America that slavery is the motive power, the heart and soul and brain of the rebellion.

Sir, slavery not only fires the Southern heart, brain, and soul, and nerves the Southern arm in council hall and on the battlefield with its malignant hate and bitter scorn of Yankee laborers and Yankee institutions, its lofty contempt for the principles and policy of freedom, its haughty defiance of the authority of the national Government, and its gorgeous visions of the future power of the Southern Confederacy, extending its imperial sway over Cuba, Mexico, and Central America, and commanding the commerce of the world by its tropical productions and its millions of slaves, but it uses the bones and sinews of more than three millions of the bondmen of rebel masters in support of the rebellion. These slaves of rebel masters sow and reap, plant and gather the harvests that support rebel masters and feed rebel armies. By their ceaseless, unpaid toil, these millions of bondmen enable their traitorous masters and the poor white men of the rebel States to leave their fields and shops and rush to the battlefield to shed the blood of our loyal countrymen, of our neighbors and friends and brothers and sons. These bondmen throw up fortifications, dig trenches and rifle pits, make roads and bridges, fell forests and build barracks, drive teams, and relieve in many ways the toil of rebel soldiers, thus making more efficient the rebel armies. The spade and hoe of the slaves of rebels support the rifle and bayonet of rebel soldiers. Slavery is not only the motive power, the heart and soul of the rebellion, but it is the arm also. Therefore the preservation of the life of the country, and the lives of our brave soldiers battling for national existence, as well as the just punishment of conspiracy and treason, demand that the loyal men of the Republic shall swear by Him who liveth evermore that slavery in America shall die.

Not only the punishment of its appalling crimes, not only the lives of our countrymen and the preservation of the life of the nation, demand the utter extermination of slavery, but the future repose of the country also demands it. Slavery has poisoned the very fountains of existence in the South; it has entered into the blood and bone and marrow and the soul of our Southern countrymen. It has filled their bosoms with bitter, fierce, unreasoning hate toward their countrymen of the North, and the institutions, the Government, and the flag of their country. So long as slavery shall live, it will infuse its deadly and fatal poison into the Southern brain, heart, and soul. Then let slavery die a felon's death, and sink into a traitor's grave, amid the curses of a loyal nation. Then, when slavery shall sleep the sleep that knows no waking, in the grave of dishonor and infamy, reason will assume its mild sway again over our now maddened, poisoned, and intoxicated countrymen of the South. Take the maddening cup from the trembling hand of the drunkard, who, in his wild delirium, hates the mother who bore him, the wife of his bosom, and the children of his love, and that drunkard will be a man again, and love, cherish, and protect the mother, wife, and children he would smite down in his madness. Smite down slavery, strike the fetters from the limbs of its hapless victims, and slave masters will become loyal again, ready to pour out their blood for the Government they now hate and the country they now assail. They will recur to the recollections of the early days of the Republic with gratitude and patriotic pride, they will look forward with undoubting confidence in the future of their country. Their hearts will again throb with kindly regard for their countrymen of the North, and they will hail once more the beneficent institutions of a united country. The old flag, under which the men of the North and of the South fought and bled, side by side, on land and wave, will again be an object of affection and pride; its stars, now obscured to their vision, will gleam again with brighter luster and more radiant beauty.

Congress, not by the consent of the loyal States or loyal masters, but by the will and power of the nation, has made free at once and forever every slave who enlists into the military service. The Attorney-General pronounces the black man, who was said to have no rights that white men were bound to respect, a citizen of the United States. The Secretary of State gives the black man the passport of citizenship, which in every quarter of the globe is evidence that the bearer is a citizen of the North American Republic. The Secretary of War commissions a black man to be a surgeon in the military service of the United States, and the President organizes a hundred and twenty regiments, of eighty thousand black men, who are bearing upon their flashing bayonets the unity of the Republic and the destinies of their race.

Sir, slavery in America, though upheld by interests, customs, and usages, trenched about by inhuman statutes, and hedged around by passionate, vehement, and unreasoning prejudices, is fast crumbling to atoms beneath the blows rained upon it by a liberty-loving and patriotic people. But let anti-slavery men listen to no truce, to no compromise, to no cry for mercy. Let them now be as inflexible as justice, as inexorable as destiny. Whenever and wherever a blow can be dealt at the vitals of the retreating fiend, let that blow be struck in the name of the bleeding nation, and of the "dumb, toiling millions bound and sold." A truce with slavery is a defeat for the nation. A compromise with slavery is a present of disaster and dishonor and a future of anarchy and blood. Mercy to slavery is a crime against liberty. The death of slavery is the annihilation of the rebellion, the unity of the Republic, the life of the nation, the harmonious development of republican institutions, the repose, culture, and renown of the people.

The hideous Fugitive Slave Act still blackens the statutes of this Christian land, reminding us of the degradation and humiliation of our country when the heel of that master was on its neck. Justice and humanity, self-respect and decency, all demand that the lingering infamy shall be obliterated from the page it blackens.

If this amendment shall be incorporated by the will of the nation into the Constitution of the United States, it will obliterate the last lingering vestiges of the slave system.

Our country is now floating on the stormy waves of civil war. Darkness lowers and tempests threaten. The waves are rising and foaming and breaking around us and over us with ingulfing fury. But amid the thick gloom, the star of duty casts its clear radiance over the dark and troubled waters, making luminous our pathway. That duty is, with every conception of the brain, every throb of the heart, every aspiration of the soul, by thought, by word, and by deed to feel, to think, to speak, to act so as to obliterate the last vestiges of slavery in America, subjugate rebel slave masters to the authority of the nation, hold up the weary arm of our struggling Government, crowd with heroic manhood the ranks of our armies that are bearing the destinies of the country on the points of their glittering bayonets, and thus forever blast the last hope of the rebel chiefs.

Then shall the waning star of the rebellion go down in eternal night, and the star of peace shall ascend the heavens, casting its mild radiance over fields now darkened by the storms of this fratricidal war. Then, when "the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled," our absent sons, with the laurels of victory on their brows, will come back to gladden our households and fill the vacant chairs around our hearthstones. Then the star of United America, now obscured, will reappear, radiant with splendor on the forehead of the skies, to illume the pathway and gladden the heart of struggling humanity.

On March 30 Garrett Davis [Ky.] spoke against the proposed amendment.

I am opposed to the pending proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States for several reasons intrinsic to the subject. In the first place, it strikes at one of the most essential principles of our commingled system of national and of State governments.

To maintain the Union, to hold it in its harmonious and perfect action, it is as essential that the existence of the authority and powers of the States within their reserved sovereignty should be upheld, maintained, and preserved as it is that the limited and delegated powers and sovereignty of the general Government should exist, be supported, defended, and exercised.

The absorption of the sovereignty not delegated by the Constitution to the general Government, and consequently reserved to the States, or any portion of it, by the President or Congress, would be revolutionary and destructive of our system, as would be the absorption by the States of the sovereignty, or any portion of it, delegated to the Government of the United States. The encroachment of either upon the other is equally unauthorized and criminal, and the persons engaged in making it are punishable for parallel offences by their respective judicial tribunals. Mr. President [Mr. Powell in the chair], it is clearly and imperatively the duty of you and myself to defend the reserved rights and sovereignty of Kentucky against the encroachments of Abraham Lincoln and his party, as it is to defend the limited sovereignty of the United States against the assaults of the rebels. To fail in either would be equally delinquent and criminal. Whoever, and by whatever command, has resisted by an array of force the execution of the laws of Kentucky has committed the offence of treason against that State, and should suffer the penalty denounced against the crime. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and generals high in command have moved armed bodies of men into Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri, to resist and defeat the execution of the election laws of those States, and have themselves, by the power of the sword, driven their free citizens from their own polls, and themselves virtually appointed the minions of executive power to seats in the House of Representatives of Congress and to State offices. Those high functionaries thereby committed treason against those States, and the most important and imperative duty of their authorities and people is to have those great delinquents arraigned and punished for their crimes by the judgment of the courts of the States against which they were committed. The punishment of Federal officers so high in authority for the commission of treason against the States, by the just and firm execution of the law in their civil courts, would be an example of the most salutary influence. To suppress the rebellion by force of arms, and to punish by the due administration of the law its most guilty authors, and also the great violators of the Constitution of the United States, who profess to be acting under its authority, and who have committed treason against States, would effect more in the support and preservation of constitutional liberty, and to vindicate the capacity of the people for self-government than the performance of any other duty or work.

But to the objection that the proposed amendment of the Constitution would infringe the right of the States to manage their local and domestic affairs, it may also be answered that slavery concerns all the States as well as those in which it exists. If there be truth in this position, it may be replied that there is no important property interest, pursuit, or institution in any State that does not, directly or indirectly, concern the people of every other State; and that argument would require the Constitution of the United States to be so amended as to give the Federal Government power over all of them, which would establish a perfectly consolidated Government and virtually annihilate the States.

There are many matters, the control of which is left by our Government wholly and exclusively with the States, and over which the people would not have confided to Congress and the President a particle of power when the Constitution was formed, that much more closely and momentously concern all the States than the continuance of slavery in some of them. Religious faith is one. The Federal Government has no power to interfere in any way with the subject of religion. The entailment of real and personal property, the principle of primogeniture, a system of railroads and other internal improvements in the several States connecting with the systems of other States—all these are subjects of domestic and local concern within every State, of which it has the exclusive management; and yet each one more nearly, and with larger interest and greater sympathy, would concern the people of all the other States than does slavery in the slave States the people of the free States.

Slavery, in this day and generation, has for the people of the United States a factitious but an absorbing interest; in the future, under altered circumstances, the others, and especially religion, may still more strongly possess them. If this proposed alteration of the Constitution be accepted it will be a precedent, and may establish a principle that may carry those other domestic concerns, and still others not now thought of, into the domain of an encroaching and centralized despotism, and which would be a very great stride.

If it were conceded that the power to amend the Constitution, as established and regulated by the fifth article, would by its terms and letter authorize the proposed change, it would be in fatal conflict with its intent and spirit, and, therefore, according to a universal rule of construction, void and of no effect. It never was the purpose of those who made it to subject many of its great principles to be expunged by the exercise of this power of amendment. The power to amend is but the power to improve, and any alteration to be legitimate should be an amendment. To this it may be said that as there is no certain test by which this question of amendment can be tried it is necessarily decided by the amending power. Granting this argument to be sound, still there is another and very important question connected with this power of amendment. Does it import the power of revolution? Of making such essential change in the nature, form, powers, and limitations of the Government as would be revolutionary of it—of its important structure, of its characteristic principles, of the great and essential rights and liberties assured by it to the citizen? The true and precise question is, does the proposed change, or amendment, carry a revolutionary principle and power? I hold that the framers of the Constitution did not intend it to be, and that it is not, in its nature or in fact, a revolutionary power; that there is a boundary between the power of revolution and the power of amendment, which the latter, as established in our Constitution, cannot pass; and that if the proposed change is revolutionary it would be null and void, notwithstanding it might be formally adopted. It would not be a part of the Constitution, and would consequently have no effect. An amendment proposing to abolish all the popular elective features of our Government, or that Representatives should hold their offices for life; that the place of Senator should be hereditary, coupled with a title and the privileges of nobility; that the President should be a king, and transmit his crown and throne as in England, would be revolutionary, and out of the power of the pale of amendment. Neither the legislative, executive, nor judicial branch of the Government could be swept away under the guise of the exercise of this power of amendment. The States and their governments are as essential and indispensable parts of our compound system of government as the United States and the Federal Government, and could not be expunged by this power of amendment. The retention by the States of their exclusive rights, and the right to ordain, manage, and control them, independent of all control or interference by the United States Government any more than of a foreign power, is a great and essential feature of our system, and it cannot be revolutionized, destroyed, by this power of amendment. If it can take cognizance of slavery, it may of every other local and domestic concern of the States. That would be revolutionary, and is therefore out of the domain of amendment. The power of amendment can only be made to embrace the forms and the provisions and principles of secondary importance.

If the principle involved by the proposed amendment be sound, and, it, if formally adopted, would be valid and obligatory, then in the same mode the terms of the members of the House could be extended for seven years; Senators could be metamorphosed into hereditary nobles, with titles, and the President into a monarch; and any other changes, utterly revolutionary and destructive of our Government and the popular freedom it establishes, could be made. No, sir, this power of amendment does not carry the power of revolution, in whole or in part, to be executed in solido or in detail, to burst forth at once in full-grown proportions, or to be cautiously developed from time to time and by gradual accumulation, like Mr. Lincoln's war policy, until the whole work is consummated. Neither the subversion of our free and popular Government, nor any of its great distinctive and essential features, or of those preëxisting and vital rights and liberties to secure and perpetuate which to the people were its object and its mission, is within the legitimate scope and operation of the power of amendment. That would be in both aspects, not amendment, but destruction and revolution.

Nor, sir, is the present condition of the country and the people at all propitious or fit to enter upon the most grave and important work of amending, altering the Constitution of our Government, the paramount law which regulates and controls within its orbit the constitutions, laws, and administrations of all the States and every official act of Congress, of the President, and of every other officer of the United States. The revision of the work of the preëminently great and patriotic men who put together that wonderful political structure, so admirably adjusted and balanced, so novel yet so complete, so free and yet possessed of all the necessary and proper powers and vigor, is one of the most delicate and important tasks which those who are to perform it can possibly undertake. They ought to be free from all sectional prejudice and excitement, and bring to it calm and unperturbed reason and broad and true patriotism and statesmanship. The condition of the country should be fixed, that of settled and stable repose, that any changes and modifications might be safely and wisely adapted to its permanent relations, interests, and tranquillity.

There is every probability that when the war is closed modifications of the Constitution will then be highly necessary and proper; but their nature, extent, and the features and powers of the Government in which they may be required cannot be possibly divined. Now to make any might mar rather than improve.

But when to this consideration, the unsettled condition of the country, is added the present state of the mind and passions of the people, nationally, sectionally, and individually, the position that now is not the proper time to intermeddle with the Constitution cannot, with any reason, be controverted. No man is free from apprehension and excitement, and with vast numbers it approximates frenzy, mania. Sectional opinions and prejudices were never before so rife and extreme. Hatred to slavery and slave owners by the members of the Republican party generally has demented them. They are wholly incapable of any fair and just consideration of the rights of slaveholders, in relation not only to that property, but all their other rights individually and collectively as slaveholding States. Extreme aversion and prejudice with both of those classes of the people have usurped the place of reason and truth. Neither entertains for the other any sentiments of kindness, fraternity, charity, or justice. I have no belief that there is in either House of the present Congress, or that there would be in the legislature or convention of any one of the States, a single member whose mind and passions are so little affected by the present condition of public affairs as not to be disqualified for the delicate and difficult work of revising and altering the common government of all the States and all the people of the United States. I believe with the most of them that unfitness would exist to such an extent as to make it impossible for them to deliberate and act, not only impartially and justly for their adversaries in politics and their sections, but also wisely and safely for themselves and their own States.

Another objection of overruling weight is that no revision of the Constitution in any form ought to be undertaken under the auspices of the party in power. Its leaders have always been hostile to the compromises on the subject of slavery, and the protection which it guarantees to the owners of that property. From a much earlier day than secession was thought of in the South, those leaders had determined on the destruction of slavery; and, if they could not succeed by any other means, even to revolutionize the Government to effect it. They did not bring on a general war to that end, though they had long assaulted it in every other form; and as soon as the rebellion broke forth they quietly decided, if possible, to make it the occasion and to furnish the means of the overthrow of slavery. Mr. Lincoln had been an extreme abolitionist from early life; and it was that consideration that procured him the nomination of the Chicago convention. When he and the chiefs of his party in Congress, at the commencement of the war, unanimously declared that their purpose and policy were not to attack slavery, or any other rights or institutions of the insurgent States, but only to vindicate the authority and laws of the United States over the rebels, they were dissembling, and then lying in wait to make an onset on slavery. They knew that their purpose could be effected only by breaking over constitutional guaranties, and by the power of the army to subdue all opposition to their scheme. There is no right of person or property that the President and Congress have not outrageously infracted and trampled out, under and by the agency of the iron heel of military despotism, to subjugate or awe every person disposed to offer even legal and peaceful resistance to their flagrant abuses and usurpations of power. As they progressed, and met with impunity in their nefarious work, their objects were enlarged. They determined not only to consummate the destruction of slavery, so that it could never be restored, but also to continue themselves and their party in place and power. The first they consider substantially as an accomplished fact; and they are, and have been for more than a year, moving with increasing energy and boldness toward the other as their now paramount object. They affect to adhere to the forms of the Constitution, while they utterly disregard not only its spirit, but also its express provisions and all the liberty and protection which it assures to the citizen. They have devised the boldest and most revolutionary measures under the guise of law and executive administration as the machinery of their operations. The first in time was the erection of West Virginia into a new State, and her admission into the Union in palpable violation of the Constitution, so admitted and avowed by many of their leaders both in and out of Congress; and attempted to be justified by them on the ground that the country was in a state of rebellion and revolution, and the Constitution of no obligation whatever. The President took the official opinion of the Attorney-General, which was that the measure was without constitutional authority, and yet he approved it.

After the congressional elections in the fall of 1862 it was apparent that, if those which were to take place in the other States in 1863 were to be decided by the free suffrages of their people, Mr. Lincoln and his party would be in a minority in the present House. The success of their projects and the retention of power by them made it necessary that they should have the majority in the House as well as in the Senate. He therefore ordered the military authorities to interfere and overthrow the freedom of elections, and to depose the State laws and officers for conducting them in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware, to the extent of securing a majority for him in the House. To that extent he was equally a usurper with Cæsar, Cromwell, and Bonaparte.

But Mr. Lincoln has long since imbibed other views and projects of personal ambition. A desire for reëlection has seized upon him. It now possesses all the mind and heart and soul that he has. He is no statesman, but a mere political charlatan. He has inordinate vanity and conceit. He is a consummate dissembler, and an adroit and sagacious demagog. He has the illusion of making a great historical name for himself in connection with the total abolition of slavery in the United States. He also loves power and money. He has long foreseen that in his desire for reëlection he would have several competitors from his own party. He is not fierce or revengeful, or even boldly audacious and radical; and, though not marked by any sense of benevolence, humanity, or justice, he does not possess positively the opposite qualities, and, though a radical, is not reckless or rash. He is, and always has been, as uncompromisingly opposed to slavery as the most ultra radical, but preferred to overthrow it with some show of legal and constitutional authority; and that it should be effected gradually, and not by sudden and violent change. Such were his first and individual views and policy in relation to slavery; but, being rather of flexible but still obstinate nature, the pressure of the bold and more energetic radicals has pushed him pretty well nigh to their extreme position. As this "marshaled him the way he was going," he is well disposed to accept it, and, if it promised to aid him materially in his purpose of a reëlection, he would not hesitate to take it with alacrity. But he understands that most of the radicals prefer other men to himself, and, while he must manage to satisfy and win them if possible, and especially as their second choice, he must hold on to all the moderate men of the Republican party, and by some show of conservatism win others outside. This keeps him very busy at his favorite game of "playing for all the pockets."

But he regards, and with much truth, that his personal, official, and distinctive party consists of the officeholders and seekers, contractors and those seeking contracts, whose numbers are greater than our armies in the field. To those prætorian, not cohorts, but legions, he was determined to add others in his own especial interests. Hence he issued another edict, the effect of which was to demolish all the constitutions and governments of the rebel States, and among them Tennessee and Arkansas and other States whose constitutions have not been changed in a particle within many years before the rebellion; and to authorize one-tenth of as many people as voted in them at the last presidential election to reconstruct and to carry on their State governments. But he prescribed as the indispensable condition that all men who took part in the reconstruction must renounce their negro property and take an oath to support his war policy as embodied in all his proclamations and the laws of Congress passed by his party. He pledged his faith to support and defend these spurious State governments by the power of the United States armies and navies. All their elections were to be under the surveillance of the President's military subordinates; and consequently none but his minions and tools could vote or hold office. The reorganization of those States is to be virtually by him and for all his purposes. They were designed to be dependencies and he the autocrat. The world never witnessed a more lawless and daring political enterprise, and, except in the feature of blood, it comes up to the measure of the greatest usurpations. The people of the States are the only legitimate power to construct or reconstruct their civil governments; and Congress, and not the President, is the authority to admit them primarily, or secondarily, into the Union, and to guarantee to them republican forms of government. Mr. Lincoln seizes upon all this power. Under this presidential autocracy, old, or Eastern, as well as West Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and other rebel States have been or are to be readmitted into the Union, and to take part with the other States in its government. By the present ratio all Virginia, east, west, and rebel, would be entitled to eleven Representatives in Congress. The new State has three, and it is a question what portion of the residue the few counties of the other division of the State within our military lines can rightfully have, and, a yet more difficult one, what number of electoral votes in the presidential election will be the right of those few counties. The new State having but three for her Representatives and two for her Senators, if those few counties can elect the residue for the whole of the remaining State, and also for its two Senators, the new State and a small fractional part of the remainder of the State would cast together fifteen electoral votes. That vote by those counties would give them a very undue and unconstitutional weight over the people of the other States in the presidential election. If that will be permitted may depend, I presume, upon the problem whether it would be necessary to reëlect Mr. Lincoln. To effect that object I believe a separate State could and would be organized out of East Tennessee, and two in Maryland, one upon the eastern and the other upon the western shore, without the least regard to constitutional difficulties. When Louisiana is readmitted she will be entitled to seven electoral votes, Tennessee to ten, Arkansas to five, and all Virginia to fifteen. So that by the organization of these four "rottenborough" and unauthorized States there would be secured to Mr. Lincoln not only thirty-seven electoral votes in the presidential election, but, what may be even of more importance, that number in the Republican nominating convention at Baltimore. I take it for true that these illegitimate States, being the progeny of Mr. Lincoln, will support him when and where and anyhow they can. They will also be ready to vote for this proposed amendment of the Constitution.

But Mr. Lincoln is a cautious and farseeing man. He has had still another provision made, first and mainly for his own personal success, subordinately for that of his party. The Territories of Colorado and Nevada have already, at the present session, been admitted as new States into the Union; and the chairman of the Committee on Territories has told us, and no doubt truly, that Nebraska will also be admitted. Thus there will be admitted three more new States, each with one Representative and two Senators, having an aggregate of eleven electoral votes and an equal strength in the Baltimore convention. I believe, both on principle and policy, that no Territory ought to be admitted as a State until it has a population equal to the ratio of representation. That ratio is now 127,000. By the census of 1860, Colorado had a population of 34,277; Nebraska, 28,841; and Nevada, 6,857.

Thus by military interference at elections, the destruction and reorganization of States, the admission of new States with but a small fraction of the ratio of population, all by infraction of the Constitution, and in opposition to right, justice, and policy, and chiefly by the power and under the supervision of Mr. Lincoln, a great and dangerous strength has been accumulated to him as President to be exercised to promote his own selfish and ambitious views in the first place; and, secondly, to continue his party in power to enable it to protract the aggrandizement of its leaders, the pecuniary advantages of its masses, and the complete consummation of its most wicked and destructive policy and measures.

Our own Government has become so abused and perverted, so unjust and oppressive to all who will not bow to those who administer it in unquestioning submission, so fruitful and general a source of evil and practical despotism, that hundreds of thousands and millions of the most loyal people of the United States are in doubt whether it, as administered, or the rebellion is the greatest national scourge. The assaults, wrongs, and oppressions of both on the border slave States is such as to be passing them, as it were, between the upper and nether millstone. The greatest good that could now fall to the lot of the people of those States would be the speediest suppression of the rebellion by all constitutional measures and means, and by the expulsion from power of the party that has possession of the Government and is ruling the country and so recklessly rushing both upon ruin. I look for the consummation of the first to the continued efforts of our brave and numerous soldiery and the submission of the rebels. For the second I still rely upon the peaceful remedy of the ballot-box, applied by the sovereign power of the United States; and, if it were applied so as to produce that great change, I believe that the cessation of the war, the submission and reconciliation of the rebels, the reconstruction of the Union, and the vindication of the laws and Constitution, with renewed guaranties and strength, would all speedily ensue. But if the dominant party can continue their power and rule, either by the will or acquiescence of the people or the exercise of the formidable powers which it has usurped, I am not able to see any termination of the present and still growing ills short of the ordeal of general and bloody anarchy.

On March 31 Willard Saulsbury [Del.] replied to Senator Trumbull.

Mr. President, we are told that the reason why this amendment should be made is that slavery has caused the present national difficulties; that if it had not been for the existence of slavery there would be no war. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee tells us that even if the present troubles have been brought on by the interference of Northern fanatics with the institution of slavery, then if slavery had not existed there would have been nothing for them to interfere with, and the rebellion would not have taken place; that if it was brought on by the desire of the people of the South to strengthen and encourage the institution, then if it had not existed the rebellion would not have taken place; and he seems to think that to it we owe the loss of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and most of the ills under which we are now suffering. He therefore proposes as the great remedy,—I presume not only to heal our present troubles, but as a bond of peace in the future—that the institution of slavery shall be wiped out by a change of the Constitution.

If there had been no fire, so large a portion of the city of New York as was burned down in 1835 would not have been burned down. If there was no water, there would be no overflowing floods. If there was no sun in the heavens, no man would fall prostrate to the earth and die from the heat of that sun. Let the Senator correct all the ills of life. Let him quench the fire that warms all the human race, and no incendiary then could burn our dwellings; let him dry up the fountains of the deep and close the windows of heaven, that there shall be no more water; let him pluck the sun from on high, that his heat shall no more cause death.

But, sir, I hold that if you adopt this amendment, and you could get three-fourths of the States to ratify it, it would not be obligatory upon the others for another reason; and that is that you cannot propose this amendment to all the States, as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. There are confessedly some eight or nine of these States now out of the Union, over which the Federal Government does not pretend to exercise control. What is the meaning of the clause that the Congress of the United States may propose amendments which, when ratified by three-fourths of the States, shall become a part of the Constitution? It means that you shall propose those amendments, not to a portion of the States, but to all the States, so that all the States may have the power to act upon them.

The Constitution of the United States is the same as any other contract. It is a contract between the States, who, in the language of Mr. Madison, are parties to it, and the plain, evident, honest import of this clause of the Constitution giving the power of ratification to three-fourths of the States is and must be so understood by all right-thinking men, that all the States shall have the power of passing upon that proposed amendment, of ratifying or rejecting it, and that, if that privilege is denied any State, if your amendment is not proposed to any State, it cannot operate upon that State, because it would be in violation of the just terms and fair interpretation of the Constitution.

If you wish to make an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall be binding and obligatory in all future time upon the parties to that Constitution, why not wait till peace is restored; why not wait till passion ceases to inflame the breast and madness to warp the judgment and craze the brain of men? The fundamental law of a great people should never be changed amid the shock of arms. Reason should sit calmly on her throne; judgment should be brought to the "line" before acting on such a question.

But, sir, I oppose this proposed amendment on another ground. It is impossible for it to be ratified by a vote of three-fourths of the States. The Senator from Illinois,[1] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, said it would require twenty-eight States, and he named the States which he supposed would vote to ratify it. He included all the adhering States with the exception of my own, and he thought she could not stand against it Let me tell the honorable Senator that, if the resolution is passed, I do not suppose my State will be in the way of it; not because she will approve of it; not because the majority of her people will not be honestly opposed to it and would not vote against it, but because you do not intend that they shall ever act upon it. The Senator said that Maryland had inaugurated this policy, and she would be in favor of it. I have some acquaintance with the people of that State. She will agree to it, just as the Senator, if met by a highwayman, solitary, alone, and unarmed, presenting a pistol at his head and demanding his purse, would agree to give it up.

But he expects to receive accessions from Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Louisiana in favor of this proposed amendment. Does the Senator believe that, if the people of those States were free to act, and could pass upon his proposed amendment according to their wish or judgment, there would be one man in ten who would vote to ratify it?

What is your government in Arkansas, in Louisiana, and in Tennessee? Take away your soldiers, and there would be scarcely one man in fifty in either of those States that would either approve your amendment or recognize your authority. And yet the Senator would affect the rights of nearly one-half of what was once this Union by going through—I say it in no disrespect to the honorable Senator, but I say it because I believe it and think it—going through the farce of an election under military control and restraint, and then come in the presence of the Senate of the United States and before the people of the country and of the world, and proclaim that the people of three-fourths of the States of the Union, in the spirit which their fathers intended them to act and in the free exercise of their judgments and their opinions as guaranteed to them by their fathers, have agreed to amend their Constitution and forever hereafter wipe out the foul blot of slavery!

Mr. President, nothing is to be gained by this except one thing, and that you may accomplish. You may succeed by such an amendment as this, by an election—no, not by an election, but by a farce enacted in the border States and by a worse farce enacted in some of the seceded States—you may succeed in abolishing slavery in the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri. That is what you can do. You can succeed in injuring those who never tried to injure you; but, unless you conquer the South, unless you make them pass under the yoke as you avow your purpose to do, unless you take bodily hold of their slaves and draw them within your lines and keep them there, you have accomplished nothing. You have regarded them as belligerents, and consequently the slave you take to-day from them and put your uniform upon, if he is recaptured by them, is not free, though proclamations and legislative enactments may so declare, but is a slave still, and not only a slave by reason of the fact that he is in possession of his original master, but, by a sound principle of the law of nations, the jus postliminii, he reverts to his original owner.

Daniel Clark [N. H.] rebutted the argument that the time was not ripe for the amendment.

I am told that this is not the time for such an amendment of the Constitution. Pray when, sir, will it come? Will it be when the President has issued more and more calls for two or three hundred thousand men of the country's bravest and best? Will it be when more fathers and husbands and sons have fallen, and their graves are thicker by the banks of the rivers and streamlets and hillsides? Will it be when there are more scenes like this I hold in my hand, of a quiet spot by the side of a river, with the moon shining upon the water and a lonely sentinel keeping guard, and here in the open space the headboards marking the burial places of many a soldier boy, and an open grave to receive another inmate, and underneath the words, "All quiet on the Potomac"? [Exhibiting a photograph to the Senate.] Will it be when such scenes of quiet are more numerous, not only along the Potomac but by the Rapidan, the Chickahominy, the Stone, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, the Big Black, and the Red? Sir, now, in my judgment, is the time, and the fitting time. Never until now could this amendment have been carried, and now I hope and believe that it can be carried. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

Slavery's strongest and safest guaranties were in the Constitution, and its supporters were made when they cast away and threw off those guaranties. Remaining in the Union, no one would probably have moved for an amendment of the Constitution. Loyal to the Government, hostile armies would not have set free their slaves, nor laws now necessary and expedient have authorized their employment against their masters in arms.

But now, sir, every free State will gladly, it is hoped and believed, vote for the proposed amendment. Most would rejoice to do it; while numbers of the slave States, aghast at the miseries of secession and the horrors of this cruel Civil War, recognizing slavery as the cause of all this disturbance and all these woes, would be among the foremost to sweep it forever away.

Now, sir, is the time to do it. And not only is now the time, but the necessity and the duty of doing it are upon us. We can have no permanent peace nor restored Union until it is done.

There are those who cry, "The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is!" But I am free and bold to confess that I am for a Union without slavery, and an amended Constitution making it forever impossible. This revolt was to preserve slavery, and we shall fail of our whole duty if we do not remove the inciting cause. To restore this Union with slavery in it when we have subdued the rebel armies would be again to build your house on its smoking ruins when you had not put out the fire which burned it down.

If the dire calamities now befalling us be the "retributions of Providence upon a stupendous crime," what mad folly to hug that crime, and seek to avoid its future punishment! "Let my people go." But Pharaoh would not let them go; and then came sufferings, and plagues, and the smiting of the first-born. Oh! how many of our first-born have been smitten and fallen. Let us be wise and heed the teaching. There is a Providence in the great events now transpiring. The people see the hand. It points the way. They are filled with hope and faith. They follow the pillar and the cloud, and will struggle and endure.

I know, Mr. President, that the suppression of the rebellion will necessarily wound and maim slavery. I know that every victory over the rebels is a victory also over the cause of the rebellion, and I know, too, that the arming of the slaves will make the future enslaving of these men and their kindred well-nigh impossible; but slavery will still exist, not in much vigor or strength, but in the root and principle. This amendment will dig out the root and repudiate the principle.

Mr. President, in a quiet churchyard, near his home, is the grave of a soldier who returned to die. At the head of his grave is a marble slab, and on it these few but expressive words, "Mustered out." Let both Houses of Congress, by a two-thirds vote, recommend this amendment abolishing slavery, and let three-fourths of the States, burying slavery by their ratification, come and write its epitaph on the Constitution, "Mustered out."

The soldier was "mustered out," we trust, to enlist again in the shining cohorts in advance of earth's extreme picket line, but let this be "mustered out" to go, like Judas, to its own place.

On April 4 Timothy O. Howe [Wis.] spoke upon the likelihood of the border States accepting the amendment and upon the status of the seceded States.

The State of Delaware will adopt this amendment; her people will adopt it in the exercise of their free judgment. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury] shakes his head. I do not know but that he will oppose the amendment; that he will advise the people of Delaware not to adopt it; but his advice will not prevail, I humbly trust and I humbly believe.

Undertake to persuade that little State of Delaware not to enfranchise her few slaves when all the rest of the Union are crying for it! Dame Partington, Mr. President, standing on the beach of the Atlantic, trying to put back its waves with her mop, would be a model of practical sagacity compared with the Senator from Delaware if he should stand on the borders of that little State and undertake to persuade her not to let the deluge of freedom, which God has commanded to sweep the continent, flow over that little patch of His pasture.

Delaware will adopt the amendment, and so will Kentucky. Sir, Henry Clay sleeps in Kentucky. Let her people reject this proposition to amend the Constitution under the pressure of this great national necessity, and they would see the bones of the great hero rise from his grave and stalk indignantly from the borders; they would not rest there any longer. Kentucky will adopt this amendment. Every State will adopt it. I know that there are eleven States which have declared themselves independent of this Constitution and of all amendments to it. What are you going to do with them? There are those communities of people. They are States or they are not. It is a question that you ought to settle. In my judgment, there are no American States there. Decide the matter as you will: if they are States, they are going to vote upon this amendment, and they are going to vote for it; every man who votes at all upon it will vote to adopt the amendment. If they are not States, they are not to vote upon it, and their votes are not to be counted, and you still have a unanimous verdict from the States of the American Union in favor of this amendment to the Constitution.

On April 5 Reverdy Johnson [Md.] spoke in favor of the amendment.

To manumit at once nearly four million slaves who have been in bondage by hereditary descent during their whole lives, and who, because they were in bondage, and as one of the consequences of the condition in which they were placed, have been kept in a state of almost absolute ignorance, is an event of which the world's history furnishes no parallel. Whether if it succeeds it will be attended by weal or by woe the future must decide. That it will not be followed by unmixed good or by unmixed evil is perhaps almost certain; and the only question in my view that presents itself to statesmen is, first, whether the measure itself be right, independent of its consequences; and, secondly, whether those consequences may be such as render it inexpedient, because inhuman in other particulars, to do what is right.

There was a period in our own time when there was but one opinion upon the question of right. The men who fought through the Revolution, those who survived its peril and shared in its glory, and who were called to the convention by which the Constitution of the United States was drafted and recommended to the adoption of the American people, almost without exception thought that slavery was not only an evil to any people among whom it might exist, but that it was an evil of the highest character, which it was the duty of all Christian people, if possible, to remove, because it was a sin as well as an evil.

Its recognition in the Constitution (for it is idle, as I think, to deny that it is there recognized), the authority given by implication to a trade which might lead to its increase by immigration, was not because a large majority of the members of the convention, and a large majority of the people of the United States in the mass favored the institution, but because they believed that without provisions of that description it would be difficult to have a Union adopted. Whether they were right or wrong it is now useless to inquire. Judging by what was occurring at the time, it is possible, and perhaps even more than probable, that they were right; but, if they made a mistake as to that fact, if the Union could have been adopted without the recognition of the institution in the government which formed it, if its gradual extirpation could have been provided for, no one who is a spectator of the scenes around us will now fail to regret that it had not been done.

My private opinion has ever been that slavery is an evil. But in the public situation in which I now stand I have deemed it my duty to recognize the binding and paramount authority of the Constitution, to yield my moral convictions to the obligation of that instrument, and not to esteem myself as excusable or justified in construing it by any views of morality which I might entertain, or in construing out of it any provisions that might be found in it inconsistent with such views. With these views, I appeal to the authority of the Constitution itself as a justification for the vote which I shall give upon this measure.

I shall not stop to inquire whether slavery produced the war or not. One thing, in my judgment, is perfectly clear, now that that war is upon us, that a prosperous and permanent peace can never be secured if the institution is permitted to survive; and will it not survive unless a measure like that upon your table shall receive the sanction which the Constitution requires? That brings me to inquire into the legality and the effect of the other means by which it is proposed to get rid of it.

First, can it be accomplished by the President? He does not claim for himself—he has not gone to that extent—the authority to abolish slavery except as an incident of the military power with which in the state of civil war in which we are engaged he is vested as Commander-in-chief of the army. The Supreme Court has asserted, what cannot be denied, because your own legislation had recognized its existence, and because the fact, independent of that recognition, was apparent, that a state of war did exist. But in so saying, and in meeting the objection that, although in one sense it was a war, yet in another sense it was a mere rebellion in which each one of the parties concerned in the seceded States was committing from day to day, and as often as he denied the authority of the United States and attempted to maintain his denial by force of arms, treason, they said that these parties were not the less to be considered as enemies because they were traitors.

The Supreme Court never pretended and never intimated, as I read their opinion, that the existence of that belligerent relation terminated all the civil obligations which the citizens of the seceded States were under to the Government of the United States; but, on the contrary, announced it as the inevitable inference, from the statement which I have just made, that in their view they were enemies although traitors; that, although they were enemies; they were not less so because they were traitors; that in point of fact, as the parties then stood, there was due from each one of the citizens or inhabitants of the seceded States an allegiance and an obligation to fulfill it, and of course to observe the laws and yield to the authority of the United States, which, at the end of the war, if that end should be so successful as to reinstate the Government of the United States in authority, might proceed against them under the laws of the land as traitors, and in the sense of the Constitution which defined the crime of treason.

It would be monstrous, Mr. President, as I think, if it were otherwise. There are now—I think the number has been lessened, and it is due to truth, as I think, so to state, by the policy which has been adopted in the prosecution of the war—but there are now in the rebellious States hundreds and thousands of citizens just as devoted to the Union as any member of the Senate, and just as anxious to see its authority restored as any member of this body. These are entitled, therefore, to the protection of the Government. Their obedience in point of fact and their ostensible obedience to the eye of the power which is around them, in itself a government de facto, is an obedience which they have no power to resist, and upon the well-established principles of the laws of nations is an obedience in which there is no crime.

If it be true that it is a legal exercise of a belligerent right to manumit the slaves of the enemy, one thing is perfectly certain as a proposition equally applicable to a civil war, which in this aspect, with reference to the power which it confers on the President, stands precisely in the condition in which his power stands in the case of an international war, that he has no practical power to effect the manumission of slaves belonging to the enemy where he has not the physical power to attain that result. The President never uttered a truth more absolutely sound than when he stated that a proclamation of manumission or of freedom could have just as much effect upon the slaves of the enemy as a popish bull would have upon the course of a comet. All, therefore, in my view, that can be accomplished by means of presidential power derived from his being by the Constitution placed at the head of the armies of the United States in this war is that, if he can get the slave under the control of the Union, he can manumit him.

If these slaves come to the standard of the United States, or if that standard is carried within the territorial limits of the foe and the slaves are there within its control, discharged actually from the domination of their masters, the proclamation which declares them free may, and I am inclined to think will, have that effect. But just as sure as anything in the future can be said to be sure is it, in my judgment, that, if the war was to terminate without any provision being made for the condition of the slaves who have not come within the actual control of the military authority of the United States, they will be decided by the courts of the United States to be slaves still.

It is evident that the tendency of the President's own mind led to that result. In his proclamation of amnesty he says, in effect: When I offer to you an amnesty, coupled with the condition not only that you are to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance of the Constitution by Congress, but that you are to support any proclamations that may have been or may hereafter be issued by the Executive from time to time, I am willing that you shall take that oath subject to the right of having that question decided judicially in the future.

Second, can emancipation be accomplished by the legislative power? It is true that the Congress of the United States by the Constitution is clothed with an authority to declare war; and it is maintained that, under the authority to declare war, slaves may be emancipated. That may be true; but it may not be true so as to do away with the necessity of the measure upon your table. They may be emancipated, quo modo?[1] The power, like whatever emancipating power the President may be clothed with under his authority as Commander-in-chief executing the war power, is limited by the practical exercise of that war power. How far do your troops go? Against whom are they fighting? Get the slaves under the protection of your standard, and, if you think proper then is the time (and before then you are impotent to accomplish it), make them free; but until then the effort to accomplish it by the mere exercise of legislative authority, in my judgment, is just as futile as the effort to accomplish it by the mere exercise of executive authority.

That is not all. In order to gain the end which, in common with a majority of the Senate, I have at heart, the abolition of slavery by means of the exercise of this legislative war power must go a step further and show that it is a power which may be exerted over the loyal as well as the disloyal States. Will that proposition bear examination? The Constitution of the United States, as we all know, in a state of peace gives no power to any branch of the Government of the United States to interfere with slavery in the States. A few wild men, carried away by some loose and undefined notions of human liberty with which the Constitution does not deal, think that they find, in the principles of the Declaration of Independence and in the great principles which were the object for establishing the Constitution of the United States, principles so inconsistent with human slavery that the Constitution not only does authorize the legislative department of the Government to put an end to it, but makes that the duty of the Government; or rather that it is so inconsistent with the principles upon which the Government is founded that the judiciary, if called upon to decide, will decide that there can be no human slavery. I will not stop to examine that. I assume what, with the exception of a few persons to whom I have just alluded, has been the universal opinion—the opinion pronounced by the convention which nominated the present incumbent of the presidential chair, over and over again announced on the floor of Congress, announced upon the floor of Congress by overwhelming majorities since this rebellion commenced—that with the existence of human slavery in the States the Constitution of the United States in a time of peace has nothing whatever to do. If in time of war, the Government of the United States may in a certain condition of things effect the object of freeing slaves, putting an end to the institution under the military power, it can only be in those cases and against those people against whom they have a right to exert their power. Because one or more States have seceded and have carried their secession to an extent that they have become belligerents in a certain sense toward the United States, what right have the United States, in the exercise of the power which they are authorized to wield for the purpose of putting down the rebellion and reinstating the authority of the Government, to interfere with the loyal States of Maryland, or Kentucky, or Missouri? Have they any right to declare war upon Maryland, or upon either of the other States that I have named? Certainly not; and, if so far from having the authority to carry on war against a loyal State they are carrying on the war against the disloyal States by means of the power of the loyal States, including Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, it is a contradiction in terms that in the exercise of that war power they can, as against themselves, against the loyal States, exert an authority incident alone to the war power, when the war power itself is applicable alone to a state of war.

There remains a third method of emancipation—by an amendment to the Constitution. Now it is said it cannot be done in that mode. The honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. Davis], if I understand him correctly, in the very elaborate speech which he delivered upon the subject a few days since, full of all the learning which belongs to the question and pregnant with a very ingenious application of that learning, seems to think that there is something in the admitted sovereignty of the States which is inconsistent with the authority of the people of the United States to amend the Constitution so as to trench at all upon the existing authority of the States. The honorable member from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury] takes another ground, and that is that, as slaves are made property by the laws of the States, that property, like every other description of property, is not the subject of government interference, except as that interference may be necessary for its protection. Now, a word or two upon each objection.

The honorable member from Kentucky is right in saying that in a certain sense the States are sovereign; but, if he means by that to say that the United States in another sense are not equally sovereign, he is mistaken. The school of which Mr. Calhoun was the head, and the antecedent school by whose teachings he professed to be governed, that which had for its head Mr. Madison, seemed to have been under the impression, and unfortunately succeeded in inculcating it upon the public mind too strongly for the peace of the country, the safety and prosperity of his own section, that the only sovereignty was that which belonged to the States. There never was a greater political heresy. The States, in the first place, were never disunited. As one they declared independence. As one they fought and conquered the independence so declared. As one, in order to make that independence fruitful of all the blessings which they anticipated from it, they made the Constitution of the United States. They met in convention, they adopted the Constitution in convention, and recommended it not to the States in the capacity of States, not to the governments of the States as governments, but to the people of the States for their adoption; and they could have submitted it in no other way. Any other mode of laying it before the country would have been inconsistent with the preamble to the instrument, which states that it is the work of the people as contradistinguished from the States. How the people were to assemble, where they were to assemble, what influences were to govern them in deciding for or against the Constitution is immaterial. When they once decided in its favor, the people of each State agreed as a people with the people of every other State that that should be the form of government. They consented in adopting the Constitution as a people that the Constitution, if adopted by the people of nine States, should be the Constitution of the people of those States in the aggregate.

So said the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland in the opinion given by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall. So said the same court in the opion given, and it was the unanimous opinion, in the case of Booth vs. The United States by the present Chief Justice. They both announced as the clear operation of the Constitution, and as a fact ever to be borne in mind in construing the Constitution of the United States, that it was the adoption of the people of the United States, and that the sovereignty of the United States to the extent of the powers conferred upon the Government of the United States, and the sovereignty conferred upon the governments of the States by the people of the States respectively, was precisely the same and no more than it would have been if they had been framed and adopted at the same time. That is to say, each State, except so far as the people as a people had gone with other people in depriving themselves of the powers with which they were antecedently clothed, had no authority, as long as that other Constitution remained, to take any step inconsistent with the powers conferred by that Constitution; or, in the language of the court, that each, within the sphere of the authority with which it was clothed, was supreme. There was no absolute sovereignty; that is to say, there was no sovereignty coextensive with the whole scope of political power belonging to the government of either; but each was invested with a portion of the sovereignty which the people might create, and each therefore within the extent of the portion allowed it was to the extent of that portion supreme.

Now a word or two in answer to the honorable member from Delaware. He says that, with reference to the Constitution of the United States, the institution of slavery is not within the amendatory clause, because, with reference to the Government of the United States, it is not a subject for political interference. Let me ask the honorable member, and he can answer it hereafter if he thinks proper, could human slavery have been abolished by the Constitution originally? I suppose no one will doubt that. Then why is it that it cannot be done now under the clause which gives to the people of the United States the authority to amend the Constitution? It can only be that it has been taken entirely out of the scope of governmental power, the scope of the political power of the people, because it was not abolished by the Constitution. Why, Mr. President, what says the preamble to the Constitution? That justice might be established; that tranquillity might be preserved; that the common defence and general welfare might be maintained; and, last and, chief of all, that liberty might be secured. Is there no justice in putting an end to human slavery? Is there no danger to the tranquillity of the country in its existence? May it not interfere with the common defence and general welfare? And, above all, is it consistent with any notion which the mind of man can conceive of human liberty? The very clause under which we seek to put an end to the institution, the amendatory clause, may have been, and in all probability was, inserted into the instrument from a conviction that the time would come when justice would call so loudly for the extinction of the institution that her call could not be disobeyed, when the peace and tranquillity of the land would demand in thunder tones the destruction of the institution as inconsistent with such peace and tranquillity; and when the sentiment of the world would become shocked with the existence of a condition of things in the only free government upon the face of the globe as far as the white man is concerned, and founded upon principles utterly inconsistent with any other form of government than a government which secures freedom.

On the following day Senator Saulsbury replied to Senator Johnson's argument based on the preamble of the Constitution. He said that a preamble to any instrument was effective in construing the meaning of the body of the instrument only when the latter was doubtful, and that the body of the Constitution was clear and plain upon the relative powers of the Federal Government and the States. But, accepting Senator Johnson's view of the bearing of the preamble of the Constitution upon the license allowed in the emendation of that instrument, he said:

That, because this Constitution was ordained "to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty," it does not follow that any such amendment as this can be made, because the instrument itself shows for whom these blessings were intended to be preserved—to us and to our posterity. What connection had the slave population of the United States with the formation of this Constitution? Did they constitute any part of "us and our posterity" in the contemplation of the framers of this instrument? Not at all. Without elaborating this idea, I submit that no just or legitimate argument can be drawn from the preamble of the Constitution that the Congress of the United States have authority to propose this amendment, or that it would become binding in consideration of the ratification of three-fourths of the States.

John P. Hale [N. H.] followed Senator Saulsbury.

Our friends who oppose this resolution die hard, very hard. I remember reading that when the British Parliament sat in judgment upon Charles I, and sentenced him to lose his head, they were apprehensive that when it came to the last, and he was actually required to bow down and put his head under the axe, he might resist, and the Commons, with great prudence and prescience, had prepared pulleys and machinery by which, if he resisted, he should actually be drawn under the axe and his head severed from his body. That is history that I think is not without its teaching in the present day. I think that the judgment has gone forth that slavery must die. The commons have passed that sentence; and I tell you, sir, that, if slavery is refractory, and does not quietly submit, the Commons will prepare pulleys by which to bring the victim under the axe.

Mr. President, permit me to say that this is a day when the nation is to commence its real life, a day when the nation is to be disembarrassed of the inconsistencies which have marked its history and its career.

Sir, what is the truth? We have had upon the pages of our public history, our public documents, and our public records some of the sublimest truths that ever fell from human lips; and there never has been in the history of the world a more striking contrast than we have presented to heaven and earth between the grandeur and the sublimity of our professions and the degradation and infamy of our practice. That day is to pass away, and to pass away, I trust, right speedily.

But I desire to say a word, in all sincerity and in all kindness, to those gentlemen who still linger here, the representatives, or rather the administrators de bonis non,[1] of what was once the old Democratic party. [Laughter.] They pretend to think—and I am not the man to stand here and say they do not believe what they pretend to believe—that it is in their power, if they had the control, to save the country and restore the Union. I am willing to concede, for the purposes of all that I have to say, that they actually believe it; that that is their faith; and I apprehend, from some things that have fallen from some gentlemen even in this neighborhood, that my honorable and venerable friend from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] is not far from entertaining similar opinions, that the Democratic party might, by some possibility, save the country and save the Union; and, what is more than all that, save themselves, too. Sir, it is a delusion, an utter delusion. Let me ask their attention for a moment or two to some considerations which induce me to believe that it is an utter delusion.

How can they do it? Patrick Henry, the great orator of the Revolution—no offence to Massachusetts [laughter]—said that he knew of no other lamp to guide his feet but the light of experience. Taking that as a maxim or as a text, let me ask what there is in the history of this Democratic party that gives countenance to the idea that by any possibility, even if they had everything their own way, they could save the country and save the Union? This rebellion, revolution, or whatever you please to call it—I believe it has been judicially decided that we are not at war—commenced under James Buchanan, a Democratic President. They had a Democratic Senate, a Democratic House of Representatives, a super-Democratic Supreme Court of the United States, and a large majority of all the officers of every organization, moral and physical, in the country, including the army and navy and ministers. They could not keep the peace with all that. They lost it. Nay, more than that, they had a little love feast of their own down at Charleston; there was no Abolitionist, no Federalist there to vex and plague them; and they could not keep family peace. They could not keep national peace, and they could not keep family peace, but split, broke, went asunder, every man his own way, and the present is the result of it.

How are they going to do any better now than they did then? They lost eleven States at one slide that they had then. They are all gone; and I say it with great respect and great kindness to them they have lost, besides, pretty nearly every respectable man they had in the free States that gave character and stability to their party. I need not go out of the Senate chamber to prove that. Well, sir, they have lost all that; and now, in the days of their dissolution and weakness, when their preaching here sounds in one respect something similar to that of John the Baptist—"the voice of one crying in the wilderness" [laughter]; for there is only here and there one of them—they are still impressed with that insane delusion that if they had the power they could save the country and save the Union and save themselves.

It is said to be a hard thing for an individual to find out when his mental faculties begin to fail him. It is not difficult for him to find out when his physical strength fails him, but it is very rare that a man finds out when his mental vigor begins to fail him. I suppose what is true of individuals is true of parties and of collections of men. But let me ask my friends, do they not feel in their own experience that the day of the strength of the Democracy has departed, that it has gone or is going? It seems to me that they must. I appeal, then, to all who hear me, is it not the part of wisdom to submit to what is inevitable? Charles I did not compel the Commons to put the pulleys on to haul him under the axe; but when he found the axe was up and that the Commons had decreed that his head should go under it and the axe should come down, like a sensible and well-bred gentleman as he was, he put his head under.

Mr. President, what is to be cannot be avoided; and if there is any one thing which, it seems to me, the indications from every side everywhere teach us, it is that the day of this power is over; and there is no indication more conclusive of it than the Christian and statesmanlike effort made by the honorable Senator from Maryland yesterday. I ask everybody who hears me, do you not rejoice that the day has come? Are you not glad that this nation, blind and deaf so long to the teachings of history and the commands of God, has at length aroused itself from its lethargy, listened to the voices which heaven and earth, God and nature, are proclaiming, and is preparing to put itself in alliance with the Power which cannot be resisted and whose fiat will most surely be executed.

Whenever, unconditionally and without equivocation, we come up to the mark and place ourselves on the high standard of Christian duty, and resolve that, despite of all extraneous circumstances, of all doubtful contingencies, of all questions of expediency, we will place ourselves firmly upon the everlasting rock of duty and our action shall be in accordance with our conscientious convictions, then, and not till then, will that pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night which led the chosen people from the house of bondage to the land of promise be ours. Then we shall indeed and in truth be worthy of our genealogy and our history. Then the sublime teachings of the Pilgrim Fathers, who left everything behind them that they might come hither and plant in this wilderness a temple of liberty and throw wide open its doors for the oppressed of earth to enter and be at rest—then will all that be realized. Then without shame, without reproach, and without apology, we can stand in this nineteenth century, soldiers of the new civilization and of an old Christianity, going forth to battle with every impulse of our hearts and every purpose that we entertain in full accordance with the best wishes and hopes of the good on earth and of the God in heaven; when we take this position and take it firmly and ably, then and not until then shall we triumph; then and not till then shall we see the beginning of the end.

Mr. President, let me say one word more. When the Savior of man, with the sympathy and pathos with which He loved the chief city of His native land, wept over Jerusalem His lamentation was, "If thou hadst known in this thy day the things that belong to thy peace!" Sir, that is what this nation ought to know; that is what the nation ought to understand. It is what I believe; and by a vigorous prosecution of this measure we shall evidence to heaven and earth that we do understand and mean to perform the things which belong to our nation's peace.

On April 8 Charles Sumner [Mass.] closed the debate in a long and brilliant speech in favor of the amendment.

Under the influences of the present struggle for national life, and in obedience to its incessant exigencies, the people have already changed, and in nothing so much as slavery. Old opinions and prejudices have dissolved, and that traditional foothold which slavery once possessed has been gradually weakened until now it scarcely exists. Naturally this change must sooner or later show itself in the interpretation of the Constitution. But it is already visible even there, in the concession of powers over slavery which were formerly denied. The time, then, has come when the Constitution, which has been so long interpreted for slavery, may be interpreted for freedom. This is one stage of triumph. Universal emancipation, which is at hand, can be won only by complete emancipation of the Constitution itself, which has been degraded to wear chains so long that its real character is scarcely known.

Sometimes the concession is made on the ground of military necessity. The capacious war powers of the Constitution are invoked, and it is said that in their legitimate exercise slavery may be destroyed. There is much in this concession; more even than is imagined by many from whom it proceeds. It is war, say they, which puts these powers in motion; but they forget that wherever slavery exists there is perpetual war—that slavery itself is a state of war between two races, where one is for the moment victor—pictured accurately by Jefferson when he described it as "permitting one-half of the citizens to trample on the rights of the other, transforming those into enemies and these into despots." Therefore, wherever slavery exists, even in seeming peace, the war power may be invoked to put an end to a condition which is internecine, and to overthrow pretensions which are hostile to every attribute of the Almighty.

But it is not on military necessity alone that the concession is made. There are many who, as they read the Constitution now, see its powers over slavery more clearly than before. The old superstition is abandoned; and they join with Patrick Henry when, in the Virginia convention, he declared that the power of manumission was given to Congress, (1) in the "general welfare" clause. He did not hesitate to argue against the adoption of the Constitution because it gave this power. And shall we be less perspicacious for freedom than this Virginia statesman was for slavery? Discerning this power, he confessed his dismay; but let us confess our joy.

2. Next comes the clause, "Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy." A power like this is from its very nature unlimited. In raising and supporting an army, in providing and maintaining a navy, Congress is not restrained to any particular class or color. It may call upon all and authorize that contract which the Government makes with an enlisted soldier. But such a contract would be in itself an act of manumission; for a slave cannot make a contract. And if the contract be followed by actual service, who can deny its completest efficacy in enfranchising the soldier-slave and his whole family? Shakespeare, immortal teacher, gives expression to an instinctive sentiment when he makes Henry V, on the eve of the battle of Agincourt, encourage his men by promising,

> "For he to-day that sheds his blood with me
> Shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile
> This day shall gentle his condition."

3. There is still another clause: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." But the question recurs, What is a republican form of government? John Adams, in the correspondence of his old age, says:

> "The customary meanings of the words republic and commonwealth have been infinite. They have been applied to every government under heaven; that of Turkey and that of Spain, as well as that of Athens and of Rome, of Geneva and San Marino."—John Adams's Works, Vol. 10, p. 378.

But the guaranty of a republican form of government must have a meaning congenial with the purposes of the Constitution. Evidently it must be construed so as to uphold the Constitution according to all the promises of its preamble, and Mr. Madison has left a record showing that this clause was originally suggested in part by the fear of slavery. But no American need be at a loss to designate some of the distinctive elements of a republic according to the idea of American institutions. These will be found first in the Declaration of Independence, by which it is solemnly announced "that all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." And they will be found, secondly, in that other guaranty and prohibition of the Constitution, in harmony with the Declaration of Independence; "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Such are some of the essential elements of a "republican form of government," which cannot be disowned by us without disowning the very muniments of our liberties; and it is these which the United States are bound to guarantee. But all these make slavery impossible. It is idle to say that this result was not anticipated. It would be, then, only another illustration that our fathers "builded wiser than they knew."

4. But, independent of the clause of guaranty, there is the clause just quoted, which in itself is a source of power; "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This was a part of the amendments to the Constitution proposed by the first Congress, under the popular demand for a Bill of Rights. Brief as it is, it is in itself alone a whole Bill of Rights. Liberty can be lost only by "due process of law," words borrowed from the old liberty-loving common law.

Such is the protection which is thrown by the Constitution over every "person," without distinction of race or color, class or condition. There can be no doubt about the universality of this protection. Its natural meaning is plain; but there is an incident of history which makes it plainer still, excluding all possibility of misconception. A clause of this character was originally recommended as an amendment by two slave States —North Carolina and Virginia—but it was restrained by them to freemen, thus: "No freeman ought to be deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the law of the land." But when the recommendation came before Congress the word "person" was substituted for "freeman," and the more searching phrase, "due process of law," was substituted for "the law of the land." In making this change, rejecting the recommendation of two slave States, the authors of this amendment revealed their purpose, that no person wearing the human form should be deprived of liberty without due process of law; and the proposition was adopted by the votes of Congress and then of the States as a part of the Constitution. Clearly on its face it is an express guaranty of personal liberty and an express prohibition against its invasion anywhere.

In the face of this guaranty and prohibition—for it is both —how can any "person" be held as a slave? But it is sometimes said that this provision must be restrained to places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Government. Let me say frankly that such formerly was my own impression, often avowed in this Chamber; but I never doubted its complete efficacy to render slavery unconstitutional in all such places, so that "no person" could be held as a slave at the national capital or in any national territory. Constitutionally slavery has always been an outlaw wherever that provision of the Constitution was applicable. Nobody doubted that it was binding on the national courts, and yet it was left unexecuted—a dead letter, killed by the predominant influence of slavery, until at last Congress was obliged by legislative act to do what the courts had failed to do, and to put an end to slavery in the national capital and national Territories.

But there are no words in this guaranty and prohibition by which they are restrained to any exclusive jurisdiction. They are broad and general as the Constitution itself; and since they are in support of human rights they cannot be restrained by any interpretation. There is no limitation in them, and nobody now can supply any such limitation without encountering the venerable maxim of law, Impius ac crudelis qui libertati non favet—"Impious and cruel is he who does not favor liberty." Long enough courts and Congress have merited this condemnation. The time has come when they should merit it no longer. The Constitution should become a living letter under the predominant influence of freedom. It is this conviction which has brought petitioners to Congress, during the present session, asking that the Constitution shall be simply executed against slavery and not altered. Ah! sir, it would be a glad sight to see that Constitution, which we have all sworn to support, interpreted generously, nobly, gloriously for freedom, so that everywhere within its influence the chains should drop from the slave. If it be said that this was not anticipated at the adoption of the Constitution, I remind you of the words of Patrick Henry at the time when he said, "the paper speaks to the point." No doubt. It does speak to the point. Cicero preferred to err with Plato rather than to think right with other men. And pardon me if, on this occasion, when my country is in peril from slavery, and when human rights are to be rescued, I prefer to err with Patrick Henry, the contemporary of the Constitution, rather than to think right with Senators who hesitate against slavery.

But all these provisions are something more than powers; they are duties also. And yet we are constantly and painfully reminded in this Chamber that pending measures against slavery are unconstitutional. Sir, this is an immense mistake. Nothing against slavery can be unconstitutional. It is only hesitation which is unconstitutional.

And yet slavery still exists—in defiance of all these requirements of the Constitution; nay, more, in defiance of reason and justice, which can never be disobeyed with impunity—it exists, the perpetual spoiler of human rights and disturber of the public peace, degrading master as well as slave, corrupting society, weakening government, impoverishing the very soil itself, and impairing the natural resources of the country. Such an outrage, so offensive in every respect, not only to the Constitution, but also to the whole system of order by which the universe is governed, is plainly a national nuisance, which, for the general welfare and in the name of justice, ought to be abated. But at this moment, when it menaces the national life, it will not be enough to treat slavery merely as a nuisance; for it is much more. It is a public enemy and traitor wherever it shows itself, to be subdued, in the discharge of solemn guaranties of Government and of personal rights, and in the exercise of unquestionable and indefeasible rights of self-defence. All now admit that in the rebel States it is a public enemy and traitor, so that the rebellion may be seen in slavery, and slavery may be seen in the rebellion. But slavery throughout the country, everywhere within the national limits, is a living unit, one and indivisible—so that even outside the rebel States it is the same public enemy and traitor, lending succor to the rebellion, and holding out "blue lights" to encourage and direct its operations. But whether regarded as national nuisance or as public enemy and traitor, it is obnoxious to the same judgment, and must be abolished.

If, in abolishing slavery, any injury were done to the just interests of any human being or to any rights of any kind, there might be something "to give us pause," even against these irresistible requirements. But nothing of the kind can ensue. No just interests and no rights can suffer. It is the rare felicity of such an act, as well outside as inside the rebel States, that, while striking a blow at the rebellion, and assuring future tranquillity, so that the Republic shall no longer be a house divided against itself, it will add at once to the value of the whole fee simple wherever slavery exists, will secure individual rights, and will advance civilization itself.

There is another motive to abolish slavery at this time. Embattled armies now stand face to face, on the one side fighting for slavery. The gauntlet that has been flung down we have yet taken up only in part. In abolishing slavery entirely we take up the gauntlet entirely. Then can we look with confidence to the blessings of Almighty God upon our arms. So long as we sustain slavery, so long as we hesitate to strike at it, the heavy battalions of our armies will fail in power. Sir Giles Overreach[1] found his sword, as he attempted to draw it, "glued with orphans' tears." Let not our soldiers find their swords "glued" with the tears of the slave.

There is one question and only one which rises in our path; and this only because the national representatives have so long been drugged and drenched with slavery, which they have taken in all forms, whether of dose or douche, that, like a long-suffering patient, they are not yet emancipated from its influence. I refer, of course, to the question of compensation under the shameful assumption that there can be property in man. Sir, there was a moment when I was willing to pay money largely, or at least to any reasonable amount, for emancipation; but it was as ransom, and never as compensation. Thank God! that time has now passed, never to return; and simply because money is no longer needed for the purpose. Our fathers under Washington never paid the Algerines for the emancipation of our enslaved fellow citizens, except as ransom, and they ceased all such tribute when emancipation could be had without it. Such must be our rule now. Any other rule would be to impoverish the treasury for nothing. The time has come for the old tocsin to sound, "Millions for defence, not a cent for tribute." Ay, sir; millions of dollars—with millions of strong arms also—to defend our country against slave-masters; but not a cent for tribute to slave-masters.

But if money is to be paid as compensation, clearly it cannot go to the master who for generations has robbed the slave of his toil and all its fruits, so that, in justice, he may be regarded now as the trustee of accumulated earnings with interest which he has never paid over. Any money paid as compensation must belong, every dollar of it, to the slave. If the case were audited in Heaven's chancery, there must be another allowance for the denial of inestimable rights. The loss of wages may be estimated, but where is the tariff or price-current by which those other losses which have been the lot of every slave shall be determined? Mortal arithmetic is impotent to assess the fearful sum total. In presence of this infinite responsibility the whole question must be referred to that other tribunal where master and slave will be equal, while infinite wisdom tempers justice with mercy.

But the proposition of compensation is founded on the intolerable assumption of property in man, an idea which often intrudes into these debates, sometimes from its open vindicators and sometimes from others who reluctantly recognize it, but allow it to influence their conduct which is thus "sicklied o'er" with slavery. Sir, parliamentary law must be observed; but if an outburst of indignant hisses were ever justifiable in a parliamentary assembly it ought to break forth at every mention of this proposition, whatever form it may take—whether of daring assumption or the mildest suggestion, or equivocation even. Impious toward God and insulting toward man, it is disowned alike by the conscience and the reason; nor is there any softness of phrase or argument by which its essential wickedness can be disguised. The fool hath said in his heart that there is no God; but it is kindred folly to say that there is no man. The first is atheism, and the second is like unto the first.

Again, we are brought by learned Senators to the Constitution, which requires that there shall be "just compensation" where "private property" is taken for public use. But plainly on the present occasion the requirement of the Constitution is absolutely inapplicable, for there is no "private property" to take. Slavery is but a bundle of barbarous pretensions, from which certain persons are to be released. At what price shall these pretensions be estimated? How much shall be paid for the controlling pretension of property in man? How much shall be allowed for that other pretension to shut the gates of knowledge and keep the victim from the book of life? How much shall be expended to redeem the pretension to rob a human being of all the fruits of his toil? And, sir, what "just compensation" shall be voted for the renunciation of that Heaven-defying pretension, too disgusting to picture in its details, which despoils the slave of wife and child, and hands them over to lust or avarice? Let these pretensions be renounced, and slavery ceases to exist; but there can be no "just compensation" for any such renunciation. The human heart, reason, religion, the Constitution itself, rise in judgment against it. As well vote "just compensation" to the hardened offender who renounces his disobedience to the Ten Commandments and promises that he will cease to steal, that he will cease to commit adultery, and that he will cease to covet his neighbor's wife. Ay, sir, there is nothing in the Constitution to sanction any such outrage. Such an appropriation would be unconstitutional.

Putting aside, then, all objections that have been interposed, whether proceeding from open opposition or from lukewarm support, the great question recurs, that question which dominates this whole debate, How shall slavery be overthrown? The answer is threefold: first, by the courts, declaring and applying the true principles of the Constitution; secondly, by Congress, in the exercise of the powers which belong to it; and, thirdly, by the people, through an amendment to the Constitution. Courts, Congress, people, all may be invoked, and the occasion will justify the appeal.

1. Let the appeal be made to the courts. But, alas! one of the saddest chapters in our history has been the conduct of judges who have lent themselves to the support of slavery. Injunctions of the Constitution, guaranties of personal liberty, and prohibitions against its invasion have all been forgotten. Courts which should have been asylums of liberty have been changed into barracoons, and the Supreme Court of the United States, by a final decision of surpassing infamy, became the greatest barracoon of all. It has been part of the calamity of the times that, under the influence of slavery, justice, like Astræa of old, had fled. But now at last, in a regenerated Republic, with the power of slavery waning, and the people rising in judgment against it, let us hope that the judgments of courts may be reconsidered, and that the powers of the Constitution in behalf of liberty may be fully exercised, so that the blessed condition shall be fulfilled when > "Ancient frauds shall fail, > Returning justice lift aloft her scale."

Sir, no court can afford to do an act of wrong. Its business is justice; and when under any apology it ceases to do justice it loses those titles to reverence which otherwise are so willingly bestowed. There are instances of great magistrates who have openly declared their disobedience to laws "against common right and reason," and their names are mentioned with gratitude in the history of jurisprudence. There are other instances of men holding the balance and the sword, whose names have been gathered into a volume, as "atrocious judges." If our judges, who have cruelly interpreted the Constitution in favor of slavery, do not come into the latter class, they clearly can claim no place among those others who have stood for justice like the rock on which the sea breaks in idle spray. Doubtless the model decision of the American bench, destined to be quoted hereafter with the most honor, because the boldest in its conformity with the great principles of humanity and social order, was that of the Vermont judge who refused to surrender a fugitive slave until his pretended master should show a title deed from the Almighty.

But the courts have no longer any occasion for such boldness. They need not step outside the Constitution. It is only needed that they should follow just principles in its interpretation. Let them be guided by a teacher like Edmund Burke, who spoke as follows:

"Men cannot covenant themselves out of their rights and their duties; nor by any other means can arbitrary power be conveyed to any man. Those who give to others such rights perform acts that are void as they are given." . . . "Those who give and those who receive arbitrary power are alike criminal, and there is no man but is bound to resist it to the best of his power, wherever it shall show its face in the world. It is a crime to bear it where it can be rationally shaken off."—Speech on Impeachment of Warren Hastings.

Or let them be guided by that other teacher, Lord Chatham, when he said:

"With respect to the decisions of the courts of justice I am far from denying their due weight and authority; yet, placing them in the most respectable view, I will consider them, not as law, but as an evidence of the law; and, before they can arrive even at that degree of authority, it must appear that they are founded in, and confirmed by, reason; that they are supported by precedents, taken from good and moderate times; that they do not contradict any positive law; that they are submitted to without reluctance by the people; that they are unquestioned by the legislature (which is equivalent to a tacit confirmation); and, what in my judgment is by far the most important, that they do not violate the spirit of the constitution."—Speech of Lord Chatham in 1770, with regard to the proceeding on the Middlesex election.

If courts were thus inspired, it is easy to see that slavery would disappear under their righteous judgments.

2. But unhappily the courts will not perform the duty of the hour, and we must look elsewhere. An appeal must be made to Congress; and here, as has been fully developed, the powers are ample, unless in their interpretation you surrender in advance to slavery. By a single brief statute Congress may sweep slavery out of existence.

But, even if Congress be not prepared for that single decisive measure which shall promptly put an end to this whole question and strike slavery to death, there are other measures by which this end may be hastened. The towering Upas may be girdled, even if it may not be felled at once to the earth.

The Fugitive Slave bill, conceived in iniquity and imposed upon the North as a badge of subjugation, may be repealed.

The coastwise slave trade may be deprived of all support in the statute book.

The traffic in human beings, as an article of "commerce among States," may be extirpated.

And, above all, that odious rule of evidence, so injurious to justice and discreditable to the country, excluding the testimony of colored persons in national courts, may be abolished.

Let these things be done. In themselves they will be much. But they will be more as the assurance of the overthrow sure to follow.

3. But all these will not be enough. The people must be summoned to confirm the whole work. It is for them to put the cap-stone upon the sublime structure. An amendment of the Constitution may do what courts and Congress decline to do, or, even should they act, it may cover their action with its panoply. Such an amendment in any event will give completeness and permanence to emancipation, and bring the Constitution into avowed harmony with the Declaration of Independence. Happy day, long wished for, destined to gladden those beatified spirits who have labored on earth to this end, but died without the sight.

The founder of political science in modern times, writer as well as statesman, Machiavelli, in his most instructive work, the "Discourses on Livy," has a chapter entitled, "To have long life in a republic, it is necessary to draw it back often to its origin"; and in the chapter he shows how the original virtue in which a republic was founded becomes so far corrupted that, in the process of time, the body-politic must be destroyed; as in the case of the natural body, where, according to the doctors of medicine, there is something added daily which perpetually requires cure. He teaches under this head that republics are brought back to their origin, and the principles in which they were founded, by pressure without or prudence within, and he affirms that the destruction of Rome by the Gauls was necessary that the republic might have a new birth, and thus acquire new life and new virtue, all of which ensued when the barbarians had been driven back. The illustration, perhaps, is fanciful, but there is wisdom in the counsel, and now the time has come for its application. The Gauls are upon us, not, however, from a distance, but domestic Gauls; and we, too, may profit by the occasion to secure for the Republic a new birth, that it may acquire a new life and new virtue. Happily, in our case the way is easy, for it is only necessary to carry the Republic back to its baptismal vows, and the declared sentiments of its origin. There is the Declaration of Independence: let its solemn promises be redeemed. There is the Constitution: let it speak, according to the promises of the Declaration.

The amendment to the Constitution was passed by a vote of 38 to 6 (more than the two-thirds required), the negative votes being cast by Lazarus W. Powell and Garrett Davis, of Kentucky; Willard Saulsbury and George R. Riddle, of Delaware; James A. McDougall, of California, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana.

Upon announcement of the vote Senator Saulsbury rose in his seat "simply to say" that he now "bade farewell to any hope of the reconstruction of the American Union."

Senator McDougall objected to the decision of the Vice-President that the resolution had passed, saying that a two-thirds majority of a full Senate, counting two votes from each of the seceded States, was in his opinion necessary to pass a measure in which all the States were vitally concerned under the Constitution. The chair overruled the objection, and Senator McDougall did not contest the overruling.

The Senate resolution came before the House on May 31, and a motion to reject it was voted down by 55 yeas to 76 nays. It was thoroughly debated (the arguments being largely repetitions of those in the Senate) until June 15, when it was put to the vote, with the result of 93 yeas and 65 nays, 23 Representatives not voting. The measure thus failed of passage, not receiving the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution. It was not brought forward again during this session.

The subject was brought forward at the next session and, after considerable debate in which few new arguments were presented, a joint resolution submitting the amendment to the States for ratification was passed by Congress on January 31, 1865, and approved by the President on February 1. Upon ratification by the requisite three-fourths majority of the States it went into effect by proclamation on December 18, 1865.

INTRODUCTION

The Constitutional Results of Reconstruction[1]

THE first practical result of reconstruction under the acts of 1867 was the disfranchisement, for several weary years, of the better whites, and the consequent giving over of the Southern governments into the hands of the negroes. And yet not into their hands, after all. They were but children still; and unscrupulous men, "carpetbaggers,"—men not come to be citizens, but come upon an expedition of profit, come to make the name of Republican forever hateful in the South—came out of the North to use the negroes as tools for their own selfish ends; and succeeded to the utmost fulfillment of their dreams. Negro majorities for a little while filled the Southern legislatures, but they won no power or profit for themselves beyond a pittance here and there for a bribe. Their leaders, strangers and adventurers, got the lucrative offices, the handling of the State moneys raised by loan, and of the taxes spent no one knew how. Here and there an able and upright man cleansed administration, checked corruption, served them as a real friend and an honest leader; but not for long. The negroes were exalted; the States were misgoverned and looted in their name; and a few men, not of their number, not really of their interest, went away with the overwhelmed. It was that which gave an epic breadth and majesty to the awful clash between bodies of men who were in all things else of one strain and breeding; it was that which brought the bitterness of death upon the side which lost, and the dangerous intoxication of an absolute triumph upon the side which won. But it unmistakably uncovered the foundations of force upon which the Union rested.

It did more. The sentiment of union and nationality, never before aroused to full consciousness or knowledge of its own thought and aspirations, was henceforth a new thing, aggressive and aware of a sort of conquest. It had seen its legions and felt its might in the field. It saw the very Constitution, for whose maintenance and defence it had acquired the discipline of arms, itself subordinated for a time to the practical emergencies of war, in order that the triumph might be the more unimpeded and complete; and it naturally deemed nationality henceforth a thing above law. As much as possible—so far as could be without serious embarrassment—the forms of the fundamental law had indeed been respected and observed; but wherever the law clogged or did not suffice, it had been laid aside and ignored. It was so much the easier, therefore, to heed its restrictions lightly when the war was over and it became necessary to force the Southern States to accept the new model. The real revolution was not so much in the form as in the spirit of affairs. The spirit and temper and method of a Federal Union had given place, now that all the spaces of the air had been swept and changed by the merciless winds of war, to a spirit which was consciously national and of a new age.

It was this spirit which brushed theories and technicalities aside and impressed its touch of revolution on the law itself. And not only upon the law, but also upon the processes of lawmaking and upon the relative positions of the President and Congress in the general constitutional scheme of the government, seeming to change its very administrative structure. While the war lasted the President had been master. The war ended and Mr. Lincoln gone, Congress pushed its gains. They were left to carry the discredit and reap the consequences of ruin when at last the whites who were real citizens got control again.

But we are here less concerned with that dark chapter of history than with the far-reaching constitutional and political influences and results of reconstruction. That it was a revolutionary process is written upon its face throughout; but how deep did the revolution go? What permanent marks has it left upon the great structure of government, federal, republican, a partnership of equal States and yet a solidly coherent national power which the Fathers erected?

First of all, it is clear to everyone who looks straight upon the facts, every veil of theory withdrawn and the naked body of affairs uncovered to meet the direct question of the eye, that civil war discovered the foundations of our government to be in fact unwritten, set deep in a sentiment which constitutions can neither originate nor limit. The law of the Constitution reigned until war came. Then the stage was cleared and the forces of a mighty sentiment, hitherto unorganized, deployed upon it. A thing had happened for which the Constitution had made no provision. In the Constitution were written the rules by which the associated States should live in concert and union, with no word added touching days of discord or disruption; nothing about the use of force to keep or to break the authority ordained in its quiet sentences, written, it would seem, for lawyers, not for soldiers. When the war came, therefore, and questions were broached to which it gave no answer, the ultimate foundation of the structure was laid bare: physical force, sustained by the stern loves and rooted predilections of masses of men, the strong ingrained prejudices which are the fiber of every system of government. What gave the war its passion, its hot energy as of a tragedy from end to end, was that in it sentiment met sentiment, conviction conviction. It was the sentiment, not of all, but of the efficient majority, the conviction of the major part, that won. A minority, eager and absolute in another conviction, devoted to the utmost pitch of self-sacrifice to an opposite and incompatible ideal, was crushed and way to the front and began to transmute fact into law, law into fact. In some matters it treated all the States alike. The Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth amendments bound all the States at once, North and West as well as South. But that was, after all, a mere equality of form. The amendments were aimed, of course, at the States which had had slaves and had attempted secession, and did not materially affect any others. The votes which incorporated them in the Constitution were voluntary on the part of the States whose institutions they did not affect, involuntary on the part of the States whose institutions they revolutionized. These States were then under military rule. Congress had declared their whole political organization to be illegal; had excluded their representatives from their seats in the Houses; and yet demanded that they assent, as States, to the amendment of the Constitution as a condition precedent to their reinstatement in the Union! No anomaly or contradiction of lawyers' terms was suffered to stand in the way of the supremacy of the lawmaking branch of the general government. The Constitution knew no such process as this of reconstruction, and could furnish no rules for it. Two years and a half before the Fifteenth Amendment was adopted by Congress, three years and a half before it was put in force by its adoption by the States, Congress had by mere act forced the Southern States, by the hands of military governors, to put the negroes upon the roll of their voters. It had dictated to them a radical revision of their constitutions, whose items should be framed to meet the views of the Houses rather than the views of their own electors. It had pulled about and rearranged what local institutions it saw fit, and then had obliged the communities affected to accept its alterations as the price of their reinstatement as self-governing bodies politic within the Union.

It may be that much, if not all, of this would have been inevitable under any leadership, the temper of the times and the posture of affairs being what they were; and it is certain that it was inevitable under the actual circumstances of leadership then existing at Washington. But to assess that matter is to reckon with causes.

For the moment we are concerned only with consequences, and are neither justifying nor condemning, but only comprehending. The courts of the United States have held that the Southern States never were out of the Union; and yet they have justified the action of Congress throughout the process of reconstruction, on the ground that it was no more than a proper performance by Congress of a legal duty under the clause of the Constitution which guarantees to every State a republican form of government. It was making the Southern governments republican by securing full standing and legislative representation as citizens for the negroes. But Congress went beyond that. It not only dictated to the States it was reconstructing what their suffrage should be, it also required that they should never afterward narrow that suffrage. It required of Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi that they should accord to the negroes not only the right to vote but also the right to hold political office; and that they should grant to all their citizens equal school privileges and never afterward abridge them. So far as the right to vote was concerned, the Fifteenth Amendment subsequently imposed the same disability with regard to withholding the suffrage upon all the States alike; but the Southern States were also forbidden by mere Federal statute to restrict it on any other ground; and in the cases of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas Congress assumed the right, which the Constitution nowhere accorded it, to regulate admission to political office and the privileges of public education.

South Carolina and Mississippi, Louisiana and North Carolina have since changed the basis of their suffrage, notwithstanding; Virginia and Mississippi and Texas might now, no doubt, reorganize their educational system as they pleased without endangering their status in the Union or even meeting rebuke at the hands of the Federal courts. The temper of the times has changed; the Federal structure has settled to a normal balance of parts and functions again; and all the States are in fact unfettered except by the terms of the Constitution itself. It is marvelous what healing and oblivion peace has wrought, how the traces of reconstruction have worn away. But a certain deep effect abides. It is within, not upon the surface. It is of the spirit, not of the body. A revolution was carried through when war was done which may be better comprehended if likened to England's subtle making over, that memorable year 1688. Though she punctiliously kept to the forms of her law, England then dismissed a king, almost as, in later years, she would have dismissed a minister, though she preserved the procedure of her constitution intact. She in fact gave a final touch of change to its spirit. She struck irresponsible power away and made her government once for all a constitutional government. The change had been insensibly a-making for many a long age; but now it was accomplished consciously and at a stroke. Her constitution, finished, was not what it had been until this last stroke was given—when silent forces had at last found sudden voice, and the culminating change was deliberately made.

Nearly the same can be said of the effect of the war and of the reconstruction of the Southern States upon our own government. It was a revolution of consciousness—of mind and purpose. A government which had been in its spirit federal became, almost of a sudden, national in temper and point of view. The national spirit had long been a-making. Many a silent force which grew quite unobserved from generation to generation in pervasiveness and might, in quiet times of wholesome peace and mere increase of nature, had been breeding these thoughts which now sprang so vividly into consciousness. The very growth of the nation, the very lapse of time and uninterrupted habit of united action, the mere mixture and movement and distribution of populations, the mere accretions of policy, the mere consolidation of interests, had been building and strengthening new tissue of nationality the years through, and drawing links stronger than links of steel round about the invisible body of common thought and purpose which is the substance of nations. When the great crisis of secession came, men knew at once how their spirits were ruled, men of the South as well as men of the North—in what institutions and conceptions of government their blood was fixed to run; and a great and instant readjustment took place, which was for the South, the minority, practically the readjustment of conquest and fundamental reconstruction, but which was for the North, the region which had been transformed, nothing more than an awakening.

It cannot be said that the forms of the Constitution were observed in this quick change as the forms of the English constitution had been observed when the Stuarts were finally shown the door. There were no forms for such a business. For several years, therefore, Congress was permitted to do by statute what, under the long-practiced conceptions of our Federal law, could properly be done only by constitutional amendment. The necessity for that gone by, it was suffered to embody what it had already enacted and put into force as law into the Constitution, not by the free will of the country at large, but by the compulsions of mere force exercised upon a minority whose assent was necessary to the formal completion of its policy. The result restored, practically entire, the forms of the Constitution; but not before new methods and irregular, the methods of majorities but not the methods of law, had been openly learned and practiced and learned in a way not likely to be forgot. Changes of law in the end gave authentic body to many of the most significant changes of thought which had come, with its new consciousness, to the nation. A citizenship of the United States was created; additional private civil rights were taken within the jurisdiction of the general Government; additional prohibitions were put upon the States; the suffrage was in a measure made subject to national regulation. But the real change was the change of air—a change of conception with regard to the power of Congress, the guiding and compulsive efficacy of national legislation, the relation of the life of the land to the supremacy of the national law-making body. All policy thenceforth wore a different aspect.

We realize it now, in the presence of novel enterprises, at the threshold of an unlooked-for future. It is evident that empire is an affair of strong government and not of the nice and somewhat artificial poise or of the delicate compromises of structure and authority characteristic of a mere federal partnership. Undoubtedly the impulse of expansion is the natural and wholesome impulse which comes with a consciousness of matured strength; but it is also a direct result of that national spirit which the war between the States cried so wide awake, and to which the process of reconstruction gave the subtle assurance of practically unimpeded sway and a free choice of means. The revolution lies there, as natural as it was remarkable and full of prophecy. It is this which makes the whole period of reconstruction so peculiarly worthy of our study. Every step of the policy, every feature of the time, which wrought this subtle transformation, should receive our careful scrutiny. We are now far enough removed from the time to make that scrutiny both close and dispassionate. A new age gives it a new significance.

CHAPTER I

Naturalization

Naturalization Law of 1790—New Law of 1794; Debate On It in the House: in Favor of Stringent Requirements, Theodore Sedgwick [Mass.], William Vans Murray [Md.]; Opposed, John Page [Va.], James Madison [Va.], John Nicholas [Va.], Samuel Dexter [Mass.], Abraham Baldwin [Ga.]: in Favor of Renunciation of Titles of Nobility, William B. Giles [Va.], Mr. Madison, Mr. Page; Opposed, William L. Smith [S. C.], Mr. Dexter, Richard Bland Lee [Va.], Fisher Ames [Mass.], Mr. Murray: in Favor of Ten Years' Residence, Samuel Smith [Md.]; in Favor of Five Years, Mr. Baldwin, Thomas Fitzsimons [Pa.].

THE chief problems after the assurance of the triumph of Union arms in the Civil War were the civil rights of the negro and the reconstruction of the governments of the seceded States in such a manner as to protect him in these rights. Before introducing the debates on this question it will be necessary to revert to earlier ones connected with the general subject of citizenship and its special phases, such as Naturalization, Rights of Aliens, etc.

In 1790 the first Congress established a uniform rule of naturalization, by which aliens, being free white persons who should have resided two years in the United States, might be admitted as citizens thereof under certain regulations and restrictions.

In his address at the opening of Congress, on November 18, 1794, President Washington spoke of the need of "affectionate vigilance" on the part of native Americans "over that precious depository of American happiness, the Constitution," especially as an example to "those who from every clime are daily seeking a dwelling in our land."

This allusion was occasioned by the great influx of by the laws. He hoped that good schools would soon be spread over all the States, and, hence, that good sense and virtue will be so generally diffused among us that emigrants will be unable to corrupt our manners. Even at present, he relied so much on the virtue and discernment of his fellow citizens, the power of the law, and the energy of Government as to apprehend no danger from emigration in the United States.

Mr. Sedgwick.—America, if her political institutions should, on experience, be found to be wisely adjusted, and she shall improve her natural advantages, had opened to her view a more rich and glorious prospect than ever was presented to man. She had chosen for herself a government which left to the citizen as great a portion of freedom as was consistent with a social compact. All believed the preservation of this government, in its purity, indispensable to the continuance of our happiness. The foundation on which it rested was general intelligence and public virtue; in other words, wisdom to discern, and patriotism to pursue, the general good. He had pride in believing his countrymen more wise and virtuous than any other people on earth; hence he believed them better qualified to administer and support a Republican government. This character of Americans was the result of early education, aided, indeed, by the discipline of the Revolution. In that part of the country with which he was best acquainted, the education, manners, habits, and institutions, religious and civil, were republican. The community was divided into corporations, in many respects resembling independent republics, of which almost every man, the qualifications were so small, was a member. They had many important and interesting concerns to transact. They appointed their executive officers, enacted by-laws, raised money for many purposes of use and ornament. Here, then, the citizens early acquired the habits of temperate discussion, patient reasoning, and a capacity of enduring contradiction. Here the means of education and instruction are instituted and maintained; public libraries are purchased and read; these are the proper schools for the education of republican citizens; thus are to be planted the seeds of republicanism. If you will cultivate the plants which are to be reared from these seeds you will gather an abundant harvest of long-continued prosperity.

Much information might be obtained by the experience of others if, in despite of it, we were not determined to be guided only by a visionary theory. Behold the ancient republics of Greece and Rome; see with what jealousy they guarded the rights of citizenship against adulteration by foreign mixture.

immigrants from the war-racked countries of Europe. Upon what terms to admit them became a pressing matter with Congress, and early in the session a bill was presented in the House of Representatives to establish a more stringent rule of naturalization than that of 1790. Its provisions were substantially those which prevail to-day. It was debated off and on, from December 22, 1784, until January 8, 1795, when it was passed and sent to the Senate, where certain amendments were proposed, which were accepted by the House on January 26, 1795. In the debate in the House general principles of citizenship were presented which are of interest to-day, as well as certain principles applicable to the conditions of the time, which strikingly present the temper of our early statesmen. In the debate on general principles John Page [Va.], James Madison [Vt.], John Nicholas [Vt.], Samuel Dexter [Mass.], and Abraham Baldwin [Ga.] were opposed to stringent requirements in the way of oaths and attestations, and Theodore Sedgwick [Mass.], and William Vans Murray [Md.] in favor of them.

On the specific question of the renunciation of titles to nobility William B. Giles [Va.], Mr. Madison, and Mr. Page were in favor of renunciation, and William L. Smith [S. C.], Mr. Dexter, Richard Bland Lee [Va.], Fisher Ames [Mass.], and Mr. Murray were opposed to it.

Upon the question of duration of residence Samuel Smith [Md.] advocated a term of ten years and Mr. Baldwin and Thomas Fitzsimons [Pa.] a term of five years.

On Naturalization

House of Representatives, December 22, 1794–January 8, 1795

Mr. Page disliked the requirement of an oath of allegiance by the applicant for citizenship. He trusted that a Constitution much admired, and with such wholesome laws, will be an inducement to many good men to become citizens, and that, should bad men come among us, they will be discountenanced by the more virtuous class of citizens and, if necessary, be punished

The Swiss nation in modern times had not been less jealous on the same subject. Indeed, no example could be found in the history of man to authorize the experiment which had been made by the United States. It seemed to have been adopted by universal practice as a maxim that the republican character was no way to be formed but by early education. In some instances, to form this character, those propensities which are generally considered as almost irresistible, were opposed and subdued. And shall we alone adopt the rash theory that the subjects of all governments—despotic, monarchical, and aristocratical—are, as soon as they set foot on American ground, qualified to participate in administering the sovereignty of our country? Shall we hold the benefits of American citizenship so cheap as to invite, nay, almost bribe, the discontented, the ambitious, and the avaricious of every country to accept them?

It was said, in support of what was termed our liberal policy, that our country wanted commercial capital; that we had an immense tract of vacant territory; and that we ought not, with the avarice of a miser, to engross to ourselves the exclusive enjoyment of our political treasures; but he had never been convinced that we ought to make so great a sacrifice of principle for the rapid accumulation of commercial capital. He had never been convinced that, by an improvement of our own resources, it would not accumulate as fast as might be for the public benefit. We heard much of equality. Property was, in some sense, power; and the possession of immense property generated daring passions which scorned equality, and with impatience endured the restraints of equal laws. Property was undoubtedly to be protected as the only sure encouragement of industry, without which we should degenerate into savages. But he had never been convinced that the anxiety with which we wished an accumulation of capital, in the hands of individuals, was founded on correct republican reflection. The ardent ambition inspired by the possession of great wealth, and the power of gratifying it which it conferred, had, in many instances, disturbed the public peace, and, in not a few, destroyed liberty.

The vacant lands, which some, with so much avidity, wished to see in the occupation of foreigners, he considered as the best capital stock of the future enjoyment of Americans; as an antidote against the poison of luxury; as the nursery of robust and manly virtue; and as a preventive of a numerous class of citizens becoming indigent and, therefore, dependent. Whenever the time should arrive (and may that period be very distant) when there should no longer be presented to the poor a decent competence and independence, as the effect of industry and economy (which would generally be the case when lands were no longer to be obtained on their present easy and reasonable terms), then that description of men, now perhaps the most happy and virtuous, would become miserable to themselves and a burden to the community.

He considered America as in possession of a greater stock of enjoyment than any other people on earth. That it was our duty to husband it with care; yet he could not altogether exclude such virtuous individuals as might fly here, as to an asylum, against oppression. On the one hand, he would not dissipate our treasures with the thoughtless profusion of a prodigal; nor would he, on the other, hoard them, as in the unfeeling grasp of a miser. Our glorious fabric has been cemented by the richest blood of our country, and may it long continue to shelter us against the blasts of poverty, of anarchy, and of tyranny.

Mr. Madison, like Mr. Page, was opposed to the requirement of the oath of allegiance. It was hard to make a man swear that he preferred the Constitution of the United States, or to give any general opinion, because he may, in his own private judgment, think monarchy or aristocracy better, and yet be honestly determined to support this Government as he finds it.

Mr. Nicholas opposed the word "moral" in an amendment requiring that the applicant for citizenship furnish attestations of his "good moral character." This word might be hereafter implied to mean something relative to religious opinions.

Mr. Sedgwick remarked that the word "moral" is opposed to "immoral" and has no particular reference whatever to religion, or whether a man believes anything or nothing. It has no reference to religious opinions. We can everywhere tell, by the common voice of the world, whether a man is moral or not in his life without difficulty. In some States of the Union adultery is not punishable by law, yet it is everywhere said to be an immoral action.

Mr. Madison spoke on the resolution that if an American citizen chose to expatriate himself he should not be allowed to enter into the list of citizens again without a special act of Congress and of the State from which he had gone.

He said that he did not think that Congress, by the Constitution, had any authority to readmit American citizens at all. It was granted to them to admit only aliens.

Mr. Dexter held that a man cannot expatriate himself without the express consent of the nation of which he is a subject.

Mr. Murray would infer that this country had a right to naturalize foreigners, because she has naturalized them; and that this country, by its laws, having accepted the allegiance of an alien, the alien had a right to offer that allegiance. The very proviso to naturalize an alien, without inquiry as to the consent of his own country having been previously obtained, seems to be predicated on the principle for which he contended—that a man has the right to expatriate himself without leave obtained: if he has not, all our laws of this sort, by which we convert an alien into a citizen completely, must be acknowledged to be a violation of the rights of nations. How far a man, after having been naturalized at a period of life when his reason enabled him to choose, and to enter into a solemn obligation, and, after he has expressly entered into it, has a right, without the consent of the society, to quit that society, might be another question. After a citizen throws off his allegiance to this country, by leaving it and entering into a new obligation to some other nation, though he may have a right so to do, he has no right to return to his allegiance here without the consent of this society; and it is not a question of right, but of policy, how far we will readmit him to citizenship. It was, however, necessary that a man, casting off the allegiance of one country, must complete the act of dissolution in another. Therefore he considered that law of Virginia a strange solecism which provides for the throwing off allegiance within the community. The consequences of such a principle are not only destructive to the very form and body of civil society, but are unnatural. They present a civilized being belonging to no civil society on earth; for, in the intermediate state in which he stands, between the allegiance and country he has just disowned, and the allegiance and country to which he may intend to pledge himself, he is in the imaginary state of nature, which is, in reality, an unnatural state, for a being whose every faculty and quality constitute him a moral agent, surrounded by essential relations, and, of course, impel him to discharge duties of a social nature.

The British Government, by a want of conformity between their first principle, as laid down in their law books, and the practice of Parliament, have shown us a singular mixture of old principles which the nation has outgrown. It is a maxim with them that allegiance cannot be dissolved by any change of time or place, nor by the oath of a subject to any foreign power; yet they naturalize by act of Parliament. They accept what they declare, by their theory of civil law, cannot be rightfully offered: nay, for one century the throne of England has presented monarchs who were foreigners. William of Orange was a Prince, but he was a subject, too, of a foreign power; and George the First was a member of the Germanic body. There is little danger that citizens, who are worthy of being so, will throw off their allegiance from the United States. The amendment which prohibits their readmission to a participation of all the rights of citizenship will be a sufficient penalty, if any be necessary. Though they may have a right to expatriate themselves, there cannot be inferred a right of returning; for every body politic must have the right of saying upon what terms they will accept any addition of aliens to their numbers; and the expatriated man, no longer belonging to this society, and being an alien, the Government may choose whether he ever shall enjoy its privileges again.

Mr. Baldwin expressed the strongest disapprobation at the idea of expatriating all those of our citizens who may have become subjects or citizens of another country. Many of them had been made citizens without any solicitation of their own and merely as a mark of esteem from the government under which they lived. They had no design whatever of renouncing their country. Yet the House of Representatives, all at once, declares them incapable of returning to their former situation.

Mr. Giles proposed a new clause which was, in substance, that all such aliens who had borne any hereditary titles, or titles of nobility in other countries, should make a renunciation of such titles before they can enjoy any right of citizenship. Mr. G. said if we did anything to prevent an improper mixture of foreigners with the Americans this measure seemed to him one that might be useful.

Mr. W. Smith was entirely opposed to the motion. The mind of the public is completely guarded against the introduction of titles and they will never be current here. You cannot hinder a man from calling another a viscount. You cannot declare this a crime.

He doubted whether the House had, by the Constitution, any right of making such a law. They were directed not to grant any titles, but their authority did not extend to the taking away of titles from persons who were not born in the country. The Marquis de Lafayette has been distinguished all over the Continent by the title of Marquis. Mr. S. hoped that he would one day be again in America and then he would very likely be called Marquis again. By this law it would be illegal.

Why might there not be an interdiction against persons connected with the Jacobin Club? Why not forbid the wearing of certain badges of distinction used by Jacobins?

Mr. Madison approved of the motion. He regarded it as exactly to the business in hand, to exclude all persons from citizenship who would not renounce forever their connection with titles of nobility. The propriety of the thing would be illustrated by this reflection: that, if any titled orders had existed in America before the Revolution, they would infallibly have been abolished by it.

We have been reminded of the Marquis de Lafayette. He had the greatest respect for that character; but, if he were to come to this country, this very gentleman would be the first to recommend and acquiesce in the amendment on the table. He had urged the necessity of utterly abolishing nobility in France, even at a time when he thought it necessary for the safety of the state that the King should possess a considerable portion of power.

Mr. Giles declared that the requirement was in conformity with the Constitution, which declared no titled character admissible to any civil rank. The measure is a proper safeguard.

A revolution is now going onward to which there is nothing similar in history. A large portion of Europe has already declared against titles, and when the innovations are to stop no man can presume to guess. There is at present no law in the United States by which a foreigner can be hindered from voting at elections, or even from coming into this House; and, if a great number of these fugitive nobility come over, they may soon acquire considerable influence. The tone of thinking may insensibly change in the course of a few years and no person can say how far such a matter may spread.

Mr. Dexter opposed the resolution. He imagined that, by the same mode of reasoning, we might hinder His Holiness the Pope from coming into this country. And why not? priestcraft had done more mischief than aristocracy.

Mr. Madison said that the question was not perhaps so important as some gentlemen supposed; nor of so little consequence as others seemed to think it. It is very probable that the spirit of republicanism will pervade a great part of Europe. It is hard to guess what numbers of titled characters may, by such an event, be thrown out of that part of the world. What can be more reasonable than that, when crowds of them come here, they should be forced to renounce everything contrary to the spirit of the Constitution?

Mr. Page was for the motion. It did not become that House to be afraid of introducing democratical principles. Titles only give a particular class of men a right to be insolent, and another class a pretence to be mean and cringing. The principle will come in by degrees and produce mischievous effects here as well as elsewhere. If such men do come here, nothing can be more grateful to a republican than to see them renounce their titles. This does not amount to any demand of making them renounce their principles. If they do not aspire to be citizens they may assume as many titles as they think fit. Equality is the basis of good order and society, whereas titles turn everything wrong. Mr. P. said that a scavenger was as necessary to the health of a city as any one of its magistrates. It was proper, therefore, not to lose sight of equality and to prevent, as far as possible, any opportunities of being insolent. He did not want to see a duke come here and contest an election for Congress with a citizen.

Mr. Lee.—As to mere empty names, as to sounds, we must be very corrupt, we must be very ignorant, if we could be alarmed by them. And in this free country every man had a right to call himself by what name or title he pleased; and, if the mover thought proper to change his name for any other name, sound, or title, it would neither add to nor diminish his real worth and importance; it would not give qualities to his heart which he had not before, nor detract from those he had. What were the mischiefs experienced in Europe from privileged orders? They did not flow from the names by which those orders were distinguished; they arose from the exclusive preference and privileges which those orders possessed in political rights and in property. Without these their titles would have been mere empty gewgaws, ridiculous in the extreme, and unworthy of the acceptance of any man of common sense. Titles, then, did not produce the mischiefs; but the privileges annexed to titles. In this country every citizen was equal to his fellow-citizen in political rights; and the laws of the respective States had wisely provided that property could not be accumulated in such a degree in the hands of individuals as to give them an improper influence in society. By the equal distribution of estates individuals are prevented from being so rich as to trample upon the necks of their equals. Great accumulations of property are more likely, in fact, to introduce the effects of aristocracy than are the ridiculous names by which individuals may be distinguished. If it was the corrupting relation of lord and vassal which rendered a foreigner an unfit member of an equal republican government, he feared that this reasoning applied to the existing relation of master and slave in the Southern country (rather a more degrading one than even that of lord and vassal) would go to prove that the people of that country were not qualified to be members of our free republican Government. But he knew that this was not the case. Though in that House the members from the State of Virginia held persons in bondage, he was sure that their hearts glowed with a zeal as warm for the equal rights and happiness of men as gentlemen from the other parts of the Union where such degrading distinctions did not exist. He rejoiced that notwithstanding the unfavorable circumstances of his country in this respect, the virtue of his fellow-citizens shone forth equal to that of any other part of the nation.

Mr. Dexter would vote for the resolution if the gentleman would agree to an amendment, which was: "And, also, in case any such alien shall hold any person in slavery, he shall renounce it and declare that he holds all men free and equal."

Mr. Giles realized the sarcastic purpose of the gentleman's amendment, but deprecated it as an ungenerous fling at the members from the Southern States, who were contending as best they could with a local evil. As for himself, he lamented and detested slavery; but, from the existing state of the country, it was impossible at present to help it. He himself owned slaves. He regretted that he did so, and, if any member could point out a way in which he could be properly freed from that situation, he should rejoice in it. The thing was reducing as fast as could prudently be done.

Mr. Madison mentioned regulations adopted in Virginia for gradually reducing the number of slaves. None were allowed to be imported into the State. The operation of reducing the number of slaves was going on as quickly as possible. The mention of such a thing in the House had, in the mean time, a very bad effect on that species of property, otherwise he did not know but what he should have voted for the amendment of Mr. Dexter. It had a dangerous tendency on the minds of these unfortunate people.

Mr. Ames.—Can the advocates of Mr. Giles's amendment even affect apprehensions that there is any intention to introduce a foreign nobility as a privileged order? If they can, such diseases of the brain were not bred by reasoning and cannot be cured by it. Still less should we give effect by law to chimerical whimsies. For what is the tendency of this counterfeit alarm? Is it to rouse again the sleeping apparitions which have disturbed the back country? Is it to show that the mock dangers which they have pretended to dread are real? Or, is it to mark a line of separation between those who have the merit of maintaining the extremes of political opinions and those whom this vote would denounce as stopping at what they deem a wise moderation? If that is the case, it seems that the amendment is intended rather to publish a creed than to settle a rule of naturalization.

Mr. Murray had no alarming apprehensions of nobility. There had once been in this House a baronet. He was there for two years before it was known, and it was then discovered that a baronet was a thing perfectly harmless. As for titles of nobility, he believed that all the sensible part of the community looked upon the whole as stuff. When Mr. M. contemplated this subject it reminded him of Holbein's "Dance of Death." He saw nothing in this country but the ghosts of nobility.

The amendment of Mr. Giles, relative to forswearing nobility, and that of Mr. Dexter, relative to forswearing slavery, were both voted down.

Mr. Murray then moved to extend the period of residence from five to ten years.

Mr. Baldwin said this was opposed to the Constitution which required a Senator to have lived only nine years in the country.

Mr. S. Smith was for the longer term, that the prejudices which the aliens had imbibed under the government from whence they came might be effaced, and that they might, by communication and observance of our laws and government, have just ideas of our Constitution and the excellence of its institution before they were admitted to the rights of a citizen.

Mr. Fitzsimons thought that ten years were much too long a time for keeping an alien from being a citizen—it would make this class of people enemies to your Government. He was firmly of opinion that emigrants deserved to be encouraged; and to discourage them was an idea which till this day he had never heard either in or out of the House. Nature seems to have pointed out this country as an asylum for the people oppressed in other parts of the world. It would be wrong, therefore, to first admit them here, and then treat them for so long a time so harshly.

Mr. Murray's amendment was negatived.

CHAPTER II

The Alien Laws

Resolutions of the Committee for the Defence of the Country, Giving President John Adams Power to Deport Aliens, Who Are Natives of Nations at War with the United States—Debate on the Resolution: in Favor, John Rutledge, Jr. [S. C.], John Allen [Ky.], Samuel Sewall [Mass.]; Opposed, Joseph McDowell [N. C.], and Albert Gallatin [Pa.]—The Resolutions Are Passed—Resolution of the Committee for Defence for Punishing Citizens Who Should Harbor Aliens—Debate on the Resolution: in Favor, Mr. Sewall, Nathaniel Smith [Conn.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.]; Opposed, James A. Bayard, Sr. [Del.], Mr. Gallatin, Robert Williams [N. C.]; the Resolution Is Passed—The Senate Passes a Bill Empowering the President to Banish Such Aliens as He Deems Suspicious Persons—The House Debates the Bill: in Favor, Mr. Otis, Robert G. Harper [S. C.], Jonathan Dayton [N. J.]; Opposed, Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Williams, Edward Livingston [N. Y.]—The Bill Is Passed.

DURING the Administration of John Adams the dominant Federalists took a partisan advantage of the general fear of foreign invasion due to the French war scare by attempting more stringently to restrict naturalization and thereby to cut off recruits from the Republicans, since the emigrants, fleeing in those revolutionary days from European or monarchical tyranny, naturally allied themselves with the radical and anti-Admistration party in their new home. A number of the emigrants, indeed, were educated Irish and Scottish radicals, who had taken up journalism in this country and had excited the special animosity of the Federalists by scurrilous abuse of the Administration and by open and unqualified indorsement of the French revolutionists.

On May 1, 1798, Samuel Sewall [Mass.], chairman of the Committee for the Defence of the Country, reported drastic resolutions (1) for the increase of the term of residence required for naturalization; (2) for the registry of aliens; and (3) for the deportation, at the pleasure of the President, of alien males over the age of fourteen who were natives of countries at war with the United States.

Leading advocates of these resolutions were: John Rutledge, Jr. [S. C.], John Allen [Ky.], Mr. Sewall; leading opponents were: Joseph McDowell [N. C.] and Albert Gallatin [Pa.].

On Debarring Aliens from Citizenship

House of Representatives, May 2–21, 1798

The committee rose and reported the resolutions. The two first were concurred in, but, on the question being put on the third,

Mr. McDowell said it ought to be remembered that inducements had been held out to foreigners to come to this country, and many of them had come with a view of becoming citizens of this country, and many, he believed, were as good as any among us. It has been said our population was now sufficient, and that the privileges heretofore allowed to foreigners might now be withdrawn. In some parts of the country this might, in some degree, be the case; but he knew there were other parts which wanted population.

Mr. Rutledge said, in the situation of things in which we are now placed, the President should have the power of removing such intriguing agents and spies as are now spread all over the country. What, said Mr. R., would be the conduct of France if in our situation? In twenty-four hours every man of this description would either be sent out of the country or put in jail, and such conduct was wise. Was there nothing, Mr. R. asked, to admonish us to take a measure of this kind? Yes, there was. A gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] had said that a person was in that State delivering commissions into the hands of every man who was so abandoned as to receive them. Other means were also taken to alienate the affection of our citizens; and are we still, said he, to say we will not send these persons out of the country until a declaration of war is made? If these persons are suffered to remain France will never declare war, as she will consider the residence of these men among us as of greater consequence than the lining of our seaboard with privateers or covering our coasts with men.

Mr. Allen said he would move an amendment which would supersede that under consideration by making the resolution extend to all aliens in this country. He wished to retain none of the restraints which are in the present resolution. The proposition goes upon the supposition that none but the citizens of a particular nation can be dangerous to this country; whereas he believed that there are citizens of several other countries who are as dangerous, who have dispositions equally hostile to this country with the French—he believed more so. He believed the whole country was aware of this. Mr. A. alluded to the vast number of naturalizations which lately took place in this city to support a particular party in a particular election. It did not appear to him necessary to have the exercise of this power depend upon any contingency, such as a threatening of invasion, or war, before it could be exercised. He wished the President to have it at all times. He moved an amendment to this effect, which went to enable the President to remove at any time the citizen of any foreign country whatever, not a citizen, regarding the treaties with such countries. If gentlemen took a view of the different states of Europe which had been subdued by the French, Mr. A. said, they would not think it either wise or prudent to wait for an invasion, or threatened invasion, before this power was put in execution. Venice, Switzerland, and Rome had been overcome by means of the agents of the French nation at a time when they were in a much less alarming situation than we are at present; and the first disturbance in those countries was made the pretext of open hostility. This has been the effect of diplomatic agency; of emissaries, within and without, who have bred quarrels for the purpose of forming pretexts for measures which have led to the subjugation of those countries. He believed there were citizens in this country who would be ready to join a foreign power in assisting to subjugate their country.

Mr. Sewall said civil policy regarded aliens in two lights, viz.: alien friends and alien enemies. He did not contemplate the making of this country a wall against all aliens whatever; or that no alien should come here without being subject to an arbitrary authority, such as is known only to the French Directory. If the existence of such a power as shall be able to place every alien in the country in a dungeon was necessary to quiet the fears and apprehensions of the gentleman from Connecticut, he should not be willing to grant it.

What, said Mr. S., is to be feared from the residence of aliens among us? Anything to ruin the country? He acknowledged many inconveniences arose from this circumstance, but more from our own unnatural children, who, in the bosom of their parent, conspired her destruction. But did the gentleman wish to increase the evil by saying that persons born in foreign countries, however regular and orderly their conduct may be, shall be liable to be imprisoned or sent out of the country, but that citizens of this country, however reprehensible their conduct, shall have nothing to fear? Unless the United States were inclined to assume the character of the Turks or Arabs, such a regulation as was recommended by the gentleman from Connecticut could not be adopted.

Mr. Gallatin would suggest that a part of the Constitution might be in the way of this motion.

By turning to the 9th section of the Constitution, it is found that the migration of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808. He understood it, however, to be a sound principle that alien enemies might be removed, although the emigration of persons be not prohibited by a principle which existed prior to the Constitution, and was coeval with the law of nations. The question was, therefore, whether the citizens or subjects of nations in actual hostility can be considered as alien enemies. The term "actual hostility" is vague in its nature and would introduce doubt as to its true import.

The resolutions were recommitted to the Committee for the Defence of the Country. On May 21 Mr. Sewall, the chairman of the committee, made its report, which was (1) that the term of residence required of applicants for citizenship be extended to fourteen years, and (2) no alien coming from a country at war with us shall be admitted to citizenship while such war continues. The first resolution was passed by a vote of 41 to 40, and the second agreed to without division.

When the Republicans came into power they repealed this bill (April 14, 1802), and reëstablished the former conditions of naturalization.

On May 22, 1798, there was presented to the House the third of the original resolutions of the Committee for the Defence of the Country, that respecting the deportation, at the pleasure of the President and by his proclamation, of aliens who were born in a country which was either at war with the United States or was threatening invasion. To the original resolution was added a section by which the execution of the act, in relation to these aliens and all who shall harbor them, was committed to all the judicial and ministerial officers of the Federal and State governments.

The debate on this resolution was long and animated. The chief speakers in its favor were Mr. Sewall, Nathaniel Smith [Conn.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.]; its leading opponents: James A. Bayard, Sr. [Del.], Albert Gallatin [Pa.], and Robert Williams [N. C.].

On Punishing Harborers of Aliens

House of Representatives, May 22–June 26, 1798

Mr. Bayard said the last section of this bill contained a principle contrary to all our maxims of jurisprudence, viz.: to provide punishment for a crime by a law to be passed after the fact is committed. Whether the crime to be punished is to amount to treason, misprision of treason, or be only a misdemeanor is left uncertain. It was his opinion that laws could not be too definite; but it would be impossible in this case for the person committed to know what crime he had committed, or to what punishment he was liable. He moved, therefore, to amend the bill by making the crime a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Sewall acknowledged there was a good deal of uncertainty in that part of the bill mentioned, but the select committee did not see any way of remedying the evil without making the law too mild in its operation. In some cases the offence would amount to high treason, the punishment for which is death; in others, to misprision of treason, the punishment for which is imprisonment not exceeding seven years and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars. As the offence might, therefore, sometimes amount to high treason, there would be an impropriety in making it uniformly a misdemeanor.

If an alien should have resided here for a number of years and he should turn out to have been a spy, and a citizen of the United States should have harbored and concealed the said alien, knowing him to have been a spy, he would be chargeable with high treason for aiding and abetting the enemies of the United States within its territory, or, at least, a misprision of treason.

But the gentleman from Delaware was mistaken in his idea that it was intended to try an offender by a law passed after the offence was committed. By the expression "as by law is or shall be declared" was meant only such law as should be passed between the present time and the time of committing any offence.

The question of Mr. Bayard's amendment was put and carried, 44 to 25.

On motion of Mr. Bayard the blank for containing the amount of the penalty in the amendment just carried was filled with one thousand dollars.

Mr. N. Smith hoped this amendment would not be agreed to. He believed the penalty might, in some cases, be too severe, and, in others, by far too mild. This being the condition of things, to make an uniform punishment for all cases, whether highly criminal or no crime at all, cannot be proper.

Mr. Bayard hoped the amendment would be agreed to. He did not know that a greater misfortune could happen to any man than to live in a country where the laws are so indefinite that a person cannot ascertain when he commits an offence, or what is the penalty of an offence when it is committed. The fact was of a definite nature and a definite punishment ought to be made for it. What is the fact? It is the harboring and concealing of an alien enemy after the proclamation of the President. Gentlemen say this offence may amount to treason, misprision of treason, or other offence. If the offence could amount to treason he owned he did not understand the bill, because the crime of treason is defined by the Constitution, and could not be varied by any law of Congress. If, then, the fact amount to treason, it will not be included in this law. If gentlemen wished to punish persons in exact conformity to their degree of offence they ought to prepare a scale of offence for that purpose.

Mr. Sewall said this bill declares that a person harboring an alien enemy shall be a suspected person; but the crime and punishment must be ascertained by other laws; and by these offenders are to be punished agreeably to their offences, whether they be great or small.

Mr. Gallatin said, if he understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, it was not the object of this bill to define the nature of the offence of which a person shall be guilty or the punishment for it, for harboring and concealing an alien enemy, but only that certain circumstances should render a man a suspected person. This, to him, was altogether a new legislation.

If he understood the bill as it stood rightly, a person may be apprehended and imprisoned on account of his having harbored and concealed alien enemies; yet the gentleman from Massachusetts says this is in itself no crime; for, if it were a crime, it ought to be punished in the way proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, but he states it to be only a sufficient ground of suspicion. This, Mr. G. said, was not only contrary to every principle of justice and reason, but to the provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution says: "That no person shall be deprived of life, limb, or property without due process of law." But here certain persons may be deprived of their liberty without any process of law, or being guilty of any crime. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts says that this bill does not define a crime or award a punishment. But, Mr. G. said, this assertion was not correct; for there was a new crime instituted, which was that of being a suspected person, and the overt act which is to be evidence of that crime is the harboring and concealing of an alien enemy, and the punishment is to be apprehension and imprisonment until it shall be found what law the prisoner has offended.

Mr. G. said he was ready to acknowledge that, where a man commits an offence, he ought to be punished; but he could not consent to punish any man on suspicion merely. He therefore moved to recommit the bill. He did this because he thought the whole of the bill vague in its nature. He wished it to be more in detail, and that the offences to be punished should be defined; for it was remarkable that every section of the bill concluded with these singular words: "Subject, nevertheless, to the regulations which the Congress of the United States shall thereafter agree and establish." So that, instead of deciding what the law should be, it gives the President the power of saying what it is; subject to the after-regulations of Congress. He wished now to make the law to declare what the offence should be, and what the punishment, and not leave it to the President to make what regulations he shall think proper. If not, the whole of the bill might as well be in two or three words, viz.: "The President of the United States shall have the power to remove, restrict, or confine alien enemies and citizens whom he may consider as suspected persons." When Congress attempted to legislate they ought not to do it in this way. When the resolution was agreed to, authorizing this bill to be reported, he expected the committee would have defined the nature of offences and their punishments, and not reported the bill in the vague way in which it is before the House, especially as this appears not to be meant for a temporary, but a permanent, law.

If gentlemen examine the third section of the bill it will be found that all judges, justices, marshals, sheriffs, and other officers, and all the good people of the United States are bound to do—what? Not to execute any law; but to carry into effect any proclamation, or other public act, of the President. So that, instead of the judicial and any other officers of the United States, and the people at large, being obedient to the laws, they are to be obedient to the will of the President.

The last clause of the bill, which does not relate to aliens, but to our own citizens, is very objectionable. It is in the shape of a penal law, and the crime it defines is the harboring and concealing of alien enemies. Now, it is said that this crime may amount to high treason by its being construed that an offender has adhered to the enemies of the United States, knowing them to be such, or it may be no offence at all. But the provision is general; and a man guilty of no offence is liable to be apprehended and imprisoned equally with the highest offender under this law.

Mr. Sewall said that it is necessary to provide for the public safety, and in all countries there is a power lodged somewhere for taking measures of this kind. In this country this power is not lodged wholly in the Executive; it is in Congress. Perhaps, if war was declared, the President might then, as Commander-in-Chief, exercise a military power over these people; but it would be best to settle these regulations by civil process. They would be regulated by the treaties as well as by the laws of nations. The intention of this bill is to give the President the power of judging what is proper to be done, and to limit his authority in the way proposed by this bill.

Mr. Otis said that, unless gentlemen were disposed to suffer a band of spies to be spread through the country from one end of it to the other, who, in case of the introduction of an enemy into our country, may join them in their attack upon us and in their plunder of our property, nothing short of the bill like the present can be effectual.

He was willing to say that, in a time of tranquillity, he should not desire to put a power like this into the hands of the Executive; but, in a time of war, the citizens of France ought to be considered and treated and watched in a very different manner from citizens of our own country.

As to the objection made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the bill provides a punishment for suspected persons and that the word "suspected" was indefinite, Mr. O. asked whether men are not usually arrested on suspicion? When information is lodged against a man for committing an offence he is suspected of being guilty and imprisoned until he can be examined.

Mr. Nathaniel Macon [N. C.] made a motion to recommit the whole bill, which was negatived—37 to 36.

Mr. Gallatin then made a motion to recommit the third section, which was negatived by the casting vote of the Speaker, there being 38 votes for it and 38 votes against it.

The bill was read the third time when—

Mr. R. Williams moved a recommitment of the bill. He said his objections did not lie so much against the provisions respecting aliens, as to the power proposed to be given to the President of issuing proclamations, which are to be binding on the judges and other officers with respect to our own citizens. He would wish to designate every offence and its adequate punishment, as far as it could be done. In order to effect this he made his motion.

Mr. Sewall said the gentleman from North Carolina seemed not to object to the powers given to the President by the first and second sections of the bill, but he did not wish him to have any officers to execute his powers. If the President is authorized to issue orders, he must be authorized to require the aid of proper persons to execute them.

Mr. Gallatin called for the yeas and nays upon this question, which, being agreed to, he hoped this bill would be recommitted. He had no doubt that the committee, by paying due attention to the subject, instead of this general and vague bill might report such rules and regulations as would be proper to be adopted on this occasion. He recollected seeing a bill from the Senate on this subject in which something of this kind was done [see the following debate]; and, though he did by no means approve of that bill, yet it showed that the thing was not impossible. The objection made against a recommittal of this bill was that it was necessary to do something to provide means for securing and removing alien enemies, which did not apply as an argument against the recommitment of the bill. It was a good reason why a bill should be passed, but no reason why it should pass in its present form. The present bill, Mr. G. said, was grounded upon the principle that the President of the United States shall have the power to do by proclamation what ought only to be done by law.

The power of the President, Mr. G. said, did not stop at aliens; it extended to all the citizens of the United States. The object of the last section provides that justices, judges, marshals, sheriffs, and the people at large shall perform a duty which is undefined. But the gentleman from Massachusetts says this is right, because the power given to the Executive by this bill is also undefined. This is the foundation of all the objection made to this bill; it is to the want of legislation in it, which leaves not only alien enemies, but citizens of the United States, to the will of the President.

He could conceive that the House might take into consideration the nature of the powers vested in the President and inquire what will be the duties required to be performed by the several officers of the Government to carry into effect those powers. Those powers are to apprehend, restrain, secure, and remove alien enemies and to sequester their property. As to the removal of aliens, he could not see what justices and judges had to do with it; but, if they had anything to do with it, Congress ought to say what.

The last part of the third section, he said, was as objectionable as any other. It defines the crime in two words: "harboring and concealing," and the penalty, if the accused is found guilty of this vague and uncertain charge, is imprisonment not exceeding seven years and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars. So that, if a person be found guilty of harboring and concealing an alien enemy, however trifling the expense may be, his punishment will be left wholly to the discretion of the court. The only power of the jury will be to decide on the fact; and, if a citizen has harbored for one night, however undesignedly, an alien enemy, he must be found guilty, leaving it altogether to the court to judge of the criminality of the act and to affix the degree of punishment. He thought this part of the law ought to be more clearly defined. It ought to distinguish between cases of misdemeanor and those cases which might arise merely from ignorance and in which no offence at all might exist. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would be recommitted.

The question on recommitting the bill was put and carried, 46 to 44.

The bill was modified by the committee in a way to remove the objections of its opponents, and passed on June 26 by a vote of 56, the negative not being taken.

Before the passage of the preceding bill one was received from the Senate, empowering the President to order such aliens as he deemed dangerous to depart from the country, and, upon their failure to do so, to imprison them for three years and debar them thereafter from becoming citizens. If any alien should return after banishment he was to be imprisoned, with hard labor, for life. Ship captains were ordered to report all aliens on their vessels, on pain of a fine of $300.

In the discussion which ensued in the House on this bill many of the arguments of the preceding debate were, naturally, repeated.

The discussion, however, soon lifted from the particular issue as to the President's power over aliens to the general ones of all his powers and the powers of Congress under the Constitution. For the first time in American politics the line was clearly drawn between the strict and loose construction of the Constitution, the Democratic Republicans adhering to the letter of the Federal charter and the Federalists construing it to permit presidential and congressional authority over matters not specifically granted therein.

The leading speakers in the House in support of the Senate bill were Mr. Otis, Robert Goodloe Harper [S. C.], and Jonathan Dayton [N. J.]. Those opposing it were Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Williams, and Edward Livingston [N. Y.].

Strict and Loose Construction of the Constitution

House of Representatives, June 8–June 21, 1798

Mr. Gallatin said it has been declared by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Sewall] that this power over aliens is included in the power given to Congress to regulate commerce; the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Bayard] believes it to be contained in that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, by which he argues power is also given to provide for the common defence and general welfare; but another gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Otis] and a gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Dana] drew this power from that which they say every government must have to preserve itself.

Mr. G. said he would offer a few remarks upon each of these reasons. In the first place, the power was said to be included in the power to regulate commerce. But this bill is not intended for any commercial purpose; it is wholly of a political nature, intended to effect political ends, and does not relate to aliens as merchants. If Congress has any power which they can exercise on the persons of aliens, it might relate only to merchants, to them as merchants—to their professions, not to their existence as men.

With respect to the clause of the eighth section, contended for by the gentleman from Delaware, it was in the following words: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," and that no gentleman contended that its meaning was to give power to Congress, in the first place, to lay taxes, and, in the next place, to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. But the obvious and universally received meaning of the last words was not to give a general power altogether unconnected with the remaining part of the sentence, but to define the purpose for which taxes should be laid. Had the construction of the gentleman from Delaware been intended, the power would have been given in a distinct paragraph, in the same manner as all the other powers are given, instead of placing the words in this way in the middle of a paragraph relating to a quite different subject. If this new construction was adopted there would have been no need to have enumerated the powers given to Congress in this and other sections, because such a broad power as that contended for would have embraced every other.

Nor is this all. The twelfth [1] amendment of the Constitution seems to have apprehended some improper use being made of the sweeping clause by taking it as a ground for power never intended to be given, and, therefore, it declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people"; but, if the construction now spoken of were to prevail, this amendment could have no application; for, if all the powers are delegated to Congress by that clause, how could it be said that the powers not delegated were reserved to the States?

To show that, at the time the Constitution was adopted, no such opinion as this prevailed Mr. G. referred to the debates had upon it in the Pennsylvania convention. He particularly quoted the sentiments of Mr. Wilson, who spoke of this provision for raising taxes as being necessary for the common defence and general welfare. Mr. Wilson expressed himself as follows: "Certainly Congress should possess the power of raising revenue from their constituents for the purpose mentioned in the eighth section of the first article, that is, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States"; and again: "I think it would be very unwise in this convention to refuse to adopt this Constitution, because it grants Congress power to lay and collect taxes for the purpose of providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Mr. G. also quoted from "The Federalist," written by the members of the Federal convention in defence of the Constitution before its adoption.

Mr. G. said he was well informed that those words had originally been inserted in the Constitution as a limitation to the power of laying taxes. After the limitation had been agreed to, and the Constitution was completed, a member of the convention [1] (he was one of the members who represented the State of Pennsylvania), being one of a committee of revisal and arrangement, attempted to throw these words into a distinct paragraph so as to create, not a limitation, but a distinct power. The trick, however, was discovered by a member from Connecticut,[2] now deceased, and the words restored as they now stand. So that, Mr. G. said, whether he referred to the Constitution itself, to the most able defenders of it, or to the State conventions, the only rational construction which could be given to that clause was that it was a limitation, and not an extension, of powers.

Another gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Otis] has taken a kind of general ground, supposing that there must exist certain general powers in Congress which are equal to meet any possible case. He could not say that he rightly understood the meaning of that gentleman. If he meant that all power should be vested in Government, because it is possible that occurrences may arise which will call for the exercise of them, he would not hesitate to say that doctrine is contrary to the Constitution, for that has put limits to the powers of the Government, and has said certain things shall not be done by it. For instance, it might be thought necessary, though neither an invasion nor a rebellion had taken place, to suspend the habeas corpus act, as had been the case in Great Britain some time ago. It was there represented that a dangerous conspiracy existed against the Government, and that, in order to meet it with effect, it was necessary to suspend the habeas corpus act. Reasoning on the same ground, the gentleman from Massachusetts might say that a dangerous conspiracy now exists here, that he has got hold of the threads of that plot which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Harper] has pledged himself to this House a few days ago to pursue through all its ramifications, and move for a suspension of the habeas corpus act. But the Constitution would be directly against such a motion, as it is there said "it shall not be suspended but in cases of actual rebellion or invasion." So that this Government cannot do everything which the gentleman may suppose necessary to be done. Or did the gentleman mean that Congress ought to exercise all the powers that may be vested in Government in this country? Such a sentiment is also flatly contradicted by the Constitution, as it recognizes a division of powers between the general and State governments. Thus, in the instance before the committee, Congress has the power to declare war and to punish any persons guilty of treasonable practices, but what relates to aliens as suspicious characters the Government of the United States has no cognizance of. It is a matter which remains with the State governments; and, if there was any necessity for passing a law on the subject, there could be no doubt it would be done by the proper constitutional authority—the State governments. Or did gentlemen mean that the power for providing for the common defence should absorb all other powers, and that, if this power was limited, the Constitution is not worth a farthing? Did he wish, except the Constitution would authorize an act of this sort, it should be overset? Did he like the Constitution only for the powers it gave, and not for the restraints it put on power? Did he intend to declare himself an enemy to every part of the Constitution which restrains the power of the general Government? He could not suppose that this was his opinion; and, if it was not, he did not understand what he meant.

As to the general declaration contained in the preamble of the Constitution, he would remark that the Articles of Confederation under the old Congress had several expressions of the same nature. The power was there said to be given for the general defence, showing that to have been the object of the Union. The same articles gave power to Congress to declare war, and several other powers of a general nature in which such a power might equally be supposed to be included; and it was on this account that he stated that the old Congress never acted on this subject, merely because the general powers of both governments being nearly similar, the opinion of the old Congress, in relation to their own authority, was applicable to the present instance.

In opposing this bill it might not be supposed to be necessary to go further than to show that the power of passing a law like the present had not been given to this Government. But it so happened that, supposing he was mistaken in that position, another clause expressly prohibited the exercise of that power for the present, even if it did exist at all. He would, therefore, proceed to notice some of the objections which had been urged against his observations on the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, which says that Congress shall not prohibit the migration of such persons as the States choose to admit.

Mr. G. took it for granted that, whatever is not prohibited is permitted; and, so long as no law of any State prohibits the admission of aliens, he supposed all are admitted. Indeed, the admission is recognized by laws in every State.

Again, it was said that this clause relates solely to slaves, as an exception granted of the power to regulate commerce. In answer to this he said that the word migration, as contradistinguished from the word importation, could apply only to a free act of the will, and to the voluntary arrival of free persons coming to this country, in the same manner as the word importation could apply only to slaves brought into the United States without their consent; and the word persons was of the most general acceptation, and could by no means exclude free emigrants. That this even was well understood at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, he would prove by the following quotation from James Wilson's speech in the debates of the Pennsylvania convention: "The gentleman [Mr. Findley] says that it is unfortunate in another point of view; it means to prohibit the introduction of white people from Europe, as this tax may deter them from coming among us; a little impartiality and attention will discover the care that the convention took in selecting their language. The words are the migration or importation of such persons shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation; it is observable here that the term migration is dropped, when a tax or duty is mentioned; so that Congress have power to impose the tax only on those imported."

The argument, therefore, stood thus: Either the general power of preventing the migration of aliens is included in the powers given by the Constitution to Congress, or it is not. If it is not included, and that was his decided opinion, the present bill is unconstitutional. But if, by implication, it may be derived from any of the specific powers given to Congress, whether that of regulating commerce, of declaring war, or of any other, or if it be included in a supposed general power of providing for the common defence and general welfare, even, in that case, its exercise is prohibited to Congress by this clause till the year 1808, and, on this ground, the present bill is also unconstitutional.

Mr. G. thought when a constructive power of this kind was claimed it was time that a stand should be made against it. He looked upon the provision not only as unconstitutional, but as of a most arbitrary nature, grounded upon a supposition which has not been proved, and upon another which does not exist. The supposition is not proved that the measure is necessary on account of danger to be apprehended, from there being aliens resident in the country dangerous to its peace. The persons from whom this danger is apprehended are either alien friends or alien enemies. So far as relates to the latter they are provided for in another bill. The whole of the arguments on this bill, therefore, are applicable only to alien friends. And here he must take notice that, although Congress has not the power to remove alien friends, it cannot be inferred, as had been objected, that it had not the power to remove alien enemies; this last authority resulted from the power to make all laws necessary to carry into effect one of the specific powers given by the Constitution. Among these powers is that of declaring war, which includes that of making prisoners of war and of making regulations with respect to alien enemies, who are liable to be treated as prisoners of war. By virtue of that power, and in order to carry it into effect, Congress could dispose of the persons and property of alien enemies as it thinks fit, provided it be according to the laws of nations and to treaties.

No facts had appeared, with respect to alien friends, which require these arbitrary means to be employed against them. If there are gentlemen possessed of facts of this kind, it is their duty to lay them before the House. But, while these proofs are held back, gentlemen have a right to say no necessity exists for such a measure. He supposed gentlemen who spoke with so much confidence on this subject must be possessed of facts unknown to him, otherwise they would be unjustifiable in creating a groundless alarm; but the House had a right to inquire what the facts are, if they did exist, and whether they relate to alien friends or alien enemies.

He would not only say that this bill was founded on a supposition which was not proved, but, also, that it took for granted another position which did not exist. If there be any danger, it is certainly such as may be punished by the laws of our country, without adopting a measure of this kind. The laws of the United States will reach alien friends, if guilty of seditious or treasonable practices, as well as citizens. And, if the law is not at present sufficient to reach every case, it might be amended. He wished all crimes and punishments to be accurately defined; and he hoped gentlemen who profess to be warm supporters of this Government and Constitution, will not say that it is not in our power to reach the object. And, if it be necessary to send certain persons out of the country on account of their malpractices, he trusted laws would be framed for the purpose of punishing them, and that they would not be left without trial, subject to the arbitrary control of one man only.

This bill not only was grounded upon a supposed necessity which did not exist, but it appeared to him that if it was passed, a bill of a similar nature might be brought in in relation to citizens of the United States. This bill is called a bill concerning aliens; but in its consequences it affects citizens as much as aliens; for he called upon the supporters of this bill to show him a single clause in the Constitution which has been referred to in support of this bill, which would not equally justify a similar measure against citizens of the United States. And, so far as relates to the necessity of the bill, the plea may be equally made against citizens as against aliens; for what is the ground upon which this power is claimed? It is by virtue of the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce. And what is this power? It is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Therefore, if, by virtue of the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, they can remove foreigners from the country by the same reasoning (bad reasoning he knew it was), they had a similar power of removing citizens of the several States. And, when another gentleman tells us that the power is claimed under certain powers given to Congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare, would it not apply to citizens as well as aliens? It certainly would, since they might argue that seditious and turbulent citizens might be as dangerous to the peace of the country as aliens of a similar description; and, when gentlemen are disposed to treat the Constitution in this way to come at aliens, he had no doubt they will be equally ready to do it against citizens whenever they shall wish to do so.

Or will gentlemen say that the Constitution affords a security to citizens which it does not extend to aliens? He knew the rights of aliens are limited; but, if we can dispense with the law toward them, we may also do it with respect to citizens. The trial by jury does not speak of citizens, but of persons. What security, said Mr. G., can citizens have when they see a bill like the present pass into a law?

Again, with respect to the writ of habeas corpus, what do gentlemen say? They say it is only to prevent any man from being imprisoned in an arbitrary manner; and that, as the present bill describes the cases in which a man is liable to arrestation and imprisonment, it cannot be a suspension of that law; that is to say, the writ of habeas corpus is designed to prevent arbitrary imprisonment, or what the gentleman calls illegal imprisonment; but, according to this doctrine, if you give, by law, the power to the President of arbitrary imprisonment, that power, being thus given by law, is on that account no longer illegal nor arbitrary. That was the kind of security which citizens might expect to derive from the clause of the Constitution which related to the writ of habeas corpus. That privilege was to be done away by a legal distinction.

By the seventh amendment[1] to our Constitution, it is provided that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." According to the doctrine of the gentleman, Congress may give, by law, the power to the President, or anyone else, to deprive a citizen of his liberty or property, and the act of giving that power by law will be called the due process of law contemplated by the Constitution.

A gentleman had said that States must claim only local powers, general ones being placed in the general Government. But the present bill was more of a local than of a general nature. Those States whose population is full, and to which few migrations take place, are little concerned in this question, unless, indeed, to check the population of other States and to keep a preponderance in their hands be an object with them. It was of consequence only to those States whose population is thin and whose policy it has always been to encourage emigration. Among these he placed the State of Pennsylvania. Indeed, he had always thought it was the general policy of this country; he believed it had only been the violence of party which had created any difference of opinion on the subject. It had been an established principle in Pennsylvania, from its first establishment to the present time, and every encouragement had been held out to emigrants of all nations. On this account, if this bill passes, there will be ten times the number of people under its operation, and the arbitrary power of the President, in this State than there will be in all the New England States put together. Emigration, he said, had been very useful to Pennsylvania. It is owing to it that its population had, within a little more than a century, reached its present extent. Nor had the mixture of emigration from Great Britain and Germany produced any bad effect upon the policy of the State. He believed it could boast of civil establishments as wise and as good as any of her sister States. And, in such a bill, assuming a power belonging to herself and not to the United States, and affecting her population and prosperity to such an extent, Pennsylvania was immediately and deeply concerned.

Let it be remembered that the Declaration of Independence, in the enumeration of the complaints of America against the King of Great Britain, states that "he has endeavored to prevent the population of these States, for that purpose obstructing the laws for the naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither," etc. The present bill related not to any political rights; it affected the civil rights, the personal liberty, the property of aliens. It subjects them to a removal, upon suspicion, and that at the will of one man. It was not only a refusal to encourage migrations, it was a bill to prevent migrations.

Mr. Otis said it could not be denied that it was the design of the Federal Constitution to embrace all our exterior relations. The great objects of peace and war, negotiations with foreign countries, the general peace and welfare of the United States, must be provided for and maintained by the national Government; no other authority is competent to these great duties; no other can judge of the necessity of measures preparatory to the national defence nor enforce such measures with general effect.

If Congress has the right to defend the Union it has certainly the right to prepare for defence. And, if any specific power had been claimed by the individual States which was inconsistent with this general power, it must vanish before the obligation of the general Government to provide for the common defence.

But he did not think the power of admitting foreigners, which it was contended for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania remained with the States, was inconsistent with the right of expelling dangerous persons, which he claimed for the general Government. That gentleman, Mr. O. said, had interrogated him in a very extraordinary manner. He has asked whether he wished to overturn the Constitution? He should certainly answer: No; he did not wish to overturn it, but to preserve it against the attempts of insidious and dangerous aliens, and he thought this bill necessary for that purpose. He considered and followed the Constitution as a lamp to his path; whereas the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Gallatin] would make the Constitution a mere ignis fatuus, calculated to bewilder and mislead.

Mr. O. agreed that the construction was just that which the gentleman put upon the first article of the eighth section of the Constitution, and that to provide for the common defence and general welfare was the end of the powers recited in the first part of that section, and that the powers were merely the means. But this is equally the end of all the other powers given to Congress by all the articles of this section, so that these words might, with propriety, be understood as if they were added to every clause in it, and thus, from the whole section, it appeared clear that Congress has a right to make war for the common defence and general welfare, and, of course, to do everything which is necessary to prepare for such a state. And shall we, said Mr. O., allow that the States have a right to defeat this power? If we find men in this country endeavoring to spread sedition and discord; who have assisted in laying other countries prostrate; whose hands are reeking with blood; and whose hearts rankle with hatred toward us—have we not the power to shake off these firebrands? Certainly we have. They were admitted here under the rights of hospitality, exercised by nations toward friendly strangers; but, when they become dangerous and hostile, we certainly have a right to send them away. What will be our situation if any one of the States may retain a number of men whose residence shall be provably dangerous to the safety of the United States? If such State should judge proper to make regulations on the subject it could only banish a person from its territory. So that persons of this description, stamped with infamy in their own country and plotting treasons against ours, may remain in some part of the territory of the United States, while Congress has not the power to get rid of them until all the States concur in the same object.

If this was the dilemma into which we are reduced by the Federal compact, it might as well have never been made, for a government that is prevented from exercising an authority which may be necessary to its existence is not better than no government at all; and, if the individual States have the means of frustrating the views of the general Government in the exercise of its powers, the present Constitution would have no advantage over the old Confederation. The simple ground on which the question stood was this: Can the right of expulsion be exercised by the United States without infringing the right of admission which is reserved to the individual States? And, gentlemen, to demonstrate the collision of these powers, put an extreme case, and suppose that Congress may send out of the country all the aliens who should be admitted by any State, and thus render nugatory the right of importation reserved to the States. But this is the old-fashioned way of arguing from a presumed abuse of power. It is one thing to banish all aliens indiscriminately and a very different thing to banish a few individuals of suspicious character. It is in the nature of a punishment for supposed offences, and there is no fear of involving innocence with guilt. Aliens do not claim an exemption from punishment for offences against the United States—when found guilty of crimes the courts can sentence them to be imprisoned or to be punished with death. And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania might as well say that such sentences are unconstitutional, because the courts might imprison or hang up aliens as fast as they are admitted into any State.

Mr. O. contended that the limitation of the power of admitting aliens, which is reserved to the States till the year 1808, implied that Congress might prohibit the migration of foreigners after that time, so that this ninth section of the Constitution is only an exception from the general power, and must be construed strictly. If the United States have not this right they cannot authorize the President to send away a public minister who should threaten to convulse the nation, but a State might retain such a minister contrary to the wishes and interests of the United States.

Mr. O. wished gentlemen to inquire whether or not it is now necessary to exercise this power. Gentlemen call for evidence of any alien's acting improperly in this country. If, he said, proof positive and direct could be adduced the laws of the country might be sufficient to punish them; but is there not sufficient reason to be alarmed on this subject, not only from the fate of other countries, but from what has happened under our own eyes. Do we not know, said he, that the French nation have organized bands of aliens, as well as of their own citizens, in other countries to bring about their nefarious purposes. It is well known that their object is to divide and command; and they furnish the most dreadful commentaries upon this old maxim. By these means they have overrun all the republics in the world but our own. Do we not, said he, read the history of their dark maneuvers in the fate of Holland and Switzerland? And may we not expect the same means to be employed against this country? We certainly might.

Mr. O. said that this diplomatic agency had been in full motion in the United States; he might mention names; but it was well known to every gentleman of this committee that a Frenchman of a literary and intriguing character, who was formerly a member of the Club Breton, and was doubtless in the confidence of the Directory, who has for a long time sojourned in Pennsylvania, who had explored the Indian country and traveled through other States, had lately taken flight. It was also well known that a citizen of Pennsylvania, conspicuous for his attachment to the French, had followed him. It was lately discovered that another Frenchman who resided at New York and who, he believed, was naturalized, is in the constant habit of corresponding with the Directory, a man, who, though holding no known agency under them at present, has heretofore agitated the Continent by his intrigues and may be looked upon as in their employ. And the same kind of correspondence is traced up to our own citizens.

Mr. O. concluded by saying the times are full of danger and it would be the height of madness not to take every precaution in our power. The right contended for was of inestimable value to the United States, but to the individual States it would be of no importance. The provisions of the Constitution were plain and adequate to all the exigencies of the nation, and it was wrong to waste that time in nice and unnecessary arguments which ought to be employed in the most active preparations and decisive measures. He hoped, therefore, the section would be retained.

Mr. Harper said it was not without difficulty that he could prevail upon himself to believe that the objections to this measure, on Constitutional grounds, were serious. He could not help being reminded, when he heard these objections urged, of the saying of a witty writer upon a book still more sacred than the Constitution, viz.: "That it was a rich field into which all parties sent their troops to forage." Mr. H. said if it be wished to restrain a foreign enemy, or domestic traitors, and effectual means are proposed, the House is told, by a novel discovery, that we have not the power of self-defence; though we see the knife of the traitor held to our throats, we are to wait until the State governments will come in and snatch it away. Strange would it be if the Government could thus exist; strange would it be if it had not the power of suppressing domestic traitors!

It was said that State governments only had cognizance over aliens; but have these governments any knowledge of what relates to our foreign relations, or the common defence of the Union? Certainly not. By admitting the doctrine which these gentlemen advocate, what is the result? One State might expel persons as dangerous, but an adjoining State might be of opinion that the person ought not to be expelled; and, of course, such a person would remain at liberty to act against the Government and people of the United States; and, if the safety of the Government of the Union is to depend upon the discordant wills of sixteen States, deplorable and debased indeed would be its situation.

Mr. H. allowed that the States have a right to admit such foreigners as they think proper till a certain period; but the general Government is, in the meantime, charged with the common defence and welfare of the United States, and, in pursuance of those objects, it certainly has a right to pass all necessary laws, and, if any of these laws should require certain aliens to be sent out of the country, what has appeared to be necessary for the general welfare cannot be carried into effect if the States have a right to insist upon keeping their aliens.

The first paragraph of the ninth section of the Constitution does not say Congress shall never have the power specified, but that it shall not exercise the power until the year 1808, which makes it pretty evident that the provision had relation only to slaves. If it had related to emigrants it would have been without any limitation of time. If Africans, or slaves, had been inserted by name, the thing could not, in his opinion, have been more clear.

With respect to citizens, we know they cannot be proceeded against in this way. To argue the abuse of power from its existence was a common subterfuge of gentlemen, which, if not disregarded, would prevent the giving any power whatever, and he desired no better principle to completely stop the wheels of Government, and to lay it prostrate at the feet of its external and internal foes.

But it was said no necessity exists for this measure, and gentlemen call for proof of any danger to be apprehended from the description of persons mentioned in this bill. Are we to wait, then, said Mr. H., until a judicial process can be entered upon? To stay until the dagger is plunged into our bosoms before we take any means of defence?—Until the thief breaks into our house before we bar the door? He believed no one would say this would be good policy.

Suppose, said Mr. H., a person had good information that a set of thieves meant to break into his house on a certain night, what would be thought of the conduct of any individual who should say to him: "You need not prepare to defend yourself; there is no occasion to bar the doors—there are no thieves in the neighborhood?" Such a person certainly would be deemed a partner in the burglary. The allegory, Mr. H. said, was applicable to the fate of many nations whose governments have been overturned by France. Mr. H. referred to the animating picture of French intrigue given by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He trusted the bill would be passed. He wished no traitors should be left in the country to paralyze all our efforts for its defence and, when the enemy appeared, give him possession of it.

The zeal shown in this House, and in other places, against this bill evinces the deadly hatred of certain persons toward it. But it was well known that those European nations which have escaped being overcome by the domineering spirit of France owe their safety to a bill like this; and, unless we follow their example and crush the viper in our breast, we shall not, like them, escape the scourge which awaits us.

Mr. Dayton (the Speaker) most unequivocally reprobated the idea of Congress being confined to the strict letter of the Constitution in the nature, extent, and exercise of the authority vested in it. He said that a construction so narrow would be absurd, and would go to deprive the legislature of the power of making provisions upon the most common or most necessary cases merely because they were not specified. He adduced instances to prove that they might legislate with a view to "the general welfare," and, particularly, that, where a State, or part of a State, should be overwhelmed by the sea, or otherwise rendered uninhabitable from some extraordinary convulsion, a grant might be made to the people who were saved from the deluge either of money from the national treasury or of a part of the vacant public lands. He cited many acts that had already been passed under that very general power of providing for the common defence and general welfare, and asserted that, though the Constitution was very useful in giving general directions, yet it was not capable of being administered under so rigorous and so mechanical a construction as had been sometimes contended for.

Mr. R. Williams said the gentleman last up is anxious to know whether the Federal Government has not the power to provide for the general welfare? Within the limits of the Constitution it certainly has the right; but it might require all power to do this; and then it would not, for if the general Government had all this power nothing would be left for the State governments to act upon. He wished gentlemen would mark the line of distinction and say whether the individual States do not possess some power to be employed for the general welfare as well as the general Government, and whether the benefits thence arising are not equally as serviceable to the public as when exercised by the general Government?

The gentleman from South Carolina supposes States may admit foreigners into their society, but may not be inclined to punish them for breaches of their laws. Could so absurd an opinion ever exist? Besides, if States choose to act contrary to each other in their internal policy, surely Congress has not the power to make them uniform. One State may punish a man with death for stealing a horse, and another may inflict upon him imprisonment. Yet this they have a right to do, without the interference of Congress.

In supporting this bill against aliens the gentleman from South Carolina has shown its operation upon citizens, which proves to him that the principle is intended to be carried further than it appears at present. If we look into the history of other countries we shall find that, whenever governments have wished to make inroads upon the liberties of the people, nothing has been more common than to institute an alarm of danger of some kind or other. No such maneuver, however, should ever induce him to grant an arbitrary power to the President of the United States, or to any other man. It is not sufficient to say that the general welfare requires a thing to be done; because, if it be a subject which belongs to the States, however necessary it may be to be done, Congress cannot do it.

Mr. Harper, after some observations showing the impropriety of treating persons confined for offences under this act as common felons, moved to strike out the words "and confined to hard labor for and during life" and insert, in their place, "during the pleasure of the United States."

The question on the amendment was put and carried, there being 53 votes for it. The question of the passage of the bill now came forward.

Mr. Livingston, referring to the number of similar bills on the exclusion of aliens, said: This circumstance gave me a suspicion the principles of the measure were erroneous. Truth marches directly to its end by a single undeviating path. Error is either undetermined on its object or pursues it through a thousand winding ways; the multiplicity of propositions, therefore, to attain the same general but doubtful end led me to suspect that neither the object nor the means proposed to attain it were proper and necessary. These surmises were confirmed by a more minute examination of the act. In the construction of statutes it is a received rule to examine what was the state of things when they passed, and what were the evils they were intended to remedy; as these circumstances would be applied in the construction of the law it might be well to examine them minutely in framing it. The state of things, if we are to judge from the complexion of the bill, must be that a number of aliens, enjoying the protection of our Government, were plotting its destruction; that they are engaged in treasonable machinations against a people who have given them an asylum and support, and that there is no provision to provide for their expulsion and punishment. If these things are so, and no remedy exists for the evil, one ought speedily to be provided, but, even then, it must be a remedy that is consistent with the Constitution under which we act; for, as by that instrument all powers not expressly given by it to the Union are reserved to the States, it follows that, unless an express authority can be found vesting us with the power, be the evil ever so great, it can be remedied only by the several States who have never delegated the authority to Congress.

We must legislate upon facts, not on surmises; we must have evidence, not vague suspicions, if we meant to legislate with prudence. What facts have been produced? What evidence has been submitted to the House? I have heard, sir, of none. We have, indeed, been told that the fate of Venice, Switzerland, and Batavia was produced by the interference of foreigners. But the instances were unfortunate; because all those powers have been overcome by foreign force, or divided by domestic faction, not by aliens who resided among them, and, if any instruction was to be gained from those republics, it would be that we ought to banish not aliens, but all those who did not approve of the Executive acts. This, he believed, gentlemen were not ready to avow; but, if this measure prevailed, he should not think the other remote; but, if it had been proved that these governments were destroyed by the conspiracies of aliens, it yet remains to show that we are in the same situation; or that any such plots have been detected, or are even reasonably suspected here. Nothing of this kind has been yet done. A modern Theseus, indeed, has told us he has procured a clue that will enable him to penetrate the labyrinth and destroy this monster of sedition. Who the fair Ariadne is, who so kindly gave him the ball, he has not revealed; nor, though several days have elapsed since he undertook the adventure, has he yet told us where the monster lurks. No evidence, then, being produced, we have a right to say that none exists, and yet we are about to sanction a most important act; and on what ground? Our individual suspicions, our private fears, our overheated imaginations. Seeing nothing to excite those suspicions, and not feeling those fears, I could not give my assent to the bill even if I did not feel a superior obligation to reject it on other grounds.

Our Government, sir, is founded on the establishment of those principles which constitute the difference between a free Constitution and a despotic power; a distribution of the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers into several hands; a distribution strongly marked in the three first and great divisions of the Constitution; by the first, all legislative power is given to Congress, the second vests all legislative functions in the President, and the third declares that the judiciary powers shall be exercised by the Supreme and Inferior Courts. Here, then, is a division of the governmental powers strongly marked, decisively pronounced, and every act of one or all of the branches that tends to confound these powers, or alter this arrangement, must be destructive of the Constitution. Examine, then, sir, the bill on your table and declare whether the first section does not confound these fundamental powers of government, vest them all in the more unqualified terms in one hand, and thus subvert the basis on which our liberties rest.

Legislative power prescribes the rule of action; the judiciary applies that general rule to particular cases, and it is the province of the Executive to see that the laws are carried into full effect. In all free governments these powers are exercised by different men, and their union in the same hand is the peculiar characteristic of despotism. If the same power that makes the law can construct it to suit his interest and apply it to gratify his vengeance; if he can go further and execute, according to his own passions, the judgment which he himself has pronounced upon his own construction of laws which he alone has made, what other features are wanted to complete the picture of tyranny? Yet all this, and more, is proposed to be done by this act; by it the President alone is empowered to make the law, to fix in his mind what acts, what words, what thoughts or looks shall constitute the crime contemplated by the bill, that is, the crime of being "suspected to be dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States." He is not only authorized to make this law for his own conduct, but to vary it at pleasure, as every gust of passion, every cloud of suspicion shall agitate or darken his mind. The same power that formed the law, then, applies it to the guilty or innocent victim, whom his own suspicions, or the secret whisper of a spy, have designated as its object. The President, then, having made the law, the President having construed and applied it, the same President is, by the bill, authorized to execute his sentence, in case of disobedience, by imprisonment during his pleasure. This, then, comes completely within the definition of despotism—an union of legislative executive, and judicial powers. But this bill, sir, does not stop here; its provisions are a refinement upon despotism and present an image of the most fearful tyranny. Even in despotisms, though the monarch legislates, judges, and executes, yet he legislates openly; his laws, though oppressive, are known; they precede the offence and every man who chooses may avoid the penalties of disobedience. Yet he judges and executes by proxy, and his private interests or passions do not inflame the mind of his deputy.

But here the law is so closely concealed in the same mind that gave it birth—the crime is "exciting the suspicions of the President," but no man can tell what conduct will avoid that suspicion—a careless word, perhaps misrepresented, or never spoken, may be sufficient evidence; a look may destroy, an idle gesture may insure punishment; no innocence can protect, no circumspection can avoid the jealousy of suspicion; surrounded by spies, informers, and all that infamous herd which fatten under laws like this, the unfortunate stranger will never know either of the law, of the accusation, or of the judgment until the moment it is put in execution; he will detest your tyranny and fly from a land of desolators, inquisitions, and spies.

This, sir, is a refinement of the detestable contrivance of the Decemvirs; they hung the tables of their laws so high that few could read them. A tall man, however, might reach them, a short one might climb and learn their contents, but here the law is equally inaccessible to high and low. Safely concealed in the breast of its author, no industry or caution can penetrate this recess and obtain a knowledge of its provisions; nor, even if they could, as the rule is not permanent, would it at all avail.

Having shown that this act is at war with the fundamental principles of our Government, I might stop here in the certain hope of its rejection. But I can do no more; unless we are resolved to pervert the meaning of terms, I can show that the Constitution has endeavored to "make its surety doubly sure, and take a bond of fate," by several express prohibitions of measures like that you now contemplate. One of these is contained in the ninth section of the first article; it is at the head of the articles which restrict the powers of Congress, and declares "that the emigration or importation of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited prior to the year 1808." Now, sir, where is the difference between a power to prevent the arrival of aliens and a power to send them away as soon as they shall arrive? To me they appear precisely the same. The Constitution expressly says that Congress shall not do this, and yet Congress are about to delegate this prohibited power and say that the President may exercise it as often as pleasure may direct.

I am informed that an answer has been attempted to this argument by saying that the article, though it speaks of "persons," only relates to slaves. But a conclusive reply to this answer may be drawn from the words of the section; it speaks of migration and importation. If it relates only to slaves "importation" would have been sufficient; but how can the other word apply to slaves? Migration is a voluntary change of a country; but who ever heard of a migration of slaves? The truth is both words have their appropriate meaning, and were intended to secure the interests of different quarters of the Union. The Middle States wished to secure themselves against any laws that might impede the emigration of settlers. The Southern States did not like to be prohibited in the importation of slaves; and so jealous were they of this provision that the fifth article was introduced to declare that the Constitution should not be amended so as to do it away.

But, even admit, said Mr. L., the absurdity that the word "migration" has no meaning, or one foreign to its usual acceptation, and that the article relates only to slaves. Even this sacrifice of common sense will not help gentlemen out of their dilemma; slaves probably always, but certainly on their first importation, are aliens; many people think they are always "dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States!" If the President should be of this opinion, he not only can, but, by the terms of this law, is obliged to, order them off; for the act creates an obligation on him to send away all such aliens as he may judge dangerous to the peace or safety of the United States. Thus, according to the most favorable construction, every proprietor of this species of property holds at the will and pleasure of the President—and this, too, in defiance of the only article of the Constitution that is declared to be unalterable. But, let us, sir, for a moment imagine, if we can, that the States intended to restrict the general Government from preventing the arrival of persons whom they were yet willing to suffer that general Government to ship off as soon as they should arrive; grant all this and they will be as far from establishing the constitutionality of the bill as they were at the first moment it was proposed; for, in the third article, it is provided that all "judicial power shall be vested in the Supreme and Inferior Courts, that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury," except in case of impeachment; and, in the seventh and eighth amendments,[1] this provision is repeated and enforced by others which declare that "no man shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment of a grand jury"; that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witness in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence." Now, sir, what minute article in these several provisions of the Constitution is there that is not violated by this bill? All the bulwarks which it opposed to encroachments fall before personal liberty, fall before this engine of oppression.

Judiciary power is taken from courts and given to the Executive, the previous safeguard of a presentment by a grand inquest is removed; the trial by jury is abolished; the "public trial" required by the Constitution is changed into a secret and worse than inquisitorial tribunal; instead of giving "information on the nature and cause of the accusation," the criminal, ignorant of his offence and the danger to which he is exposed, never hears of either until the judgment is passed and the sentence is executed; instead of being "confronted with his accusers" he is kept alike ignorant of their names and their existence; and even the forms of trial being dispensed with, it would be a mockery to talk of "proofs for witnesses," or the "assistance of counsel for defence"—thus are all the barriers which the wisdom and humanity of our country had placed between accused innocence and oppressive power at once forced and broken down. Not a vestige even of their form remains. No indictment; no jury; no trial; no public procedure; no statement of the accusation; no examination of the witnesses in its support; no counsel for defence; all is darkness, silence, mystery, and suspicion. But, as if this were not enough, the unfortunate victims of this law are told in the next section that if they can convince the President that his suspicions are unfounded he may, if he pleases, give them a license to stay; but, how remove his suspicions, when they know not on what act they were founded? Miserable mockery of justice! appoint an arbitrary judge armed with legislative and executive powers added to his own! let him condemn the unheard, the unaccused object of his suspicion; and, then, to cover the injustice of the scene, gravely tell him, you ought not to complain—you need only disprove facts that you have never heard—remove suspicions that have never been communicated to you; it will be easy to convince your judge, whom you shall not approach, that he is tyrannical and unjust; and, having done this, we give him the power he had before, to pardon you, if he pleases.

So obviously do the constitutional objections present themselves that their existence cannot be denied, and two wretched subterfuges are resorted to to remove them out of sight. First, it is said, the bill does not contemplate the punishment of any crime; and, therefore, the provisions in the Constitution relative to criminal proceedings and judiciary powers do not apply. But have the gentlemen who reason thus read the bill; or is everything forgotten in our zealous hurry to pass it? What are the offences upon which it is to operate? Not only the offence of being "suspected of being dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States," but also that of being "concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the Government thereof." And this, we are told, is no crime! a treasonable machination against the Government is not the subject of criminal jurisprudence! Good Heaven! to what absurdities does an overzealous attachment to particular measures lead us! In order to punish a particular act we are forced to say that treason is no crime, and plotting against our Government is no offence! And, to support this fine hypothesis, we are obliged to plunge deeper in absurdity and say that, as the acts spoken of in the bill are no crimes, so the penalty contained in it is no punishment, it is only a prevention; that is to say, we invite strangers to come among us; we declare solemnly that Government shall not prevent them; we entice them over by the delusive prospect of advantage; in many parts of the Union we permit them to hold lands, and give them other advantages, while they are waiting for the period at which we have promised a full participation of all our rights. An unfortunate stranger, disgusted with tyranny at home, thinks he shall find freedom here; he accepts our conditions; he puts faith in our promises; he vests his whole property in our hands; he has dissolved his former connections, and made your country his own. But, while he is patiently waiting the expiration of the period that is to crown the work, and entitle him to all the rights of a citizen, the tale of a domestic spy, or the calumny of a secret enemy, draws on him the suspicions of the President, and, unheard, he is ordered to quit the spot which he selected for his retreat, the country which he had chosen for his own, perhaps the family which was his only consolation in life, he is ordered to retire to a country whose government, irritated by his renunciation of its authority, will receive only to punish him; and all this, we are told, is no punishment.

Again, we are told that the constitutional compact was made between citizens only, and that, therefore, its provisions were not intended to extend to aliens, and that this, acting only on them, is, therefore, not forbidden by the Constitution. But, unfortunately, neither common law, common justice, nor the practice of any civilized nation will permit this distinction. It is an acknowledged principle of the common law, the authority of which is established here, that alien friends (and permit me to observe that they are such only whom we contemplate in this bill, for we have another before us to send off alien enemies), residing among us, are entitled to the protection of our laws, and that during their residence they owe a temporary allegiance to our Government. If they are accused of violating this allegiance the same laws which interpose in the case of a citizen must determine the truth of the accusation, and if found guilty they are liable to the same punishment. This rule is consonant with the principles of common justice, for who would ever resort to another country if he alone was marked out as the object of arbitrary power? It is equally unfortunate, too, for this argument that the Constitution expressly excludes any idea of this distinction; it speaks of all "judicial power," "all trials for crimes," all "criminal prosecutions," all "persons accused." No distinction between citizen and alien, between high or low, friends or opposers to the executive power, republican and royalist. All are entitled to the same equal distribution of justice, to the same humane provision to protect their innocence; all are liable to the same punishment that awaits their guilt. How comes it, too, if these constitutional provisions were intended for the safety of the citizen only, that our courts uniformly extend them all, and that we never hear it inquired whether the accused is a citizen, before we give him a public trial by jury?

I have seen measures carried in this House which I thought militated against the spirit of the Constitution; but never before have I been witness to so open, so wanton, and undisguised an attack. I have now done, sir, with the act, and come to consider the consequences of its operation.

One of the most serious has been anticipated, when I described the blow it would give to the Constitution of our country. We should cautiously beware of the first act of violation. Habituated to overleap its bounds, we become familiarized to the guilt, and disregard the danger of a second offence, until, proceeding from one authorized act to another, we at length throw off all restraint which our Constitution has imposed; and very soon not even the semblance of its form will remain.

But if, regardless of our duty as citizens, and our solemn obligation as representatives; regardless of the rights of our constituents; regardless of every sanction, human and divine; if we are ready to violate the Constitution we have sworn to defend—will the people submit to our unauthorized acts? Will the States sanction our usurped power? Sir, they ought not to submit; they would deserve the chains which these measures are forging for them, if they did not resist. For let no man vainly imagine that the evil is to stop here, that a few unprotected aliens only are to be affected by this inquisitorial power. The same arguments which enforce those provisions against aliens apply with equal strength to enacting them in the case of citizens. Unless we can believe that treasonable machinations, and the other offences described in the bill are not "crimes"; that an alien is not a "person"; and that one charged with treasonable practices is not "accused"; unless we can believe all this, in contradiction to our understanding, to received opinions, and the uniform practice of our courts, we must allow that all these provisions extend equally to aliens and natives, and that the citizen has no other security for his personal safety than is extended to the stranger who is within his gates. If, therefore, this security is violated in one instance, what pledge have we that it will not in the other? The same plea of necessity will justify both. Either the offences described in the act are crimes, or they are not. If they are, then all the humane provisions of the Constitution forbid the mode of preventing them, or punishing their doers, equally as relates to aliens and citizens. If they are not crimes, then the citizen has no more safety by the Constitution than the alien has; for all those provisions apply only to crimes. So that, in either event, the citizen has the same reason to expect a similar law to the one now before you; which subjects his person to the uncontrolled despotism of a single man. You have already been told of plots and conspiracies; and all the frightful images that were necessary to keep up the present system of terror and alarm were presented to you. But who were implicated by these dark hints—these mysterious allusions? They were our own citizens, sir, not aliens. If there is then any necessity for the system now proposed it is more necessary to be enforced against our own citizens than against strangers; and I have no doubt, that either in this or some other shape this will be attempted. I now ask, sir, whether the people of America are prepared for this? Whether they are willing to part with all the means which the wisdom of their ancestors discovered, and their own caution so lately adopted, to secure their own persons? Whether they are ready to submit to imprisonment or exile whenever suspicion, calumny, or vengeance shall mark them for ruin? Are they base enough to be prepared for this? No, sir; they will, I repeat it, they will resist this tyrannic system; the people will oppose it—the States will not submit to its operation. They ought not to acquiesce, and I pray to God they never may.

My opinions, sir, on this subject are explicit, and I wish they may be known; they are that, whenever our laws manifestly infringe the Constitution under which they were made, the people ought not to hesitate which they should obey. If we exceed our powers we become tyrants, and our acts have no effect. Thus, sir, one of the first effects of measures such as this, if they be not acquiesced in, will be disaffection among the States, and opposition among the people to your Government—tumults, violations, and a recurrence to first revolutionary principles. If they are submitted to, consequences will be worse. After such manifest violation of the principles of our Constitution the form will not long be sacred; presently, every vestige of it will be lost and swallowed up in the gulf of despotism. But, should the evil proceed no further than the execution of the present law, what a fearful picture will our country present! The system of espionage being thus established, the country will swarm with informers, spies, delators, and all that odious reptile tribe that breed in the sunshine of despotic power; that suck the blood of the unfortunate, and creep into the bosom of sleeping innocence, only to awake it with a burning wound. The hours of the most unsuspecting confidence, the intimacies of friendship, or the recesses of domestic retirement afford no security. The companion whom you must trust, the friend in whom you must confide, the domestic who waits in your chamber are all tempted to betray your imprudence or unguarded follies; to misrepresent your words; to convey them, distorted by calumny, to the secret tribunal where jealousy presides—where fear officiates as accuser, and suspicion is the only evidence that is heard.

These, bad as they are, are not the only ill consequences of these measures. Among them we may reckon the loss of wealth, of population, and of commerce. Gentlemen who support the bill seemed to be aware of this when, yesterday, they introduced a clause to secure the property of those who might be ordered to go off. They should have foreseen the consequences of the step they have been taking. It is now too late to discover that large sums are drawn from the banks, and that a great capital is taken from commerce. It is ridiculous, even, to observe the solicitude they show to retain the wealth of these dangerous men, whose persons they are so eager to get rid of. If they wish to retain it, it must be by giving them security to their persons, and assuring them that, while they respect the laws, the laws will protect them from arbitrary power. It must be, in short, by rejecting the bill on your table. I might mention many other inferior considerations; but I ought, sir, rather to entreat the pardon of the House for having touched on this topic, to which, compared with the breach of our Constitution, and the establishment of arbitrary power, every other topic is trifling. Arguments of convenience sink into nothing; the preservation of wealth, the interest of commerce, however weighty on other occasions, here lose their importance. When the fundamental principles of freedom are in danger we are tempted to borrow the impressive language of a foreign speaker, and exclaim, "Perish our commerce, let our Constitution live!" Perish our riches, let our freedom live!—this, sir, would be the sentiment of every American were the alternative between submission and wealth. But here, sir, it is proposed to destroy our wealth in order to ruin our commerce—not in order to preserve our Constitution, but to break it—not to secure our freedom, but to abandon it.

I have now done, sir; but, before I sit down, let me entreat gentlemen seriously to reflect before they pronounce the decisive vote that gives the first open stab to the principles of our Government. Our mistaken zeal, like that of the patriarch of old, has bound one victim; it lies at the foot of the altar. A sacrifice of the first-born offspring of freedom is proposed by those who gave it birth. The hand is already raised to strike, and nothing, I fear, but the voice of Heaven can arrest the impious blow.

Let not gentlemen flatter themselves that the fervor of the moment can make the people insensible to these aggressions. It is an honest, noble warmth, produced by an indignant sense of injury. It will never, I trust, be extinct while there is a proper cause to excite. But the people of America, sir, though watchful against foreign aggression, are not careless of domestic encroachment; they are as jealous, sir, of their liberties at home as of the power and prosperity of their country abroad; they will awake to a sense of their danger. Do not let us flatter ourselves, then, that these measures will be unobserved or disregarded. Do not let us be told, sir, that we excite a fervor against foreign aggression only to establish tyranny at home; that, like the arch traitor, we cry "Hail Columbia!" at the moment we are betraying her to destruction; that we sing out "Happy land!" when we are plunging it in ruin or disgrace; and that we are absurd enough to call ourselves "free and enlightened," while we advocate principles that would have disgraced the age of Gothic barbarity, and establish a code compared to which the ordeal is wise, and the trial by battle is merciful and just.

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and on the yeas and nays being taken there were 46 votes for it and 40 against it.

No prosecutions took place under the act.

CHAPTER III

The Sedition Law

The Senate Passes a Law against Seditious Utterances and Publications—It Is Debated in the House: in Favor, John Allen [Ky.], Robert G. Harper [S. C.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.], and Samuel W. Dana [Conn.]; Opposed, John Nicholas [Va.], Edward Livingston [N. Y.], Nathaniel Macon [N. C.], Joseph McDowell [N. C.], and Albert Gallatin [Pa.]—It Is Passed with Amendments—Professor Alexander Johnston on the Sedition Law.

ON June 26, 1798, the bill against seditious practices, which Mr. Harper in the preceding debate had intimated would be brought forward, was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Lloyd, of Maryland. It was passed on July 4 by a vote of 18 to 6, and on the 5th was introduced in the House. It provided that persons conspiring to oppose any measure of the Government, or to impede its operation, or to intimidate a Federal officer from exercising his trust, should be punished by fine and imprisonment. Any person who, by writing, speaking, or printing should threaten a Federal officer with damage to his character, or should incite, whether successfully or not, an insurrection or riot, was to be fined a sum not exceeding $5,000 and imprisoned for a term not less than six months nor exceeding five years. If his offence was traducing Congress, the President, or the Federal judiciary in particular by imputing motives hostile to the Constitution, he was to be fined a sum not exceeding $2,000 and be imprisoned for not more than two years. The bill was debated until July 10, when it was passed by a vote of 44 to 41.

The chief speakers in favor of the bill were: John Allen [Ky.], Robert G. Harper [S. C.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.], and Samuel W. Dana [Conn.]; its leading opponents were: John Nicholas [Va.], Edward Livingston [N. Y.], Nathaniel Macon [N. C.], Joseph McDowell [N. C.], and Albert Gallatin [Pa.].

On the Sedition Act

House of Representatives, July 5–July 10, 1798

Mr. Livingston moved to reject the bill.

Mr. Allen.—I hope this bill will not be rejected. If ever there was a nation which required a law of this kind it is this. Let gentlemen look at certain papers printed in this city and elsewhere and ask themselves whether an unwarrantable and dangerous combination does not exist to overturn and ruin the Government by publishing the most shameless falsehoods against the Representatives of the people of all denominations, that they are hostile to free governments and genuine liberty, and of course to the welfare of this country; that they ought, therefore, to be displaced, and that the people ought to raise an insurrection against the Government.

I say, sir, a combination, a conspiracy against the Constitution, the Government, the peace and safety of this country, is formed, and is in full operation. It embraces members of all classes; the Representative of the people on this floor, the wild and visionary theorist in the bloody philosophy of the day, the learned and ignorant. Permit me to read a paragraph from The Time-Piece, a paper printed in New York:

"When such a character attempts by antiquated and exploded sophistry, by Jesuitical arguments, to extinguish the sentiment of liberty, 'tis fit the mask should be torn off from this meaner species of aristocracy than history has condescended to record; where a person without patriotism, without philosophy, without a taste for the fine arts, building his pretensions on a gross and indigested compilation of statutes and precedents, is jostled into the Chief Magistracy by the ominous combination of old Tories with old opinions, and old Whigs with new, 'tis fit this mock monarch, with his court, composed of Tories and speculators, should pass in review before the good sense of the world. Monarchies are seen only with indignation and concern; at sight of these terrible establishments, fears accompany the execrations of mankind; but when the champion of the well-born, with his serene court, is seen soliciting and answering addresses, and pronouncing anathemas against France, it shall be my fault if other emotions be not excited; if to tears and execrations be not added derision and contempt."

Gentlemen contend for the liberty of opinions and of the press. Let me ask them whether they seriously think the liberty of the press authorizes such publications?

If this be not a conspiracy against Government and people, I know not what to understand from the "threat of tears, execrations, derision, and contempt." Because the Constitution guarantees the right of expressing our opinions, and the freedom of the press, am I at liberty falsely to call you a thief, a murderer, an atheist? Because I have the liberty of locomotion, of going where I please, have I a right to ride over the footman in the path? The freedom of the press and opinions was never understood to give the right of publishing falsehoods and slanders, nor of exciting sedition, insurrection, and slaughter, with impunity. A man was always answerable for the malicious publication of falsehood; and what more does this bill require?

In the Aurora, of last Tuesday, is this paragraph:

"Where a law shall have been passed in violation of the Constitution, making it criminal to expose the crimes, the official vices or abuses, or the attempts of men in power to usurp a despotic authority, is there any alternative between an abandonment of the Constitution and resistance?"

The gentleman [Mr. Livingston] makes his proclamation of war on the Government in the House on Monday, and this infamous printer [Bache] follows it up with the tocsin of insurrection on Tuesday. He declares what is unconstitutional, and then invites the people to "resistance." This is an awful, horrible example of "the liberty of opinion and freedom of the press." Can gentlemen hear these things and lie quietly on their pillows? Are we to see all these acts practiced against the repose of our country, and remain passive? Are we bound hand and foot that we must be witnesses of these deadly thrusts at our liberty? Are we to be the unresisting spectators of these exertions to destroy all that we hold dear? Are these approaches to revolution and Jacobinic domination to be observed with the eye of meek submission? No, sir, they are indeed terrible; they are calculated to freeze the very blood in our veins. Such liberty of the press and of opinion is calculated to destroy all confidence between man and man; it leads to a dissolution of every bond of union; it cuts asunder every ligament that unites man to his family, man to his neighbor, man to society, and to Government. God deliver us from such liberty, the liberty of vomiting on the public floods of falsehood and hatred to everything sacred, human, and divine! If any gentleman doubts the effects of such a liberty let me direct his attention across the water; it has there made slaves of thirty millions of men.

At the commencement of the Revolution in France those loud and enthusiastic advocates for liberty and equality took special care to occupy and command all the presses in the nation; they well knew the powerful influence to be obtained on the public mind by that engine; its operations are on the poor, the ignorant, the passionate, and the vicious; over all these classes of men the freedom of the press shed its baneful effects, and they all became the tools of faction and ambition, and the virtuous, the pacific, and the rich were their victims. The Jacobins of our country, too, sir, are determined to preserve in their hands the same weapon; it is our business to wrest it from them. Hence this motion so suddenly made, and so violently supported by the mover, to reject this bill without even suffering it to have a second reading; hence this alarm for the safety of "the freedom of speech and of the press."

I wish there were no other species of writings which aim at the overthrow of this Government, and calculated to excite the deeds of death. But, sir, members of this body are in the habit of writing to their constituents things which they cannot justify. The committee will pardon me for reading a part of one which appeared in the Aurora a few days ago. It is entitled,

"Interesting Letter from a Member of Congress from Virginia to His Constituents."

After many comparisons of our Government with that of England, the learned writer says:

"Nor are we left altogether to conjectural events, arising out of a comparison of the general structure of the Government of England with that of the United States; there are special facts in our own affairs that evidently imply a tendency to similar abuses in the conduct of our government.

"The public debt has been studiously augmented and funded, according to the mystery and intricacy of English finances; we have been annually familiarized to the system of loans and funds; and we have a bank connected with government in its being and in its transactions. The nature of these institutions, and their political effects, already discernible in this country, and brought to full form and maturity in England, plainly prove their great fitness and agency in producing a dangerous preponderance of executive power; the Executive is regularly supported by a party in both Houses of Congress on every questionable case respecting its powers or its projects for expense," &c.

A Representative of the people has committed to him a trust of the highest nature; his obligations are of the most solemn kind; an awful responsibility rests upon him to deal with his constituents in the sincerity of his heart. How could a member of this House seriously inform his constituents that "the public debt has been studiously augmented"? He knew the reverse to be true; how he could say anything else this letter contains I cannot imagine. His object must be to inflame his constituents against the Government, though at the expense of all truth.

If these things are true; if we have so betrayed the interests of our constituents; if we are so seeking to bring a despotism on this country, we ought to be hurled from our seats, and give place to better men; we ought to be hurled to that punishment which would most justly await us. No gentleman believes them, however; no gentleman believes that every sense of moral obligation is set at naught in this House, and that we forget all that we owe to our constituents. Such representations are outrages on the national authority, which ought not to be suffered; and I have no doubt that Congress have power to remedy the evil. If it be determined that we have not this power the people will certainly vest it in the Congress, for no government can exist without it; it is inherent in every government, because it is necessary to its preservation.

Mr. Harper said that he had often heard in this place, and elsewhere, harangues on the liberty of the press, as if it were to swallow up all other liberties; as if all law and reason, and every right, human and divine, were to fall prostrate before the liberty of the press; whereas, the true meaning of it is no more than that a man shall be at liberty to print what he pleases, provided he does not offend against the laws, and not that no law shall be passed to regulate this liberty of the press.

The rational liberty of the press will not be restricted by a well-defined law, provided persons have a fair trial by jury; but that liberty of the press which those who desire, who wish to overturn society, and trample upon everything not their own, ought not to be allowed, either in speaking or writing, in any country.

While this abuse was confined to certain newspapers in the United States, it excited in him no alarm; but, when he heard a gentleman on the floor of this House, whose character and connections gave him weight with the people, pronouncing an invective against the Government, and calling upon the people to rise against the law, the business put on a very serious appearance; he thought so, not because he should wish to have that gentleman muzzled (for he knew he had the liberty of uttering as much treason as he pleased, and that, if his own sense of propriety and decorum was not sufficient to check him, there was no other check upon him), but because this speech may have a very different effect from the filthy streams of certain newspapers; it may gain a credit with the community, and produce consequences which all former abuse has failed to do. It is time, therefore, for the Government to take alarm; the long forbearance which it has shown ought to come to an end, since all its acts are represented in the vilest and foulest colors; and now they are sanctioned by the assertions of a person high in respectability (he meant as to his situation in life), and a law ought to pass to prevent such invitations as had been given to the people from producing their intended effects. It was for this reason that he wished a law to pass to punish treasonable and seditious writings.

Mr. Nicholas said: If the declarations of the gentlemen from Connecticut and South Carolina were attended to it would be found they are most afraid of the speeches and letters of gentlemen in this House. They acknowledge, however, they cannot prevent members from speaking what they please here. What, then, is their aim? Do they mean to prevent the publication of their sentiments to their constituents and to the world? If this was not their intention he could not tell what it was?

There was one general view of this subject, which Mr. N. took to be the most momentous that this country ever saw. He was ready to go with gentlemen into measures for affording a liberal support to the war, which it appears must be gone into; but he was not ready to create a domestic tyranny. The people of this country are competent judges of their own interests, and he was desirous that the press should remain perfectly free to give them every information relative to them; and to restrict it would be to create a suspicion that there is something in our measures which ought to be kept from the light. It was striking at the root of free republican government to restrict the use of speaking and writing.

Mr. Livingston said, after receiving the chastisement of the gentleman from Connecticut on one cheek, he, like a good Christian, had turned the other to the gentleman from South Carolina, and received the stripes of both. He expressed his acknowledgments to these gentlemen, however, if not for their chastisement, for the insight which they have given the House into this bill. They have said its design is not only to restrict the liberty of the press, which is secured by the Constitution, but the liberty of speech on this floor. The gentleman from South Carolina did not say explicitly that he wished this; but he said he was regardless of what was said in the public papers, either of private or personal slander, or of a slander on the Government, until he heard a certain speech delivered in this House; and, though he said he did not intend to restrict the liberty of speech in this House, he must have had something of the kind in view. [Mr. Harper said it was not his intention to restrict the freedom of speech on that floor, but the consequences of it out of doors.] Then, said Mr. L., he will either restrict the members from speaking, or, in some way, prevent the people from knowing what has been said. How is this to be done? By shackling newspapers, and preventing that free communication of sentiment which has heretofore been expressed on public topics.

Mr. L. avowed with pride the sentiments which he had uttered in the House, and to which gentlemen objected. He could not see how acts made contrary to the Constitution could be binding upon the people; unless gentlemen say Congress may act in contravention to the Constitution. [Mr. Otis asked who were to be the judges?] Mr. L. answered, the people of the United States. We, said he, are their servants; when we exceed our powers, we become their tyrants!

This is one object of complaint; the other is against newspaper publications. The gentleman from South Carolina has said that, provided the law be clear and well defined, and the trial by jury be preserved, he knew of no law which could infringe the liberty of the press. If this be true, Congress might restrict all printing at once. We have, said he, nothing to do but to make the law precise, and then we may forbid a newspaper to be printed, and make it death for any man to attempt it!

If this be the extent to which this bill goes it is not only an abridgment of the liberty of the press, which the Constitution has said shall not be abridged; but it is a total annihilation of the press. Were he then to withdraw his motion he should consider himself guilty of treason; by his consent so unconstitutional a measure should not progress an inch. However unsuccessful he might be, he would oppose it in every stage.

Mr. Otis believed there was nothing in the bill contrary to the common law of the several States of the Union.

Mr. Macon had no doubt on his mind that this bill was in direct opposition to the Constitution; and that if a law like this was passed, to abridge the liberty of the press, Congress would have the same right to pass a law making an establishment of religion, or to prohibit its free exercise, as all are contained in the same clause of the Constitution; and, if it be violated in one respect, it may as well be violated in others. Several laws had been passed which he thought violated the spirit, but none before this which directly violated the letter of the Constitution; and, if this bill was passed, he should hardly think it worth while in future to allege against any measure that it is in direct contradiction to the Constitution.

Laws of restraint, like this, Mr. M. said, always operate in a contrary direction from that which they were intended to take. The people suspect something is not right when free discussion is feared by government. They know that truth is not afraid of investigation.

If, said Mr. M., the people are so dissatisfied with government as some gentlemen would have it believed, but which he did not credit, by passing a law like the present you will force them to combine together; they will establish corresponding societies throughout the Union, and communications will be made in secret, instead of publicly, as had been the case in other countries. He believed the people might be as safely trusted with free discussion as they whom they have chosen to do their business.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Otis] has said this bill is conformable to the common law. He knew persons might be prosecuted for a libel under the State governments; but if this power exist in full force at present, what necessity can there be for this bill?

Much had been said about a certain paper printed in this city. He believed if anything appeared which was unfounded in that paper it would always be contradicted in another. It is well known there are papers on both sides of the question, and if you say you have read one you are generally asked if you have seen the other?

Mr. McDowell was in hopes that, when the third article[1] of the amendments to the Constitution had been read, the unconstitutionality of this bill would have been so evident that it would have been rejected without debate.

Mr. Gallatin said: The manner in which the principle of the bill had been supported was perhaps more extraordinary still than the bill itself. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Allen], in order to prove the existence of a combination against the Constitution and Government, had communicated to the House—what? a number of newspaper paragraphs; and even most of those were such as would not be punishable by the bill as it now stands. The object of that gentleman in wishing a bill of this nature to pass extended far beyond the intention of the Senate who had sent down this bill; far beyond, he would venture to say, the idea of any other member upon this floor, besides himself. His idea was to punish men for stating facts which he happened to disbelieve, or for enacting and avowing opinions, not criminal, but perhaps erroneous.

The gentleman from Connecticut had also quoted an extract of a letter said to be written by a member of Congress from Virginia, and published in last Saturday's Aurora. The style and composition of that letter did the highest honor to its writer. It contained more information and more sense, and gave more proofs of a sound understanding and strong mind, than ever the gentleman from Connecticut had displayed, or could display, on this floor. He was altogether at a loss to know what was criminal in it, though he might easily see why it was obnoxious. Was it erroneous or criminal to say that debts and taxes were the ruinous consequences of war? Or that some members in both Houses of Congress uniformly voted in favor of an extension of the powers of the Executive, and of every proposed expenditure of money? Was it not true? Gentlemen of that description avow that, in their opinion, the executive is the weakest branch of government; and they act upon the ostensible principle that, on that account, its influence and powers must be increased.

[1] Now the first.

Look at the laws passed during this session. Look at the alien bill, at the provisional army bill, look at the prodigious influence acquired by so many new offices, and then deny that the powers of the Executive have not been greatly increased. As to the increased rate of expenditure, and the propensity of these gentlemen to vote money, they would not themselves deny it. Was it criminal to say that the Executive is supported by a party, when gentlemen declared that it must be supported by a party? When the doctrine had been avowed on this floor that men of a certain political opinion alone ought to be appointed to offices; and when the Executive had now adopted and carried into practice that doctrine in its fullest extent?

Was the gentleman afraid, or, rather, was Administration afraid, that error could not be successfully opposed by truth? The American Government had heretofore subsisted, it had acquired strength, it had grown on the affection of the people, it had been fully supported without the assistance of laws similar to the bill now on the table. It had been able to repel opposition by the single weapon of argument. And at present, when out of ten presses in the country nine were employed on the side of Administration, such is their want of confidence in the purity of their own views and motives that they even fear the unequal contest, and require the help of force in order to suppress the limited circulation of the opinions of those who did not approve all their measures. One of the paragraphs says that it will soon become a question whether there will be more liberty at Philadelphia or Constantinople. The gentleman from Connecticut bitterly complains of this, as insinuating that some persons in Government intend to establish a despotic power; and in order to convince the writer of his error that gentleman not only supports the bill, but avows principles perfectly calculated to justify the assertions contained in the paragraph.

This bill and its supporters suppose, in fact, that whoever dislikes the measures of Administration and of a temporary majority in Congress, and shall, either by speaking or writing, express his disapprobation and his want of confidence in the men now in power, is seditious, is an enemy, not of Administration, but of the Constitution, and is liable to punishment. That principle, Mr. G. said, was subversive of the principles of the Constitution itself. If you put the press under any restraint in respect to the measures of members of Government; if you thus deprive the people of the means of obtaining information of their conduct, you in fact render their right of electing nugatory; and this bill must be considered only as a weapon used by a party now in power, in order to perpetuate their authority and preserve their present places.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Harper] had stated that he did not apprehend any serious mischief from the present licentiousness of the press until he had heard the speech of a member from New York [Mr. Livingston] inviting the people to resist a law of Congress. That gentleman had forgotten that the bill which he now meant to support could suppress and punish only that licentiousness of which he declared he was not afraid, and could not reach speeches of members of Congress, which, by the Constitution, could not be noticed out of these walls. This was the first attack made upon a speech delivered in this House, but what, from the gentleman from South Carolina, he had for some time expected; for, in his career, after having grossly attacked members first for writing circular letters, and then on account of their private correspondence, the next step must be to make their speeches the foundation of a sedition law. As to the speech itself, so far as he had heard the expressions alluded to, it was not an invitation to the people, or an opinion that the people should oppose the alien bill itself as unconstitutional; but merely a general position that they had a right to resist, and would resist unconstitutional and oppressive laws. He believed that doctrine to be strictly correct, and neither seditious nor treasonable. The opposite doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance had long been exploded. America had never received them. America had asserted the right of resisting unconstitutional laws, and the day we were celebrating yesterday (4th of July) is a monument of that right. It is a right to which the people of America may, perhaps, in the course of events be again obliged to resort. God forbid that we should ever see that day! But it is above all in the power of Government to avert such an evil by refraining from unconstitutional and arbitrary laws.

Mr. Dana said: The bill has been condemned as violating one of the articles adopted as amendments to the Constitution. Could the framers of the Constitution intend to guarantee, as a sacred principle, the liberty of lying against the Government? What do gentlemen understand by "the freedom of speech and of the press"? Is it a license to injure others or the Government, by calumnies, with impunity?

Let it be remembered that the uttering of malicious falsehoods, to the injury of the Government, is the offence which it is now intended to restrain; for, if what is uttered can be proved true, it will not, according to this bill, be punished as libelous.

What, then, is the rational, the honest, the constitutional idea of freedom of language or of conduct? Can it be anything more than the right of uttering and doing what is not injurious to others? This limitation of doing no injury to the rights of others undoubtedly belongs to the true character of real liberty. Indeed can it, in the nature of things, be one of the rights of freemen to do injury? For himself, Mr. D. wanted not the liberty of calumny or of conspiracy, and was in favor of the principle of the bill.

The question on rejecting the bill was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 36, nays 47.

Mr. Harper then offered an amendment to the bill, which was intended to obviate the objections against it upon the score of indefiniteness of mode of determining the crimes and trying the accused. The amendment provided that trial under the act should take place in the Federal courts in the State in which it was charged that the crime had been committed, and be conducted under the common law of libel and before juries formed according to the practice of the State.

This amendment was adopted by the casting vote of the Speaker (Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey), the vote having been 40 to 40. The debate was then continued with special bearing on the new issue injected by the amendment, namely, the enlargement of the powers of the Federal judiciary by recognition of its common law jurisdiction in criminal matters, in which matters the Republicans claimed that the State courts had sole authority save in the cases of crimes expressly enumerated in the Constitution: treason, counterfeiting Federal coin or securities, and piracy and other offences against international law.

Mr. Nicholas said: It has been the object of all regulations with respect to the press to destroy the only means by which the people can examine and become acquainted with the conduct of persons employed in their Government. If this bill be passed into a law the people will be deprived of that information on public measures which they have a right to receive, and which is the life and support of a free government; for, if printers are to be subject to prosecution for every paragraph which appears in their papers, that the eye of a jealous government can torture into an offence against this law, and to the heavy penalties here provided, it cannot be expected that they will exercise that freedom and spirit which it is desirable should actuate them; especially when they would have to be tried by judges appointed by the President, and by juries selected by the marshal, who also receives his appointment from the President, all whose feelings would, of course, be inclined to commit the offender if possible. Under such circumstances it must be seen that the printers of papers would be deterred from printing anything which should be in the least offensive to a power which might so greatly harass them. They would not only refrain from publishing anything of the least questionable nature, but they would be afraid of publishing the truth, as, though true, it might not always be in their power to establish the truth to the satisfaction of a court of justice. This bill would, therefore, go to the suppression of every printing press in the country which is not obsequious to the will of Government.

Mr. N. again asked, what are the bounds which gentlemen would draw between the liberty and licentiousness of the press? The Senate had sent them the project of one law which made it criminal to attribute bad motives to Government, even where the facts were not questionable; the House had now another project, which describes a number of other offences, all restricting the use of the press. The Constitution has not defined the bounds here spoken of. He had heard something said out of doors on the subject of common law; that the offences created by this bill are offences under it; but two gentlemen who advocate the bill had denied that the common law made any offences against the United States.

Mr. Harper said, if any expression of his was alluded to, he never said that no common law offence could be committed against the United States. He had said that there was no common-law jurisdiction in the courts of the United States; but he believed the common-law doctrine of libels as applicable to the Government of the United States as any other government.

Mr. Nicholas hoped there was no necessity for examining the opinions of the gentleman from South Carolina as to the common law being part of the law of the United States. He should like to know how the United States had adopted the common law. He should be glad to know where gentlemen found an account of their having so adopted it. Do gentlemen suppose that, in adopting the Constitution, the United States adopted the common law of all the States, which is so various, that he would venture to say no man perfectly knew it at the time, nor did he believe that any one gentleman who seems in this House to entertain that opinion is acquainted with the common law of all the States. The common law of England has undergone various improvements and modifications in the several States, which it could not be supposed would be rejected by the convention who formed the Constitution in silence. Indeed, it was to him one of the most absurd ideas imaginable. If the common law was not adopted by the Constitution, and does not form a part of it, where is the rule by which to ascertain where the liberty of the press ends and its licentiousness begins? If gentlemen say it is adopted by the Constitution, it must remain unchangeable, and there could be no authority for passing this law.

And yet, in direct opposition to the clause of the Constitution which says "Congress shall pass no law to abridge the freedom of the press," Congress is now about to pass such a law. For it is vain to talk about the licentiousness of the press, the prohibition is express, "shall pass no law to abridge," etc.

Mr. N. said he was as sensible as any other gentleman that some of our printers had abused the liberty of the press, but, notwithstanding he saw this, he was far from being convinced of either the propriety or necessity of legislative interference in the matter. Falsehoods issued from a press are not calculated to do any lasting mischief. Falsehoods will always depreciate the press from whence they proceed. He was persuaded that the publication of one falsehood in a paper would do it more mischief than the abuse of its enemies. Every publisher of a newspaper who consults his own interest and respectability will, as far as he is able to do it, make it a vehicle of correct information.

Mr. N. wished gentlemen, before they gave a final vote on this bill, to consider its effects; and, if they did this, he thought they would consent to stop here. He desired them to reflect on the nature of our Government; that all its officers are elective, and that the people have no other means of examining their conduct but by means of the press, and an unrestrained investigation through it of the conduct of the Government. Indeed, the heart and life of a free Government is a free press; take away this, and you take away its main support.

If members of the legislature are charged falsely they are in as good situations as they could wish to be to refute the charge; and it is better, according to their understanding of the matter (and he owned he concurred with them in opinion), that fifty slanderers should escape punishment than that a single oppression, with respect to the liberty of the press, should take place. More mischief would be done to the press by a single act of this kind than any possible amount of slander could do harm. Mr. N. concluded by saying that, it having been seen that, in England, when in the greatest possible state of alarm, there was no disposition to protect their representative characters against examination in the public prints, he trusted the Representatives of this free country would not consent to pass laws by which the free public examination of their own conduct will be prohibited.

Mr. Otis said: The people of the individual States brought with them as a birthright into this country the common law of England, upon which all of them have founded their statute law. If it were not for this common law many crimes which are committed in the United States would go unpunished. No State has enacted statutes for the punishment of all crimes which may be committed; yet in every State he presumed there was a superior court which claimed cognizance of all offences against good morals, and which restrained misdemeanors and opposition to the constituted authorities, under the sanction merely of the common law. When the people of the United States convened for the purpose of framing a Federal compact they were all habituated to this common law, to its usages, its maxims, and its definitions. It had been more or less explicitly recognized in the constitution of every State, and in that of Maryland it was declared to be the law of the land. If, then, we find in an instrument digested by men who were all familiarized to the common law not only that the distribution of power, and the great objects to be provided for, are congenial to that law, but that the terms and definitions by which those powers are described have an evident allusion to it, and must otherwise be quite inexplicable, or at best of a very uncertain meaning, it will be natural to conclude that, in forming the Constitution, they kept in view the model of the common law, and that a safe recourse may be had to it in all cases that would otherwise be doubtful. Thus we shall find that one great end of this compact, as appears in the preamble, is the establishment of justice, and for this purpose a judicial department is erected, whose powers are declared "to extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States," etc. Justice, if the common-law ideas of it are rejected, is susceptible of various constructions, but agreeably to the principles of that law it affords redress for every injury, and provides a punishment for every crime that threatens to disturb the lawful operations of Government. Again, what is intended by "cases at law and equity arising under the Constitution," as distinguished from cases "arising under the laws of the United States"? What other law can be contemplated but common law; what sort of equity but that legal discretion which has been exercised in England from time immemorial, and is to be learned from the books and reports of that country? If it be answered that these words comprise civil controversies only, though no reason appears for this distinction, yet what is to be done with other terms, with trial, jury, impeachment, etc., for an explanation of all which the common law alone can furnish a standard? It has been said by the gentleman that the Constitution has specified the only crimes that are cognizable under it; but other crimes had been made penal at an early period of the government, by express statute, to which no exception had been taken. For example, stealing public records, perjury, obstructing the officers of justice, bribery in a judge, and even a contract to give a bribe (which last was a restraint upon the liberty of writing and speaking) were all punishable, and why? Not because they are described in the Constitution, but because they are crimes against the United States—because laws against them are necessary to carry other laws into effect; because they tend to subvert the Constitution. The same reasons applied to the offences mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Otis contended that this construction of the Constitution was abundantly supported by the act for establishing the judicial courts. That act, in describing certain powers of the district court, contains this remarkable expression: "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law was competent to give it." He could not tell whence this competency was derived, unless from the Constitution; nor did he perceive how this competency applied to civil and not to criminal cases.

It was, therefore, most evident to his mind that the Constitution of the United States, prior to the amendments that have been added to it, secured to the National Government the cognizance of all the crimes enumerated in the bill, and it only remained to be considered whether those amendments divested it of this power. The amendment quoted by the gentleman from Virginia is in these words: "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech and of the press." The terms "freedom of speech and of the press," he supposed, were a phraseology perfectly familiar in the jurisprudence of every State, and of a certain and technical meaning. It was a mode of expression which we had borrowed from the only country in which it had been tolerated, and he pledged himself to prove that the construction which he should give to those terms should be consonant not only to the laws of that country, but to the laws and judicial decisions of many of the States composing the Union. This freedom, said Mr. O., is nothing more than the liberty of writing, publishing, and speaking one's thoughts, under the condition of being answerable to the injured party, whether it be the Government or an individual, for false, malicious, and seditious expressions, whether spoken or written; and the liberty of the press is merely an exemption from all previous restraints. In support of this doctrine, he quoted Blackstone's "Commentaries," under the head of libels, and read an extract to prove that in England, formerly, the press was subject to a licenser; and that this restraint was afterward removed, by which means the freedom of the press was established. He would not, however, dwell upon the law of England, the authority of which it might suit the convenience of gentlemen to question; but he would demonstrate that, although in several of the State constitutions the liberty of speech and of the press were guarded by the most express and unequivocal language, the legislatures and judicial departments of those States had adopted the definitions of the English law, and provided for the punishment of defamatory and seditious libels. [Mr. Otis here cited laws made by a number of the States.]

In all these instances it is clearly understood that to punish licentiousness and sedition is not a restraint or abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press.

The gentleman from Virginia had inquired how a line could be drawn between the liberty and licentiousness of the press? He would inform him that an honest jury was competent to such a discrimination, they could decide upon the falsehood and malice of the intention. How, said he, do they draw a line of discrimination in the case of a forgery of public security? This crime is effected through the medium of the press or of the pen. How can they punish the intent when a man offers a bribe to a judge, which may be done by words only? These are offences which the gentlemen would anxiously discountenance. Yet forgery is only the liberty of the press upon his construction, and an offer of bribery is merely freedom of speech. Is it not a restraint upon the freedom of speech that the people in the gallery are not allowed to join in this debate? Yet this would hardly be permitted. Why, then, said Mr. O., are gentlemen so feelingly alive on this subject? Where lies the injury in attempting to check the progress of calumny and falsehood? Or how is society aided by the gross and monstrous outrages upon truth and honor and public character and private peace which inundate the country? Can there be any necessity of allowing anonymous and irresponsible accusers to drag before the tribunal of public opinion magistrates, and men in office, upon false and groundless charges? There are sixteen legislatures in the United States, in which all the measures of Government are open to investigation. There are two Houses of Congress, in which every accusation and suspicion may have free vent, wherein our jealousies and prejudices may be uttered without restraint, and every man will still be at liberty to print and speak at pleasure; but he must be prepared to prove those charges which bring disgrace upon his fellow-citizens. No reasonable being can desire a greater latitude than this. But the gentleman from Virginia is fearful that an impartial jury will not be found in the present excited state of the public opinion; but if twelve honest men cannot be found to acquit a libellist he ought to be convicted. He urges further that, even in Great Britain, Parliament has never made laws to restrain censorious remarks upon its measures; but, in Great Britain, libels as well against Parliament as other bodies of men are offences at common law. Neither does the present bill restrain a free animadversion upon the proceedings of Congress or the conduct of its members; it merely prohibits calumny and deception.

Mr. Macon proceeded to quote the opinions of the leading members in several of the State conventions, in order to show, from the opinions of the friends of the Constitution, that it was never understood that prosecutions for libels could take place under the general Government; but that they must be carried on in the State courts, as the Constitution gave no power to Congress to pass laws on this subject. Not a single member in any of the conventions gave an opinion to the contrary.

Mr. M. also quoted the opinions of members of Congress at the time the amendments to the Constitution were adopted, to prove the same thing, and inquired how it was come to pass, notwithstanding all the positive opinions which he had quoted to the contrary, that Congress should now conceive that they have power to pass laws on this subject? He could himself find no ground to justify the change.

Gentlemen, Mr. M. said, might call this a harmless bill; but however harmless it may be it is a beginning to act upon forbidden ground, and no one can say to what extent it may hereafter be carried. He thought this subject of the liberty of the press was sacred, and ought to be left where the Constitution had left it. The States have complete power on the subject, and when Congress legislates it ought to have confidence in the States, as the States ought also to have confidence in Congress, or our Government is gone. This Government depends upon the State legislatures for existence. They have only to refuse to elect Senators to Congress, and all is gone. He believed there was nowhere any complaint of a want of proper laws under the State governments; and though there may not be remedies found for every grievance in the general Government, what it wants of power will be found in the State governments, and there can be no doubt but that power will be duly exercised when necessity calls for it.

Mr. Livingston said that, notwithstanding that kind of accommodating principle which has been set up and reiterated, that the powers of this Constitution extend to every possible case —a principle which goes to the destruction of State authorities, and makes that instrument mean anything or nothing—he should again venture to engage the attention of the House while he endeavored to show that this bill is not only contrary to the spirit, but to the direct letter of the Constitution.

The Constitution declares that "no law shall be passed to abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." Let us inquire, said Mr. L., what was the liberty enjoyed at the time this declaration was agreed to, and see whether citizens will enjoy the same liberty after this law passes that they then enjoyed. Will gentlemen say that the same liberty of writing and speaking did not exist then that now exists? If they will not say this, must they not allow that the Constitution is positive in prohibiting any change in this respect? Gentlemen may call this liberty an evil, if they please; if it be an evil (which he was far from believing) it is an evil perpetrated by the Constitution.

The Constitution seems to have contemplated cases which might arise at a future day. It seems to have foreseen that majorities (far be it from him to believe the present majority is of the number) might be actuated by dispositions hostile to the Government; that it might wish to pass laws to suppress the only means by which its corrupt views might be made known to the people, and therefore says, no law shall be passed to abridge the liberty of speech and of the press. This privilege is connected with another dear and valuable privilege—the liberty of conscience. What is liberty of conscience? Gentlemen may tomorrow establish a national religion agreeably to the opinion of a majority of this House, on the ground of an uniformity of worship being more consistent with public happiness than a diversity of worship. The doing of this is not less forbidden than the act which the House are about to do. But, it is said, will you suffer a printer to abuse his fellow-citizens with impunity, ascribing his conduct to the very worst of motives? Is no punishment to be inflicted on such a person? Yes. There is a remedy for offences of this kind in the laws of every State in the Union. Every man's character is protected by law, and every man who shall publish a libel on any part of the Government is liable to punishment. Not, said Mr. L., by laws which we ourselves have made, but by laws passed by the several States. And is not this most proper? Suppose a libel were written against the President, where is it most probable that such an offence would receive an impartial trial? In a court, the judges of which are appointed by the President, by a jury selected by an officer holding his office at the will of the President, or in a court independent of any influence whatever? The States are as much interested in the preservation of the general Government as we are. We do wrong when we attempt to set up interests independent of the States. They are all desirous of preserving the Constitution as it now stands; and it is, therefore, much more probable that justice will be found in a court in which neither of the parties have influence than in one which is wholly in the power of the President.

But it is said this Government is liable to suffer abuse of the worst kind; the worst motives may be attributed to it, the most false statements made with respect to its conduct, and no hand can be held out to protect it. For his own part, he believed there ought to be no such power. He believed every independent government was equal to the protection of its private or public character; but when gentlemen speak of slanders against the Government, he knew of no such thing. We are charged, for instance, with passing an unconstitutional act—with violating our oaths. What answer is it proposed we should make to the charge? We are not to disprove the fact, and let the public judge between us, but we are immediately to prosecute the man who makes the charge. You may, by thus acting, establish error as soon as truth; you put them both on the same footing; you crush them by force of arms, and not by the force of reason. This is the same system which heretofore lighted the fires of Smithfield, and which has produced so much bloodshed and ruin among mankind.

But even the constitutional objection to this bill, great as it is, is of small importance, when it is considered in another point of view. He looked upon it as a link in a chain of events leading to the most serious consequences—events which he had always opposed and constantly deplored—leading to a practical change in our Government. Gentlemen may think this is not so. He had frequently heard them speak of weak and rotten parts of the system; they may wish only to strengthen the weak parts, and cut out the rotten. But, Mr. L. said, he admired the Constitution in its present form; he had superadded to this admiration the sanction of an oath. Both inclination and duty, therefore, led him to oppose measures which, in his opinion, went to a radical change of it.

Many writers have amused themselves, and instructed the world, by delineating the means by which free governments gradually become oppressive; and some of them the means by which free governments become despotisms. He would take the liberty of reading an extract out of one of the best writings he had seen on this subject—the best in this view: as it shows how a government, organized like ours, may come to destruction. He would barely read the passage, and, if it did not make an impression on the minds of gentlemen, he should despair of saying anything that would. [Mr. Dana inquired the name of the author.] Mr. Livingston replied the book he alluded to was John Adams's "Defence of the American Constitution." While he read this, he wished it to be recollected that it had been declared on this floor that none but men of a certain political opinion would be chosen by the President to office. Mr. L. then read as follows:

"A few eminent, conspicuous characters will be continued in their seats in the Sovereign Assembly, from one election to another, whatever changes are made in the seats around them. By superior art, address, and opulence; by more splendid birth, reputation, and connections, they will be able to intrigue with the people, and their leaders out of doors, until they worm out most of their opposers and introduce their friends. To this end, they will bestow all offices, contracts, privileges in commerce, and other emoluments, on the latter, and their connections, and throw every vexation and disappointment in the way of the former, until they establish such a system of hopes and fears throughout the State as shall enable them to carry a majority in every fresh election of the House. The judges will be appointed by them and their party, and, of consequence, will be obsequious enough to their inclinations. The whole judicial authority, as well as the executive, will be employed, perverted, and prostituted to the purposes of electioneering. No justice will be attainable, nor will innocence or virtue be safe in the judiciary courts, but for the friends of the prevailing leaders. Legal prosecutions will be instituted and carried on against opposers, to their vexation and ruin; and, as they have the public purse at command, as well as the executive and judicial power, the public money will be expended in the same way. No favors will be attainable but by those who will court the ruling demagogues in the House by voting for their friends and instruments; and pensions and pecuniary rewards and gratifications, as well as honor and offices of every kind, will be voted to friends and partisans. The leading minds and most influential characters among the clergy will be courted, and the views of the youth in this department will be turned upon those men, and the road to promotion and employment in the church will be obstructed against such as will not worship the general idol. Capital characters among the physicians will not be forgotten, and the means of acquiring reputation in the practice of the healing art will be to get the State trumpeters on the side of youth. The bar, too, will be made so subservient that a young gentleman will have no chance to obtain a character, or clients, but by falling in with the views of the judges and their creators. Even the theaters and actors and actresses must become politicians, and convert the public pleasures into engines of popularity for the governing members of the House. The press, that great barrier and bulwark of the rights of mankind, when it is protected in its freedom by law, can now no longer be free; if the authors, writers, and printers will not accept of the hire that will be offered them, they must submit to the ruin that will be denounced against them. The presses, with much secrecy and concealment, will be made the vehicles of calumny against the minority, and of panegyric and empirical applause of the leaders of the majority, and no remedy can possibly be obtained. In one word, the whole system of affairs, and every conceivable motive of hope and fear, will be employed to promote the private interests of a few, and their obsequious majority; and there is no remedy but in arms!"

Sad remedy! He hoped the people of this country would never be forced to have recourse to it. If the fatal tendency of certain measures be what is here described (and he believed the representation to be a just one), it behooved us to beware in time.

Mr. L. would be glad if gentlemen would inform the House of any good which would be derived from the passage of this bill —of any evil which it will remedy? If they could not do this, he further entreated them to think of the evils which it may produce. He feared it would lessen the confidence of the people in the Government. By the addresses which we see pour in from every quarter it would seem that this confidence is now possessed, and he hoped Government would be careful not to lose it. But to judge from addresses alone was but a fallacious mode of judging. In proof of this Mr. L. referred to Dalrymple's "History of the Reign of James I," which shows that this monarch was overpowered with the most fulsome addresses, at a time when the people in general were disaffected to his government to the highest degree. This, he said, was a strong historical fact, which ought to have its due weight. The political situation of this country very much resembles that of England at the time alluded to.

The effect of this bill may be to lift a few men into consequence who were never of any before, and to ruin two or three others; but it will be in vain to attempt to hide the misconduct of Government from the people. The thing will defeat its own end. They will, besides, be struck with the flagrant breach which it makes in the Constitution, compared with which, he looked upon war, pestilence, and every other calamity as of trifling consequence. Time may remove these, but of an unforgiving, dreary despotism who can see the end? God forbid that we should ever be called upon to employ our talents to the overturning of such a government!

Mr. Gallatin observed: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Otis] had attempted to prove the constitutionality of the bill by asserting, in the first place, that the power to punish libels was originally vested in Congress by the Constitution, and, in the next place, that the amendment to the Constitution, which declares that Congress shall not pass any law abridging the liberty of the press, had not deprived them of the power originally given. In order to establish his first position the gentleman had thought it sufficient to insist that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States extended to the punishment of offences at common law, that is to say, of offences not arising under the statutes or laws of the Union—an assertion unfounded in itself, and which, if proven, would not support the point he endeavors to establish. That assertion was unfounded; for the judicial authority of those courts is, by the Constitution, declared to extend to cases of admiralty, or affecting public ministers; to suits between States, citizens of different States, or foreigners, and to cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties, made under the authority of that Constitution; excluding, therefore, cases not arising under either—cases arising under the common law. Nor was that gentleman more fortunate in his choice of arguments when he thought he could derive any proofs in support of the supposed jurisdiction of the Federal courts from the number of technical expressions in the Constitution—such as writ of habeas corpus, levying war, etc., which, as he supposed, recognized the common law. He had there confounded two very distinct ideas—the principles of the common law, and the jurisdiction over cases arising under it. That those principles were recognized in the cases where the courts had jurisdiction was not denied; but such a recognition could by no means extend the jurisdiction beyond the specific cases defined by the Constitution. But, had that gentleman succeeded in proving the existence of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over offences at common law, and more particularly over libels, he would thereby have adduced the strongest argument against the passing of this bill; for, if the jurisdiction did exist, where was the necessity of now giving it? If the judicial authority of the Federal courts, by the Constitution, extended to the punishment of libels, it was unnecessary to pass this law, which, modified as it is, was intended by its supporters for the sole purpose of enacting into a law of the United States the common law of libels. The question was not whether the courts of the United States had, without this law, the power to punish libels, but whether, supposing they had not the power, Congress had that of giving them this jurisdiction—whether Congress were vested by the Constitution with the authority of passing this bill?

The only clause of the Constitution which can give a color to the authority now claimed is that which gives Congress authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

But the language here used was strict and precise; it gave not a vague power, arbitrarily, to create offences against Government, or to take cognizance of cases which fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State courts. In order to claim any authority under this clause the supporters of this bill must show the specific power given to Congress or to the President, by some other part of the Constitution, which would be carried into effect by a law against libels. They must go further—they must show which of those constitutional powers it was which could not be carried into effect, unless this law was passed. It was in that manner that the authority of Congress had heretofore been exercised; they had passed no penal laws, except such as arose from the necessity of carrying into effect some of the specific powers vested in them. Thus, as they had the exclusive power to establish post roads, they had made it penal to rob the mail; and as they were authorized to lay taxes, they had passed laws to punish frauds of revenue officers, or evasions of the revenue laws. But, until this bill was proposed, Congress had never attempted to define or punish offences generally; and the gentleman from Massachusetts was mistaken when he had stated that forgery was generally punishable by the laws of the United States. It was only in those specific cases defined by the Constitution, or which arose from some power heretofore exercised by Congress, that forgery came under the jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

The bill now under discussion justified the suspicions of those who, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, had apprehended that the sense of that generally expressed clause might be distorted for that purpose. It was in order to remove these fears that the amendment, which declares that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or the liberty of the press, was proposed and adopted—an amendment which was intended as an express exception to any supposed general power of passing laws, etc., vested in Congress by the other clause. The sense in which he and his friends understood this amendment was that Congress could not pass any law to punish any real or supposed abuse of the press. The construction given to it by the supporters of the bill was that it did not prevent them to punish what they called the licentiousness of the press, but merely forbade their laying any previous restraints upon it. It appeared to him preposterous to say that to punish a certain act was not an abridgment of the liberty of doing that act. It appeared to him that it was an insulting evasion of the Constitution for gentlemen to say, "We claim no power to abridge the liberty of the press; that you shall enjoy unrestrained. You may write and publish what you please, but if you publish anything against us we will punish you for it. So long as we do not prevent, but only punish your writings, it is no abridgment of your liberty of writing and printing."

The Government has existed for more than nine years without the assistance of this law. This law is not, then, necessary at all times; indeed, it is intended only to last for three years. Let, then, gentlemen prove that that necessity now exists which heretofore did not exist. It is an obligation laid upon them by the Constitution itself, evidently, to prove that an alteration has taken place in the situation of this country which impels us to pass this law. And yet they are silent. Where is the House to find proofs of that wonderful, yet unknown, change in our circumstances? Will they derive their information from the newspaper scraps with which they had been entertained, the other day, by a member from Connecticut? as if there was anything alarming or novel in paragraphs blaming or attacking certain measures or certain individuals of Government; as if the present Administration felt more afraid of newspaper abuse than former Administrations, or than other men. Or is Congress to receive a conviction of that alteration from the plot which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Harper] had promised to unfold—a plot in which not one member on this floor did believe, when it was announced, and in which he suspected the gentleman himself had long since discovered he had been mistaken? Leaving, however, those ridiculous grounds of alarm (and, ludicrous as it might appear to an indifferent hearer, they were the only ones that had yet been alleged in support of this bill), Mr. G. would ask whether gentlemen did not believe themselves that at no time had there been less to be apprehended from presses that circulated opinions in opposition to the measures of Government; that no reason could be adduced why this bill should pass, except that a party in the United States, feeling that they had more power, were not afraid of passing such a law, and would pass it, because they felt themselves so strong—so little in need of the assistance of that measure—that they expected to be supported by the people, even in that flagrant attack upon the Constitution?

But if gentlemen believe this bill necessary in order to enable this House to do their duty, they must recollect that this House is composed of individuals, and that, according to their own doctrine, in order to insure a conscientious vote in the whole House, every individual, and not a majority of the House, ought to be equally sheltered by this law from the abuse of printers. While, therefore, they support the bill in its present shape, do they not avow that the true object of the law is to enable one party to oppress the other; that they mean to have the power to punish printers who may publish against them, while their opponents will remain alone, and without redress, exposed to the abuse of ministerial prints? Is it not their object to frighten and suppress all presses which they consider as contrary to their views; to prevent a free circulation of opinion; to suffer the people at large to hear only partial accounts, and but one side of the question; to delude and deceive them by partial information, and, through those means, to perpetuate themselves in power?

In vain did those gentlemen attempt to shelter themselves under the different pleas that this bill could only affect the authors of false publications, since any man might justify his writings by giving in evidence the truth of his assertions; and that it created no new offence, but only reënacted what had always been the common law of libels.

It was true that, so far as related merely to facts, a man would be acquitted by proving that what he asserted was true. But the bill was intended to punish solely writings of a political nature, libels against the Government, the President, or either branch of the legislature; and it was well known that writings, containing animadversions on public measures almost always contained, not only facts, but opinions. And how could the truth of opinions be proven by evidence? If an individual thinking, as he himself did, that the present bill was unconstitutional, and that it had been intended, not for the public good, but solely for party purposes, should avow and publish his opinion, and if the Administration thought fit to prosecute him for that supposed individual offence, would a jury, composed of the friends of that Administration, hesitate much in declaring the opinion ungrounded, or, in other words, false and scandalous, and its publication malicious? And by what kind of argument or evidence, in the present temper of parties, could the accused convince them that his opinion was true?

As to the assertion that the bill, under its present modifications, was nothing more than the common law of libels, he would observe that no gentleman could be satisfied that the few lines of which the bill consisted contained the genuine and unadulterated principles of the law of libels—a law which had arisen from the precedents and judicial decisions of three centuries; a law which, like every other branch of the common law of England, had received different modifications in the different States, so as to be now dissimilar in every one. He had not critically examined the bill in that point of view; but he would just notice a mode of expression which, if strictly construed, would introduce a principle now unknown to the common law of libels. By the bill, every person who should write, print, utter, or publish, etc., was guilty; so that a person only writing what might be adjudged a libel, although he neither printed, published, read, nor communicated his work to anyone, and although he did not intend it for publication, might, like Algernon Sidney, be found guilty, under this act, for the offence only of having thrown his ideas on paper.

But, although there might be no change made by this bill in the law of libels, there was an all-important one made by the transfer of jurisdiction. Heretofore the cognizance of offences of this nature had exclusively belonged to the State courts, and the mode of trial was essentially altered by being had before the Federal courts. It was not only by being deprived of the benefits of a trial by a jury of their vicinage that the accused persons were put in a worse situation; the manner of selecting the jury was, in some States, very different in the courts of the United States from what it was in the State courts. In Pennsylvania, if the prosecution was before the State court, the jury would be summoned by the sheriff, but if before the Federal court, the marshal, in that case, would summon the jury. The difference in this case was immense. The sheriff was the officer of the people, the marshal was the creature of the Executive. And, however immaterial this might be in ordinary suits or prosecutions, when the offences were, as under this bill, altogether of a political nature; when the supposed crimes to be punished were a libel against the Administration, what security of a fair trial remained to a citizen, when the jury was liable to be packed by the Administration, when the same men were to be judges and parties?

After having given this short sketch of the features of this bill Mr. G. said he had intended to make some general remarks on the nature of political libels, or of writings against the measures of the Administration, and on the propriety of interfering at all by law with them. The lateness of the hour prevented him. He would only observe that laws against writings of this kind had uniformly been one of the most powerful engines used by tyrants to prevent the diffusion of knowledge, to throw a veil on their folly or their crimes, to satisfy those mean passions which always denote little minds, and to perpetuate their own tyranny. The principles of the law of political libels were to be found in the rescripts of the worst Emperors of Rome, in the decisions of the Star Chamber. Princes of elevated minds, governments actuated by pure motives, despising the slanders of malice, had ever listened to the animadversions made on their conduct. They knew that the proper weapon to combat error was truth, and that to resort to coercion and punishments in order to suppress writings attacking their measures was to confess that these could not be defended by any other means.

Mr. Harper said, in the first place, gentlemen who oppose the bill had said that hitherto the Government of the United States had existed and prospered without a law of this kind, and then exultingly asked: "What change has now taken place to render such a law necessary?" The change, in his opinion, consisted in this: that, heretofore, we had been at peace and were now on the point of being driven into a war with a nation which openly boasted of its party among us, and its "diplomatic skill," as the most effectual means of paralyzing our efforts and bringing us to its own terms. Of the operations of this skill among us, by means of corrupt partisans and hired presses, he had no doubt; he was every day furnished with stronger reasons for believing in its existence and saw stronger indications of its systematic exertion. We knew its effects in other countries, where it had aided the progress of France much more effectually than the force of her arms. He knew no reason why we should not harbor traitors in our bosom as well as other nations; and he did most firmly believe that France had a party in this country, small, indeed, and sure to be disgraced and destroyed as soon as its designs should become generally known, but active, artful, and determined, and capable, if it could remain concealed, of effecting infinite mischief. This party was the instrument of her "diplomatic skill." By this party she hoped to stop "the wheels of our Government," enchain our strength, enfeeble our efforts, and, finally, subdue us; and, to repress the enterprises of this party he wished for a law against sedition and libels, the two great instruments whereby France and her partisans had worked for the destruction of other countries, and he had no doubt were now working, he trusted unsuccessfully, for the destruction of this.

He could not, therefore, believe that our safety hitherto ought to lull us into security now; unless gentlemen could convince him that, because a person had existed in health for nine years, he ought to refuse medicine when he at length felt the approach of disease; or, when he saw the daggers of assassins everywhere whetted against him, should neglect to put on a coat of mail because for nine years he had not been assailed. The coat of mail which Congress was about to provide in this law might turn away the point of some dagger aimed at the heart of the Government, and, in that case, it would, he said, be matter of rejoicing that the bill had passed. Should no such case occur, then, like a sword, which there has been no occasion to draw, it will have done no harm.

He admitted that there was plausibility in the objection founded on that part of the Constitution which provides that "Congress shall pass no law to abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." He held this to be one of the most sacred parts of the Constitution, one by which he would stand the longest and defend with the greatest zeal. But to what, he asked, did this clause amount? Did this liberty of the press include sedition and licentiousness? Did it authorize persons to throw, with impunity, the most violent abuse upon the President and both Houses of Congress? Was this what gentlemen meant by the liberty of the press? As well might it be said that the liberty of action implied the liberty of assault, trespass, or assassination. Every man possessed the liberty of action; but, if he used this liberty to the detriment of others, by attacking their persons or destroying their property, he became liable to punishment for this licentious abuse of his liberty. The liberty of the press stood on precisely the same footing. Every man might publish what he pleased; but, if he abused this liberty so as to publish slanders against his neighbor, or false, scandalous, and malicious libels against the magistrates or the Government, he became liable to punishment. What did this law provide? That, if "any person should publish any false, scandalous, and malicious libel against the President or Congress, or either House of Congress, with intent to stir up sedition, or to produce any other of the mischievous and wicked effects particularly described in the bill, he should, on conviction before a jury, be liable to fine and imprisonment." A jury is to try the offence, and they must determine, from the evidence and the circumstances of the case, first, that the publication is false, secondly, that it is scandalous, thirdly that it is malicious, and, fourthly, that it was made with the intent to do some one of the things particularly described in the bill. If, in any one of these points, the proof should fail, the man must be acquitted; and it is expressly provided that he may give the truth of the publication in evidence as a justification. Such is the substance of this law; and yet it is called a law abridging the liberty of the press! That is to say, that the liberty of the press implies the liberty of publishing, with impunity, false, scandalous, and malicious writings, with intent to stir up sedition, etc. As well might it be said that the liberty of action implies the liberty to rob and murder with impunity!

Whence was it, Mr. H. asked, that all confidence in the trial by jury was now discarded by those gentlemen who have heretofore so warmly and so justly sounded its praises? Why are juries, in whose hands the fortunes, the lives, and the reputations of the citizens had been safely deposited by our laws and Constitutions, no longer to be trusted when it is in question to punish those who, with wicked intent, publish false, scandalous, and malicious libels against the President and Congress? Is this offence of so sacred a nature, so dear to gentlemen, that the authors of it cannot be trusted in the hands of a jury of their fellow-citizens?

Such, Mr. H. said, had ever been his impressions concerning the liberty of the press, which he deemed to stand on the same ground, and to be liable to the same restraints by law, as the liberty of action; nor could he be persuaded that the liberty of the press, as understood by the Constitution, could ever be abridged by a law to punish, on conviction before a jury, the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious libels. He was very happy to find his opinions fully supported by those of a most venerable man, whose character was admired and revered by all, and who could never be suspected of wishing to abridge the liberty of the press. He held in his hand a little volume of essays by the late Dr. Franklin, among which there was one entitled "An Account of the Highest Court of Judicature in Pennsylvania, viz.: the Court of the Press."

Speaking of "the checks proper to be established against the abuses of power in the court of the press" the venerable and ingenious author says:

"Hitherto there are none. But since so much has been written and published on the Federal Constitution, and the necessity of checks, in all other parts of good government, has been so clearly and learnedly explained, I find myself so far enlightened as to suspect some check may be proper in this part also; but I have been at a loss to imagine any that may not be construed an infringement of the sacred liberty of the press. At length, however, I think I have found one that, instead of diminishing general liberty, will augment it; which is by restoring to the people a species of liberty of which they have been deprived by our laws; I mean the liberty of the cudgel! In the rude state of society, prior to the existence of laws, if one man gave another ill language, the affronted person might return it by a box on the ear; and, if repeated, by a good drubbing; and this without offending against any law; but now the right of making such returns is denied, and they are punished as breaches of the peace, while the right of abusing seems to remain in full force; the laws made against it being rendered ineffectual by the liberty of the press.

"My proposal, then, is to leave the liberty of the press untouched, to be executed in its full extent, force, and vigor, but to permit the liberty of the cudgel to go with it, pari passu. Thus, my fellow-citizens, if an impudent writer attacks your reputation, dearer to you perhaps than your life, and puts his name to the charge, you may go to him, as openly, and break his head. If he conceals himself behind the printer, and you can nevertheless discover who he is, you may, in like manner, waylay him in the night, attack him behind, and give him a good drubbing. If your adversary hires better writers than himself to abuse you more effectually, you may hire brawny porters, stronger than yourself, to assist you in giving him a more effectual drubbing. Thus far goes my project as to private resentment and restitution. But if the government should ever happen to be affronted, as it ought to be, with the conduct of such writers, I would not advise proceeding immediately to these extremities, but that we should, in moderation, content ourselves with tarring and feathering and tossing them in a blanket.

"If, however, it should be thought that this proposal of mine may disturb the public peace, I would then humbly recommend to our legislators to take up the consideration of both liberties, that of the press, and that of the cudgel; and, by an explicit law, mark their extent and limits; and, at the same time that they secure the person of a citizen from assaults, they would likewise provide for the security of his reputation."

Thus we see, continued Mr. H., that this great man, the champion of liberty, who spent his life in promoting her cause, did not think that the liberty of the press would be abridged by an explicit law for curbing its licentiousness. Supported by this great authority, I can never believe that a law to punish the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious libels, on conviction by a jury, is a law "to abridge the liberty of the press," as intended by the Constitution.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Livingston] has thought proper to quote a very venerable authority, the "Defence of the American Constitution," by the present President of the United States, in order to prove that this Government is advancing rapidly to a despotism. The passage is very striking, and most forcibly marks the steps of progressing tyranny. Most of those steps, the gentleman declares, have been, or are on the point of being, taken by this Government. But there is one part of the passage which he has forgotten to notice. Let me be permitted to recall it to his attention. The learned and venerable author is treating of the tendency toward despotism which exists in a Government composed of one branch, or whose whole powers are concentrated in one popular assembly; and, in order to warn us of the dangers of such a government, and inculcate the necessity of a division of power for the support of liberty, he tells us how the great men, the heads and leaders of the great and wealthy families, find their way into such an assembly and acquire an absolute influence over its decisions. He then goes on to mark the steps, those very steps, quoted by the gentleman from New York, whereby they render their seats permanent, stifle opposition, subjugate the assembly, usurp its powers, and, at length, establish an oligarchy or a despotism on the ruins of the democracy. Let the House recollect how persevering and vigorous have been the efforts of the gentleman from New York and his political associates to pave the way for this state of things by concentrating gradually, sometimes under one pretext and sometimes under another, all the powers of our Government in this House, by demolishing, piece by piece, the checks established in the Senate and the executive power; and then it will be able to judge to whom his quotation is most applicable; to himself and his friends, or to those who strenuously have opposed, and who do still oppose, these his enterprises; to those who struggle to preserve the division of power and the balance of the Constitution, or to those who exert all their might to destroy them both and reduce the Government to a single representative democracy on which that oligarchy, so earnestly panted after by self-named friends of the people and exclusive patriots, is so speedily and so certainly engrafted.

The bill was then passed—yeas 44, nays 41.

Of the Sedition Law Alexander Johnston remarks in his "American Political History":

"If the doctrine of the Federalists was correct (and it was certainly never contradicted by the Federal courts until fourteen years had passed, and the judiciary, with the other departments of Government, had fallen into Democratic hands), then the Sedition Law was a very salutary remedial modification of the common law, since it allowed the truth to be given in evidence and laid down bounds of punishment which the judges could not pass. If, on the other hand, the Republican doctrine was correct, the Sedition Law was a pernicious precedent, since, by making a common-law offence statutory, it implied a common-law criminal jurisdiction in the Federal courts, wherever statutes did not interfere. The Republicans had little legal talent in their ranks in 1798 and had made little open opposition to the Federalist claims on this point."

This last statement is surprising, coming as it does from such a distinguished writer on American politics. Certainly the foregoing debate proves the exact contrary of the assertion: the Federalists had no representatives in Congress whose legal ability was at all equal to that of Gallatin and Livingston, and these brilliant and learned debaters certainly made the boldest, strongest, and most thorough opposition to the Federalist claims on the point in question. The only explanation of Professor Johnston's error is that, instead of consulting the original sources, he must have followed Senator Benton's "Abridgment of the Debates of Congress," in which the final exhaustive argument of Gallatin against the encroachment of the Federal judiciary on the jurisdiction of the State courts is entirely omitted, and the argument of Livingston on the same point is too greatly abridged, while space is unnecessarily given to Livingston's argument against the obvious unconstitutionality of the restriction of liberty of the press. Nevertheless Benton gives very fully the arguments against Federal jurisdiction which were presented by Nathaniel Macon, whose legal talent was at least equal to that of any Federalist Representative.

AS has been noted no prosecutions were made under the Alien Laws. Those that were instituted under the Sedition Law were plainly partisan in their animus. Thus, as Professor Johnston instances, Hamilton, between whom and Adams enmity had arisen through the political ambition either of one or the other, or of both, published an attack on President John Adams, charging him with "disgusting egotism, distempered jealousy, ungovernable indiscretion, and arrogant pretence to superior and exclusive merit," and yet, because of his prominence in his party, Hamilton was not prosecuted, while certain Republicans were arrested and tried (though unsuccessfully) for the mere circulation of petitions against the law or for the lèse-majesté of wishing, on the occasion of a military salute to the President, that the wadding of a cannon might strike him in the broadest part of his person. Some of the Republican leaders expressed the apprehension that, in the event of their party securing a majority in the next House, the Federalists would attempt to remove enough of their opponents to retain the present control. This fear, however, proved unfounded.

According to a long accepted view, as acknowledged leaders of their party Jefferson and Madison proceeded to procure the overthrow of the obnoxious Sedition Law by organizing a counter-revolution against it in the State legislatures. They very judiciously selected the strongly Republican States of Kentucky and Virginia in which to begin the movement. For the legislature of the former State Jefferson prepared certain resolutions.[1] They were passed by the House on November 10, by the Senate on November 13, and signed by the Governor on November 19, 1798. Their substance is as follows:

The Kentucky Resolutions

Drafted by Thomas Jefferson

1. The union of the States is a compact by which each State delegated to the Federal Government definite powers, reserving to itself the residuary mass of right to their own self-government. When, therefore, the Federal Government assumes undelegated powers its acts are void. The Federal Government was not constituted by the compact a final judge of the extent of its delegated powers, since this would have made its discretion, and not the Constitution, the measure of its powers. The Constitution established no common judge between the Federal Government and the State governments, and, according to the practice in all compacts of this kind, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress.

2. Congress has the right to pass laws for the punishment of no other crimes than those expressly mentioned in the Constitution as under its jurisdiction.

[1] For a recent, and, to the editor's mind, a more acceptable theory of the origin of these resolutions, see the Introduction to Volume V, by President Warfield, on this subject.

3. By the general principle of the compact (the Constitution) power over speech and the press is reserved to the States, and by a specific amendment thereto (No. 1) is expressly prohibited to the Federal Government. Therefore, by 1 and 2, the Sedition Law is void, and, by 1,

4. The Alien Laws are void.

5. The Alien Laws are also void because of Article I, Section 9, Par. 1, of the Constitution, which reserves to the States until 1808 all control over the migration and importation of such persons as they shall think proper to admit.

6. The Alien Laws are void, because they are contrary to the amendments to the Constitution, which provide that "no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law" (No. V) and that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right of a public trial by an impartial jury," etc. (No. VI), and also because the Alien Laws transfer the jurisdiction of aliens from the courts to the President, contrary to Article III, Section 1 of the Constitution.

7. The broad construction, by the Administration, of Article I, Section 8, Par. 1, of the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to collect taxes, etc., and provide for the common defence and general welfare," and of Par. 18 in the same section: "To make all laws . . . necessary . . . for carrying into execution the . . . powers vested . . . in the Government," is inadmissible, since these powers are subsidiary to the execution of limited powers mentioned in the context, and, if the paragraphs are construed independently as giving unlimited powers, the whole residue of the Constitution will be destroyed. All proceedings under a broad construction of these paragraphs will be a fit and necessary subject for revision at a time of greater tranquillity, and the specific Alien and Sedition Laws call for immediate redress.

8. These resolutions shall be transmitted to the Senators and Representatives from Kentucky, who are enjoined to use their efforts to procure a repeal of the said acts.

9. These resolutions shall be transmitted to the legislatures of the States as an expression of Kentucky's views of the Constitution, and its fears of the destruction of the intent of that instrument and of the rights of the States by the general Government and, especially, the President, who is arrogating to himself powers which may lead to his becoming accuser, counsel, judge, and jury, his suspicions being the evidence, his order the sentence, his officer the executioner, and his breast the sole record of the transaction. A similar assumption of powers is in process in Congress, which may lead to the exportation or punishment, by the majority, of the minority, and of officers of the various States who oppose their plans. These usurpations, unless arrested on the threshold, may tend to drive the States into revolution and so furnish new arguments for despots against republics. It would be a dangerous delusion were a confidence in the men of our choice to silence our fears for the safety of our rights: confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism; free government is founded in jealousy, and not in confidence. Hence the limits fixed in our Constitution. Let the honest advocate of confidence read the Alien and Sedition Laws and say if the Constitution was not wise in fixing these limits; let him say what this government is, if it be not a tyranny, when the President of our choice exercises unconstitutional powers over the friendly strangers to whom the mild spirit of our country and its laws had pledged hospitality and protection, and when Senators and Representatives of our choice uphold him in so doing, regarding more the bare suspicions of the President than the solid rights of innocence, the claims of justification, the sacred force of truth, and the forms and substance of law and justice.

In questions of power, then, let no more be said of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution.

This commonwealth calls on its co-States to declare whether they believe the Alien and Sedition Acts are or are not authorized by the Federal compact, trusting that they will concur in her opinions of them as unconstitutional and as opening the way for the general Government to seize the rights of the States and destroy government by the consent of the governed, and that, recurring to their natural rights not made Federal, they will join with her in requesting the repeal of these acts at the next session of Congress.

Mr. Madison drafted the resolutions for the legislature of Virginia. For the text of these resolutions see the paragraphs in small type in "Madison's Report on the Virginia Resolutions" on page 105 ss. They were passed on December 24, 1798, after an animated debate. The following account of the debate is given by Senator Thomas H. Benton in his "Thirty Years' View":

The principal speakers in the Virginia legislature in opposition to the resolutions were: Mr. George Keith Taylor, Mr. Magill, Mr. Brooke, Mr. Cowan, Gen. Henry Lee, and Mr. Cureton. Nearly the whole debate turned, not on the abstract propriety or expediency of such resolutions, but on the question whether the acts of Congress which were specially complained of were, in fact, unconstitutional. Beyond the discussion of this point the speakers dwelt only on the supposed "tendency" of such declarations to excite the people to insubordination and non-submission to the law.

Debate on the Virginia Resolutions

Legislature of Virginia, December, 1798

Mr. George K. Taylor complained at the commencement of his speech, that the resolutions "contained a declaration, not of opinion, but of fact"; and he apprehended that "the consequences of pursuing the advice of the resolutions would be insurrection, confusion, and anarchy."

"The members of that Congress which had passed those laws had been, so far as he could understand, since generally reëlected; therefore he thought the people of the United States had decided in favor of their constitutionality, and that such an attempt as they were then making to induce Congress to repeal the laws would be nugatory."

Mr. Brooke thought resolutions "declaring laws which had been made by the Government of the United States to be unconstitutional, null and void," were "dangerous and improper"; that they had a "tendency to inflame the public mind"; to lessen the confidence that ought to subsist between the representatives of the people in the general Government and their constituents; and to "sap the very foundations of the Government by producing resistance to its laws." He was equally opposed to any modification of them that should be "intended as an expression of the general sentiment on the subject, because he conceived it to be an improper mode by which to express the wishes of the people of the State on the subject."

General Henry Lee thought the alien and sedition laws "not unconstitutional"; but, if they were unconstitutional, he "admitted the right of interposition on the part of the General Assembly." But he thought these resolutions showed "indecorum and hostility," and were "not the likeliest way to obtain a repeal of the laws." He "suspected," in fact, that "the repeal of the laws was not the leading point in view," but that they "covered" the objects of "promotion of disunion and separation of the States." The resolutions "struck him as recommending resistance. They declared the laws null and void. Our citizens thus thinking would disobey the laws." His plan would be, if he thought the laws unconstitutional, to let the people petition, or that the legislature come forward at once, "with a proposition for amending the doubtful parts of the Constitution"; or with a "respectful or friendly memorial, urging Congress to repeal the laws." But he "admitted" the only right which the resolutions assert for the State, namely, the right "to interpose." The remarks of the other opponents to the resolutions were to the same effect.

On behalf of the resolutions the principal speakers were: Mr. John Taylor, of Caroline, who had introduced them; Mr. Ruffin, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Pope, Mr. Foushee, Mr. Daniel, Mr. Peter Johnston, Mr. Giles, Mr. James Barbour.

They obviated the objection of the speakers on the other side that the resolutions "contained a declaration not of opinion, but of fact," by striking out the words which, in the original draft, declared the acts in question to be "null, void, and of no force or effect"; so as to make it manifest, as the advocates of the resolutions maintained, that they intended nothing beyond an expression of sentiment. They obviated another objection which appeared in the original draft, which asserted the States alone to be the parties to the Constitution, by striking out the word "alone." They thoroughly and successfully combated both the "suspicion" that they hid any ulterior object of dissension or disunion, and the "apprehension" that the resolutions would encourage insubordination among the people. They acceded to and affirmed that their object was to obtain a repeal of the offensive measures; that the resolutions might ultimately lead to a convention for amending the Constitution, and that they were intended both to express and to affect public opinion; but nothing more.

The minority afterwards published its arguments in an "Address Containing a Vindication of the Constitutionality of the Alien and Sedition Laws." The pamphlet was intended to be an offset to the resolutions passed by the majority and was, like these, sent to the legislatures of the other States.

The majority sent along with its resolutions the following:

Address to the People

By the Virginia Legislature

Fellow-citizens: Unwilling to shrink from our representative responsibilities, conscious of the purity of our motives, but acknowledging your right to supervise our conduct, we invite your serious attention to the emergency which dictated the subjoined resolutions. While we disdain to alarm you by ill-founded jealousies, we recommend an investigation guided by the coolness of wisdom, and a decision bottomed on firmness but tempered with moderation.

It would be perfidious in those intrusted with the guardianship of the State sovereignty, and acting under the solemn obligation of the following oath—"I do swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States"—not to warn you of encroachments, which, though clothed with the pretext of necessity, or disguised by arguments of expediency, may yet establish precedents which may ultimately devote a generous and unsuspicious people to all the consequences of usurped power.

Encroachments springing from a government whose organization cannot be maintained without the coöperation of the States furnish the strongest excitements upon the State legislatures to watchfulness, and impose upon them the strongest obligation to preserve unimpaired the line of partition.

The acquiescence of the States, under infractions of the Federal compact, would either beget a speedy consolidation, by precipitating the State governments into impotency and contempt, or prepare the way for a revolution by a repetition of these infractions until the people are aroused to appear in the majesty of their strength. It is to avoid these calamities that we exhibit to the people the momentous question whether the Constitution of the United Sates shall yield to a construction which defies every restraint and which overwhelms the best hopes of republicanism.

Exhortation to disregard domestic usurpation until foreign danger shall have passed is an artifice which may be forever used; because the possessors of power, who are the advocates for its extension, can never create national embarrassments, to be successively employed to soothe the people into sleep, while that power is swelling silently, secretly, and fatally. Of the same character are insinuations of a foreign influence, which seize upon a laudable enthusiasm against danger from abroad and distort it by an unnatural application so as to blind your eyes against danger at home.

The Sedition Act presents a scene which was never expected by the early friends of the Constitution. It was then admitted that the State sovereignties were only diminished by powers specifically enumerated or necessary to carry the specified powers into effect. Now, Federal authority is deduced from implication; and, from the existence of State law, it is inferred that Congress possess a similar power of legislation; whence Congress will be endowed with a power of legislation in all cases whatsoever, and the States will be stripped of every right reserved, by the concurrent claims of a paramount legislature.

The Sedition Act is the offspring of these tremendous pretensions which inflict a death-wound on the sovereignty of the States.

For the honor of American understanding we will not believe that the people have been allured into the adoption of the Constitution by an affectation of defining powers, while the preamble would admit a construction which would erect the will of Congress into a power paramount in all cases and, therefore, limited to none. On the contrary, it is evident that the objects for which the Constitution was formed were deemed attainable only by a particular enumeration and specification of each power granted to the Federal Government; reserving all others to the people, or to the States. And yet it is in vain we search for any specified power embracing the right of legislation against the freedom of the press.

Had the States been despoiled of their sovereignty by the generality of the preamble, and, had the Federal Government been endowed with whatever they should judge to be instrumental toward the Union, justice, tranquillity, common defence, general welfare, and the preservation of liberty, nothing could have been more frivolous than an enumeration of powers.

All the preceding arguments, arising from a deficiency of constitutional power in Congress, apply to the Alien Act; and this act is liable to other objections peculiar to itself. If a suspicion that aliens are dangerous constitutes the justification of that power exercised over them by Congress, then a similar suspicion will justify the exercise of a similar power over natives; because there is nothing in the Constitution distinguishing between the power of a State to permit the residence of natives and aliens. It is, therefore, a right originally possessed, and never surrendered, by the respective States, and which is rendered dear and valuable to Virginia because it is assailed through the bosom of the Constitution and because her peculiar situation renders the easy admission of artisans and laborers an interest of vast importance.

But this bill contains other features still more alarming and dangerous. It dispenses with the trial by jury; it violates the judicial system; it confounds legislative, executive, and judicial powers; it punishes without trial; and it bestows upon the President despotic power over a numerous class of men. Are such measures consistent with our constitutional principles? And will an accumulation of power so extensive in the hands of the Executive over aliens secure to natives the blessings of republican liberty?

If measures can mold governments, and if an uncontrolled power of construction is surrendered to those who administer them, their progress may be easily foreseen and their end easily foretold. A lover of monarchy who opens the treasures of corruption by distributing emolument among devoted partisans may, at the same time, be approaching his object and deluding the people with professions of republicanism. He may confound monarchy and republicanism by the art of definition. He may varnish over the dexterity which ambition never fails to display with the pliancy of language, the seduction of expediency, or the prejudices of the times; and he may come at length to avow that so extensive a territory as that of the United States can only be governed by the energies of monarchy; that it cannot be defended except by standing armies; and that it cannot be united except by consolidation.

Measures have already been adopted which may lead to these consequences. They consist—

In fiscal systems and arrangements, which keep a host of commercial and wealthy individuals imbodied and obedient to the mandates of the treasury;—

In armies and navies, which will, on the one hand, enlist the tendency of man to pay homage to his fellow-creature who can feed or honor him; and, on the other, employ the principle of fear by punishing imaginary insurrections under the pretext of preventive justice;—

In swarms of officers, civil and military, who can inculcate political tenets tending to consolidation and monarchy, both by indulgences and severities, and can act as spies over the free exercise of human reason;—

In restraining the freedom of the press and investing the Executive with legislative, executive, and judicial powers over a numerous body of men;—

And, that we may shorten the catalogue, in establishing, by successive precedents, such a mode of construing the Constitution as will rapidly remove every restraint upon Federal power.

Let history be consulted; let the man of experience reflect; nay, let the artificers of monarchy be asked what further materials they can need for building up their favorite system.

These are solemn but painful truths; and yet we recommend it to you not to forget the possibility of danger from without, although danger threatens us from within. Usurpation is indeed dreadful; but against foreign invasion, if that should happen, let us rise with hearts and hands united and repel the attack with the zeal of freemen who will strengthen their title to examine and correct domestic measures by having defended their country against foreign aggression.

Pledged as we are, fellow-citizens, to these sacred engagements, we yet humbly, fervently implore the Almighty Disposer of Events to avert from our land war and usurpation, the scourges of mankind; to permit our fields to be cultivated in peace; to instil into nations the love of friendly intercourse; to suffer our youth to be educated in virtue, and to preserve our morality from the pollution invariably incident to habits of war; to prevent the laborer and husbandman from being harassed by taxes and imposts; to remove from ambition the means of disturbing the commonwealth; to annihilate all pretexts for power afforded by war; to maintain the Constitution; and to bless our nation with tranquillity, under whose benign influence we may reach the summit of happiness and glory, to which we are destined by nature and nature's God.

Copies of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions were sent to the "Co-States." Replies were made to Virginia by the legislatures of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York (different replies from the Senate and the House), Delaware, Pennsylvania (the House), and Maryland. Replies to Kentucky were adopted by the following: New Hampshire (same as to Virginia), Vermont, Rhode Island (similar as to Virginia), Connecticut, New York (the House, same as to Virginia), Pennsylvania, Delaware (similar as to Virginia), Maryland (the House). All the replies were opposed to the resolutions.

The substance of the most important of the replies is here given:

Delaware considered the resolutions "a very unjustifiable interference with the general Government and constituted authorities of the United States and of dangerous tendency, and, therefore, not a fit subject for the further consideration of the general assembly."

Rhode Island considered that the Constitution gave to the Supreme Court of the United States the authority of deciding on the constitutionality of any act of Congress, and that for any State legislature to assume that authority would be: (1) blending together legislative and judicial powers; (2) disturbing the peace of the Union in case of a diversity of opinion between the States, each having no resort but its own arm for vindicating its opinions; (3) submitting most important questions of law to less competent tribunals; and, (4) breaking the express terms of the Constitution. Therefore the legislature declined officially to consider the constitutionality of the so-called Sedition and Alien laws, but expressed their private opinion that these laws were within the powers delegated to Congress, and promotive of the welfare of the United States. The legislature contemplated with extreme concern the many evil and fatal consequences which might flow from the very unwarrantable resolutions of Virginia.

Massachusetts declared: (1) that, though it held sacred the principle that consent of the people is the only pure source of just and legitimate power, yet, being bound by solemn oath to support the Constitution, it could not admit the right of a State legislature to denounce the Federal Administration formed under that Constitution to deal exclusively with national concerns; (2) that recourse to measures of extremity upon groundless or trivial pretexts had a strong tendency to destroy all rational liberty at home, and to weaken the nation abroad; (3) that the Constitution had not made the State legislatures judges of Federal acts, their proper course in case of grievance being to propose an amendment to the Constitution; and, (4) that the course proposed by Virginia would either reduce the Constitution to a mere cipher with the form and pageantry of authority without the energy of power, or, in the conflict of jurisdictions, weary the people into submission to a dictator. Therefore, while the legislature disclaimed its right to decide upon the constitutionality of Federal acts, still, lest its silence be construed as disapproving the laws complained against by Virginia, it explicitly declared these not only constitutional, but expedient and necessary.

The rights of aliens, it declared, were not particularly contemplated in the Constitution, and they were entitled only to a temporary protection while they yield a temporary allegiance, and, when they became dangerous to the public safety, this protection ought to be withdrawn by Congress, which had not only the right but the duty to protect the nation from internal as well as external foes. The nation was menaced by war; the removal of aliens was, therefore, a wise precaution, justified by the usages of nations, and it had been properly committed to the national Executive.

The Sedition Act is equally defensible. Though the Virginia convention had recommended the amendment to the Constitution forbidding Congress to abridge freedom of speech or of the press, they surely did not expect that the amendment was to be construed by the convention.[1]

Plainly the Sedition Act did not abridge the liberty of speech or of the press, which was to utter truth, not propagate falsehood and slander. The act provided that courts and juries should decide whether or not the liberty of speech and press had been abused, and they thereby upheld this liberty rather than infringed upon it.

The Constitution assigns certain duties to the Federal Government. This would imply also the grant of means and power necessary to execute the duties. Yet the grant is not left to implication, but explicitly stated in the eighth section of Article I.

The Sedition Act provides a means for the Federal Government to execute the duty of national protection, which means is not specified in the Constitution, though the duty is. Analogically, the Constitution made no specific provision for the protection of the Supreme Court against disturbance of its proceedings, and the court has enforced its implied right to protect itself by adopting the practice of the common law on this point. Congress could, however, have constitutionally passed a statute effecting this protection.

The President is impeded in performing his constitutional duties by scandalous misrepresentations tending directly to rob him of the public confidence. Therefore Congress has provided him in the Sedition Law the means to perform his duties efficiently.

Had the Constitution withheld from Congress power to provide such means for the execution of government, then

[1] This position is based on the principle that, in construing an equivocal statute, law does not concern itself with the intention of its drafter or even its mover, but with that of the majority which passed it.

it would have made the officials responsible for effects, without giving them control over the causes which naturally produce these effects, and so it would have failed of achieving its object as stated in its preamble.

Sedition and conspiracy were punishable by the common law in the courts of the United States before the act in question was passed by Congress. The act is, in certain respects (such as the mitigation of punishment, etc.), an amelioration of the common law.

The act is for the benefit of officers only in their character of agents of the people, and, therefore, it is for the benefit of the people, and not the injury of them.

The act is necessary because an audacious and unprincipled spirit of falsehood and abuse has been too long unremittingly exerted for the purpose of perverting public opinion, and threatened to undermine and destroy the whole fabric of government.

These opinions have been endorsed by our constituents in reëlecting those Representatives who voted for the measures complained of by Virginia. And the citizens of Massachusetts are not indifferent to their constitutional rights; on the contrary, they see that their freedom, safety, and happiness require that they should defend the Government and its constitutional measures against the open or insidious attack of any foe, whether foreign or domestic.

Lastly, the legislature of Massachusetts feel a strong conviction that the several United States are connected by a common interest which ought to render their union indissoluble; and this State will always coöperate with its confederate States in rendering that union productive of mutual security, freedom, and happiness.

Pennsylvania answered Kentucky that the people of the United States had vested the construction of the Constitution in the Federal judiciary, and, therefore, the declaration by a State that any Federal act was void was a revolutionary measure destructive of the purest principles of our State and national compacts.

It considered as abhorrent the statements of the Kentucky legislature that "confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism," and that "free governments are founded in jealousy." Such a principle, it said, cut all social bonds, and renewed the state of savagery. Governments truly republican and free are eminently founded on confidence; their execution is committed to representatives in whom the people trust. No portion of the people can assume the province of the whole, nor resist its combined will.

The Alien and Sedition Laws are expressive of this combined will—a part of the system of defence against the seduction and aggressions of France. They are terrifying only to the flagitious and designing. Loud and concerted appeals against them made by a minority to the passions of the people will produce effects more violent than useful.

Pennsylvania answered Virginia briefly to the same effect: Her resolutions tended to excite unwarrantable discontents and to destroy the very existence of our Government.

New York answered through its senate that, "not perceiving that the rights of the particular States have been violated, nor any unconstitutional powers assumed by the general Government, the senate cannot forbear to express the anxiety and regret with which they observe the inflammatory and pernicious sentiments and doctrines which are contained in the resolutions of the legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky—sentiments and doctrines no less repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the principles of their union, than destructive to the Federal Government, and unjust to those whom the people have elected to administer it."

Therefore the senate deemed it a duty to bear unequivocal testimony against such sentiments and doctrines explicitly and to declare their incompetency to supervise the acts of the general Government.

Connecticut explicitly disavowed the principles contained in the Virginia resolutions, and it justified the Federal acts of which the resolutions complained as rendered necessary by the exigency of the country and passed by the constituted authorities.

New Hampshire, which had received also the Kentucky resolutions, expressed a firm resolution to defend the Constitutions of the United States and the State against every aggression, foreign or domestic, and to this end to support the measures complained of. The Federal judiciary, it said, and not a State legislature, is the proper tribunal to determine the constitutionality of Federal laws.

If the legislature of New Hampshire, for mere speculative purposes, were to express an opinion on the so-called "Alien and Sedition Bills," that opinion would be that these acts are constitutional, and, in the present critical stage of our country, highly expedient. As to this constitutionality and this expediency the legislature of Virginia was referred to the clear demonstrations on these points made by members of its minority (see page 94).

Vermont resolved that the resolutions of Virginia were unconstitutional in their nature and dangerous in their tendency, and that the Federal judiciary and not a State legislature was the proper body to decide on the constitutionality of Federal acts.

The Supplementary Resolution of Kentucky

The legislature of Kentucky replied to the answers of the several States, made to its own resolutions and those of Virginia, by a supplementary resolution, passed unanimously in the House on November 14 and concurred in by the Senate on November 22, 1799.

The following is a condensation of the preamble and full text of the resolution:

The Kentucky legislature would be faithless to themselves and their constituents if they silently acquiesced in the answers to their former resolutions by the other States, Virginia excepted. It is needless to attempt to expose the unconstitutionality of the Alien and Sedition Acts more fully than we have done; we must lament, however, the unfounded suggestions and uncandid insinuations of the replies to our decent and temperate expressions of opinion. Faithful to the true principles of the Federal Union, unconscious of any designs to disturb the harmony of that Union, and anxious only to escape the fangs of despotism, the good people of this commonwealth are regardless of censure or calumniation. Lest, however, those of our fellow-citizens throughout the Union who so widely differ from us on those important subjects should be deluded by the expectation that we shall shrink from the principles contained in those resolutions; therefore

Resolved, That this commonwealth considers the Federal Union, upon the terms and for the purposes specified in the late compact, conducive to the liberty and happiness of the several States: That it does now unequivocally declare its attachment to the Union, and to that compact, agreeably to its obvious and real intention, and will be among the last to seek its dissolution: That, if those who administer the general Government be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by that compact, by a total disregard to the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the State governments, and the creation upon their ruins of a general consolidated government will be the inevitable consequence: That the principle and construction, contended for by sundry of the State legislatures, that the general Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop not short of despotism—since the discretion of those who administer the government, and not the Constitution, would be the measure of their powers: That the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of the infraction: and, That a nullification by those sovereignties of all unauthorized acts done under color of that instrument is the rightful remedy: That this commonwealth does, under the most deliberate reconsideration, declare that the said Alien and Sedition Laws are, in their opinion, palpable violations of the said Constitution; and, however cheerfully it may be disposed to surrender its opinion to a majority of its sister States in matters of ordinary or doubtful policy, yet, in momentous regulations like the present, which so vitally wound the best rights of the citizen, it would consider a silent acquiescence as highly criminal: That, although this commonwealth, as a party to the Federal compact, will bow to the laws of the Union, yet it does, at the same time, declare, that it will not now, or ever hereafter, cease to oppose, in a constitutional manner, every attempt at what quarter soever offered, to violate that compact: And, finally, in order that no pretext or arguments may be drawn from a supposed acquiescence on the part of this commonwealth in the constitutionality of those laws, and be thereby used as precedents for similar future violations of the Federal compact, this commonwealth does now enter against them its solemn protest.

The Virginia legislature referred the answers of the various States to a committee of which James Madison was chairman. During the session of 1799-1800 the committee made its report, which had been drafted by Madison.

This celebrated paper[1] is a long and exhaustive argument in defence of the legislature's resolutions, discussing them in their order. The following is an abstract of the report:

[1] It would seem that no praise was too extravagant for admirers of Madison in speaking of this Report. It was called the "Bible of Democracy," the "Second Declaration of Independence," etc.

Report on the Virginia Resolutions

James Madison

The first of the resolutions is in the words following:

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of Virginia doth unequivocally express a firm resolution to maintain and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of this State, against every aggression, either foreign or domestic; and that they will support the Government of the United States in all measures warranted by the former."

No unfavorable comment can have been made on the sentiments here expressed. In their next resolution—

"The General Assembly most solemnly declares a warm attachment to the union of the States, to maintain which it pledges all its powers; and that, for this end, it is their duty to watch over and oppose every infraction of those principles which constitute the only basis of that Union, because a faithful observance of them can alone secure its existence and the public happiness."

No question can arise among enlightened friends of the Union as to the duty of watching over and opposing every infraction of those principles which constitute its basis, and a faithful observance of which can alone secure its existence and the public happiness thereon depending.

The third resolution is in the words following:

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact—as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them."

In all the contemporary discussions and comments which the Constitution underwent, it was constantly justified and recommended on the ground that the powers not given to the Government were withheld from it; and that, if any doubt could have existed on this subject, under the original text of the Constitution, it is removed, as far as words could remove it, by the 12th Amendment,[1] which expressly declares "that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

[1] Now the tenth.

The resolution proceeds to infer "That, in a case of a dangerous exercise of unwarranted powers, the States have the right to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil and for maintaining their rights within their respective limits."

It is a plain principle, founded in common sense, illustrated by common practice, and essential to the nature of compacts, that, where resort can be had to no tribunal superior to the authorities of the parties, the parties themselves must be the rightful judges in the last resort, whether the bargain made has been pursued or violated. The States, being the parties to the constitutional compact, and in their sovereign capacity, it follows of necessity that there can be no tribunal above their authority to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated; and, consequently, that they must themselves decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition. In the case of ordinary conventions between different nations, where by the strict rule of interpretation a breach of a part may be deemed a breach of the whole—every part being deemed a condition of every other part, and of the whole—it is always laid down that the breach must be both wilful and material to justify an application of the rule. But, in the case of an intimate and constitutional union like that of the United States, the interposition of the parties can be called for by occasions only deeply and essentially affecting the vital principles of their political system.

Therefore the resolution specifies the object of the interposition to be arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation and maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to the States as parties to the Constitution.

If the deliberate exercise of dangerous powers, palpably withheld by the Constitution, could not justify such actions, there would be an end to all relief from usurped power.

But it is objected that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the Constitution in the last resort. The answer to this is that the judicial department is not the last resort in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial, as well as the other departments, hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers might subvert forever and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy the very Constitution which all were instituted to preserve.

The fourth resolution stands as follows:—

"That the General Assembly doth also express its deep regret that a spirit has, in sundry instances, been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its powers by forced constructions of the constitutional charter which defines them; and that indications have appeared of a design to expound certain general phrases (which, having been copied from the very limited grant of powers in the former Articles of Confederation, were the less liable to be misconstrued) so as to destroy the meaning and effect of the particular enumeration which necessarily explains and limits the general phrases, and so as to consolidate the States, by degrees, into one sovereignty, the obvious tendency and inevitable result of which would be to transform the present Republican system of the United States into an absolute, or at best a mixed monarchy."

The Alien and Sedition Laws are among those alluded to as indicating the spirit of the Federal Government. The phrases construed are: "Providing for the common defence and general welfare" [Preamble].

In Article VII of the "Articles of Confederation" these phrases are used, yet they were not broadly construed as now. By their incorporation in the Constitution it was evidently the intention of the framers of the new instrument to perpetuate the old construction. Indeed, if any breadth of construction is permitted, it may go to the fullest extent, and our whole government be changed from a Federal system to a consolidated one, and, in time, become a despotism.

The true and fair construction of this expression, both in the original and existing Federal compacts, appears to the committee too obvious to be mistaken. In both the Congress is authorized to provide money for the common defence and general welfare. In both is subjoined to this authority an enumeration of the cases to which their powers shall extend. Money cannot be applied to the general welfare otherwise than by an application of it to some particular measure conducive to the general welfare. Whenever, therefore, money has been raised by the general authority, and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises whether the particular measure be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it. If it be not, no such application can be made. This fair and obvious interpretation coincides with, and is enforced by, the clause in the Constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." An appropriation of money to the general welfare would be deemed rather a mockery than an observance of this constitutional injunction.

The resolution next in order is contained in the following terms:—

"That the General Assembly doth particularly protest against the palpable and alarming infractions of the Constitution, in the two late cases of the 'Alien and Sedition Acts,' passed at the last session of Congress; the first of which exercises a power nowhere delegated to the Federal Government; and which, by uniting legislative and judicial powers to those of the Executive, subverts the general principles of free government, as well as the particular organization and positive provisions of the Federal Constitution; and the other of which acts exercises, in like manner, a power not delegated by the Constitution, but, on the contrary, expressly and positively forbidden by one of the amendments thereto—a power which, more than any other, ought to produce universal alarm, because it is leveled against the right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed the only effectual guardian of every other right."

Mr. Madison repeated the already familiar arguments against the Alien and Sedition acts. His arguments against the Sedition Act largely consisted of a reply to the doctrine advanced in its behalf that "the common or unwritten law"—which Madison characterized as "of vast extent and complexity, embracing almost every possible subject of legislation, both civil and criminal"—forms a part of Federal law.

In the state prior to the Revolution it is certain that the common law made a part of the colonial codes. But it was not the same in any two of the colonies; in some the modifications were materially and extensively different. There was no common legislature by which a common will could be expressed in the form of a law; nor any common magistracy by which such a law could be carried into practice. The will of each colony, alone and separately, had its organs for these purposes.

This stage of our political history furnishes no foothold for the patrons of this new doctrine.

Did, then, the principle or operation of the great event which made the colonies independent States imply or introduce the common law as a law of the Union?

The fundamental principle of the Revolution was that the colonies were coördinate members with each other, and with Great Britain, of an empire united by a common executive sovereign, but not united by any common legislative sovereign. The legislative power was maintained to be as complete in each American Parliament as in the British Parliament. The assertion by Great Britain of a power to make laws for the other members of the empire, in all cases whatsoever, ended in the discovery that she had a right to make laws for them in no cases whatsoever.

Such being the ground of our Revolution, no support or color can be drawn from it for the doctrine that the common law is binding on these States as one society. The doctrine, on the contrary, is evidently repugnant to the fundamental principles of the Revolution.

The Articles of Confederation are the next source of information on this subject.

This instrument does not contain a sentence or a syllable that can be tortured into a countenance of the idea that the parties to it were, with respect to the objects of the common law, to form one community. No such law is named, or implied, or alluded to as being in force, or as brought into force by that compact. No provision is made by which such a law could be carried into operation; while, on the other hand, every such inference or pretext is absolutely precluded by Art. 2, which declares "that each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

Is this exclusion revoked and the common law introduced as national law by the present Constitution of the United States?

The only part of the Constitution which seems to have been relied on in this case is the 2d section of Art. 3: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

It has been asked what cases, distinct from those arising under the laws and treaties of the United States, can arise under the Constitution other than those arising under the common law, and it is inferred that the common law is, accordingly, adopted or recognized by the Constitution.

The expression "cases in law and equity" is manifestly confined to cases of a civil nature, and would exclude cases of criminal jurisdiction. Criminal cases in law and equity would be a language unknown to the law.

The succeeding paragraph in the same section is in harmony with this construction. It is in these words: "In all cases affecting ambassadors, or other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases [including cases of law and equity arising under the Constitution] the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact.

Once more: The amendment last added to the Constitution [XIth] deserves attention as throwing light on this subject. "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign power." As it will not be pretended that any criminal proceeding could take place against a State the terms law or equity must be understood as appropriate to civil, in exclusion of criminal cases.

From these considerations it is evident that this part of the Constitution, even if it could be applied at all to the purpose for which it has been cited, would not include any cases whatever of a criminal nature, and, consequently, would not authorize the inference from it that the judicial authority extends to offences against the common law as offences arising under the Constitution.

It is further to be considered that, even if this part of the Constitution could be strained into an application to every common-law case, criminal as well as civil, it could have no effect in justifying the Sedition Act, which is an act of legislative and not of judicial power; and it is the judicial power only of which the extent is defined in this part of the Constitution.

There are two passages in the Constitution in which a description of the law of the United States is found. The first is contained in Art. 3, Sect. 3. The second is contained in the second paragraph of Art. 6. The common law is not expressed in the enumeration of either passage.

In aid of these objections the difficulties and confusion inseparable from a constructive introduction of the common law would afford powerful reasons against it.

Is it to be the common law with or without the British statutes?

Is the law to be different in every State, as differently modified by its code; or are the modifications of any particular State to be applied to all?

Questions of this sort might be multiplied with as much ease as there would be difficulty in answering them.

These consequences, flowing from the proposed construction, furnish other objections equally conclusive.

If it be understood that the common law is established by the Constitution, it follows that no part of the law can be altered by the legislature. Such of the statutes already passed as may be repugnant thereto would be nullified; particularly the Sedition Act itself, which boasts of being a melioration of the common law; and the whole code, with all its incongruities, barbarisms and bloody maxims, would be inviolably saddled on the good people of the United States.

Should this consequence be rejected, and the common law be held, like other laws, liable to revision and alteration by the authority of Congress, it then follows that the authority of Congress is coextensive with the objects of common law; that is to say, with every object of legislation; for to every such object does some branch or other of the common law extend. The authority of Congress would, therefore, be no longer under the limitations marked out in the Constitution. They would be authorized to legislate in all cases whatsoever.

In the next place, as the President possesses the executive powers of the Constitution, and is to see that the laws be faithfully executed, his authority also must be coextensive with every branch of the common law. The additions which this would make to his power, though not readily to be estimated, claim the most serious attention.

This is not all: it will merit the most profound consideration how far an indefinite admission of the common law, with a latitude in construing it equal to the construction by which it is deduced from the Constitution, might draw after it the various prerogatives, making part of the unwritten law of England. The English constitution itself is nothing more than a composition of unwritten laws and maxims.

In the third place, whether the common law be admitted as of legal or of constitutional obligation, it would confer on the judicial department a discretion little short of a legislative power. It would remain with the same department to decide what parts of the common law would, and what would not, be properly applicable to the circumstances of the United States.

In the last place, the consequence of admitting the common law as the law of the United States, on the authority of the individual States, is as obvious as it would be fatal. As this law relates to every subject of legislation and would be paramount to the constitutions and laws of the States, the admission of it would overwhelm the residuary sovereignty of the States, and, by one constructive operation, new-model the whole political fabric of the country.

It is, indeed, distressing to reflect that it ever should have been made a question whether the Constitution, on the whole face of which is seen so much labor to enumerate and define the several objects of Federal power, could intend to introduce in the lump, in an indirect manner, and by a forced construction of a few phrases, the vast and multifarious jurisdiction involved in the common law—a law filling so many ample volumes; a law overspreading the entire field of legislation; and a law that would sap the foundation of the Constitution as a system of limited and specified powers.

Mr. Madison continued:

Is, then, the Federal Government, it will be asked, destitute of every authority for restraining the licentiousness of the press, and for shielding itself against the libelous attacks which may be made on those who administer it?

The Constitution alone can answer this question. If no such power be expressly delegated, and if it be not both necessary and proper to carry into execution an express power; above all, if it be expressly forbidden, by a declaratory amendment to the Constitution—the answer must be, that the Federal Government is destitute of all such authority, this being left to the States.

The resolution next in order is as follows:—

"That this State having, by its convention, which ratified the Federal Constitution, expressly declared that, among other essential rights, 'the liberty of conscience and of the press cannot be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by any authority of the United States'; and, from its extreme anxiety to guard these rights from every possible attack of sophistry and ambition, having, with other states, recommended an amendment for that purpose, which amendment was in due time annexed to the Constitution, it would mark a reproachful inconsistency, and criminal degeneracy, if an indifference were now shown to the most palpable violation of one of the rights thus declared and secured, and to the establishment of a precedent which may be fatal to the other."

Similar recommendations having proceeded from a number of other States, and Congress having, in consequence thereof, and with a view to extend the ground of public confidence, proposed, among other declaratory and restrictive clauses, a clause expressly securing the liberty of conscience and of the press; and Virginia, having concurred in the ratifications which made them a part of the Constitution, it will remain with a candid public to decide whether it would not mark an inconsistency and degeneracy if an indifference were now shown to a palpable violation of one of those rights—the freedom of the press; and to a precedent therein which may be fatal to the other—that free exercise of religion.

The two concluding resolutions only remain to be examined. They are in the words following:—

"That the good people of this commonwealth, having ever felt, and continuing to feel, the most sincere affection for their brethren of the other States, the truest anxiety for establishing and perpetuating the union of all, and the most scrupulous fidelity to that Constitution which is the pledge of mutual friendship and the instrument of mutual happiness,—the General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions in the other States, in confidence that they will concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid are unconstitutional; and that the necessary and proper measures will be taken, by each, for coöperating with this State, in maintaining, unimpaired, the authorities, rights, and liberties reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

"That the Governor be desired to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the executive authority of each of the other States, with a request that the same may be communicated to the legislature thereof; and that a copy be furnished to each of the Senators and Representatives representing this State in the Congress of the United States."

It has been said that it belongs to the judiciary of the United States, and not the State legislatures, to declare the meaning of the Federal Constitution.

But a declaration that proceedings of the Federal Government are not warranted by the Constitution is a novelty neither among the citizens nor among the legislatures of the States.

Nor can the declarations of either be deemed an assumption of the office of the judge. They are expressions of opinion, unaccompanied with any other effect than what they may produce on opinion, by exciting reflection. The expositions of the judiciary, on the other hand, are carried into immediate effect by force. The former may lead to a change in the legislative expression of the general will—possibly to a change in the opinion of the judiciary; the latter enforces the general will, while that will and that opinion continue unchanged.

And, if there be no impropriety in declaring the unconstitutionality of proceedings in the Federal Government, where can there be the impropriety of communicating the declaration to other States and inviting their concurrence in a like declaration? The legislatures of the States have a right to originate amendments to the Constitution by a concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number in applications to Congress for the purpose.

In respect to the Alien and Sedition Laws the legislatures of the States might have made a direct representation to Congress, with a view to obtain a rescinding of the two offensive acts, or they might have represented to their respective Senators in Congress their wish that two-thirds thereof would propose an explanatory amendment to the Constitution, or two-thirds of themselves, if such had been their opinion, might, by an application to Congress, have obtained a convention for the same object.

The extensive view of the subject, thus taken by the committee, has led them to report to the House, as the result of the whole, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General Assembly, having carefully and respectfully attended to the proceedings of a number of the States, in answer to the resolutions of December 21, 1798, and having accurately and fully reëxamined and reconsidered the latter, find it to be their indispensable duty to adhere to the same, as founded in truth, as consonant with the Constitution, and as conducive to its preservation; and more especially to be their duty to renew, as they do hereby renew, their PROTEST against Alien and Sedition Acts, as palpable and alarming infractions of the Constitution.

SPECIFIC PURPOSE OF JEFFERSON AND MADISON

The uniform and emphatic repudiation by the other States of the resolutions of Kentucky and Virginia effectually disposed of the primary purpose of Jefferson and Madison in inspiring them, namely, the calling of a national convention of the States, which should, by a three-fourths vote, as provided by the Constitution, pass an amendment to that instrument enabling three-fourths of the States to declare void any action whatsoever of the Federal Government, whether this be a law passed by Congress, an order of the Executive Department, or a ruling of the Supreme Court.

To Jefferson and Madison it seemed that the Federal Government was preparing to seize supreme control over the States, such as Parliament exercised over Great Britain. The Alien and Sedition Laws of Congress were similar to those passed by Parliament in 1792-3, and the principle involved in them might be extended to making the Federal Government, like Parliament, the final judge of its own powers. Even a convention of the States to change the Constitution might be prohibited as seditious, and therefore it was well to sound the States in time upon calling such a convention.

While Jefferson and Madison failed in their specific purpose to persuade the States to call a national convention to amend the Constitution in the way which has been indicated they succeeded beyond their greatest expectation in their general purpose, which was to induce the Federalists to "show their hand" and to sound an alarm to the people of the States based upon this revelation. They thus laid the foundation of a "campaign of education" which resulted in the accession of the Republican party to national power and its uninterrupted retention of this for a quarter of a century.

Resolutions expressive of sentiments similar to those of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions were passed by various States in later years. Professor Johnston notes, as instances of the revenges of time that, in the reversal of political control in the State governments, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts passed resolutions of this character and that Virginia replied in emphatic repudiation of their sentiments.

The denial by Jefferson and Madison, in the resolutions, that the Federal courts had a common-law jurisdiction in criminal matters is, probably, best replied to by Associate-Justice Joseph Story in his "Commentaries on the Constitution."

THE COMMON LAW JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS

JUSTICE JOSEPH STORY

The question, whether the common law is applicable to the United States in their national character, relations, and government, has been much discussed at different periods of the government, principally, however, with reference to the jurisdiction and punishment of common law offences by the courts of the United States. It would be a most extraordinary state of things that the common law should be the basis of the jurisprudence of the States originally composing the Union; and yet a government engrafted upon the existing systems should have no jurisprudence at all. If such be the result, there is no guide and no rule for the courts of the United States or indeed for any other department of government in the exercise of any of the powers confided to them, except so far as Congress has laid, or shall lay down, a rule. In the immense mass of rights and duties of contracts and claims, growing out of the Constitution and laws of the United States (upon which positive legislation has hitherto done little or nothing), what is the rule of decision, and interpretation, and restriction? Suppose the simplest case of contract with the Government of the United States, how is it to be construed? How is it to be enforced? What are its obligations? Take an act of Congress—how is it to be interpreted? Are the rules of the common law to furnish the proper guide, or is every court and department to give it any interpretation it may please, according to its own arbitrary will? My design is not here to discuss the subject (for that would require a volume), but rather to suggest some of the difficulties attendant upon the subject. Those readers who are desirous of more ample information are referred to Duponceau on the "Jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States"; to Tucker's Black. Comm. App. Note E, p. 372; to 1 Kent's Comm. Lect. 16, pp. 311 to 322; to the report of the Virginia legislature of 1799-1800; to Rawn on the Constitution, ch. 30, p. 258; to the North American Review, July, 1825; and to Mr. Bayard's speech in the "Debates on the Judiciary" in 1802, p. 372, etc.

As has been noted the controversy over the Alien and Sedition Laws was chiefly instrumental in the election of Thomas Jefferson to the Presidency. In his inaugural address (March 4, 1801) he thus announced the principles upon which he would conduct his Administration:

First Inaugural Address of President Jefferson

About to enter, fellow citizens, on the exercise of duties which comprehend everything dear and valuable to you, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principles of our Government, and consequently those which ought to shape its administration. I will compress them within the narrowest compass they will bear, stating the general principle, but not all its limitations. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever State or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the general Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a zealous care of the right of election by the people; a mild and safe corrective of abuses, which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of republics, from which is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts, and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information, and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion; freedom of the press; and freedom of person, under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected. These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith; the text of civil instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

CHAPTER V

Protection of Adopted Citizens

[the koszta affair]

President Pierce, in His Annual Message, Recounts the Facts of the Koszta Affair—Correspondence on the Affair between Baron Hülsemann, Austrian Chargé d'Affaires, and William L. Marcy, American Secretary of State—Resolutions of Thanks to Captain Duncan L. Ingraham, Who Secured the Release of Koszta, Are Passed in the House of Representatives—Debate on the Resolutions: John Perkins, Jr. [La.], on the Right of Expatriation; Tilt between Gilbert Dean [N. Y.] and John S. Millson [Va.] on the Duty vs. the Right to Protect Koszta; David T. Disney [O.] on the Distinction between Domiciliation and Allegiance.

THE Federalist policies in regard to immigrants and alien citizens were broached again in the Hartford convention of 1814 [see Vol. V, chapter 1], but with this exception there was no important discussion in America concerning civil rights, unless the subject of slavery be considered in this connection, for the first half of the nineteenth century. The traditional liberal policy toward immigrants, which prevailed in the nearly continuous succession of Republican-Democratic administrations during this period, and the desire of every statesman, Northern, Southern, Eastern, or Western, to invite settlement and development of his section, and so to increase its power in Federal politics, placed the prospective citizen in a most advantageous position. With each party bidding for his vote the requirements for the elective franchise were reduced to a minimum. Consequently the right or privilege—whichever it be considered—was greatly abused, especially by European expatriates (usually revolutionists) who desired to continue their business abroad under the protection of some nation powerful enough to resist the claims upon them of their former government. Accordingly they visited the United States, made application for citizenship, and returned to Europe trusting in the advantages of their new allegiance and careless of the performance of its duties.

In the annual message of President Franklin Pierce, December 6, 1853, appeared the following statement:

Martin Koszta, a Hungarian by birth, came to this country in 1850, and declared his intention, in due form of law, to become a citizen of the United States. After remaining here nearly two years, he visited Turkey. While at Smyrna, he was forcibly seized, taken on board an Austrian brig-of-war, then lying in the harbor of that place, and there confined in irons, with the avowed design to take him into the dominions of Austria. Our consul at Smyrna and legation at Constantinople interposed for his release, but their efforts were ineffectual. While thus imprisoned, Commander Duncan N. Ingraham, with the United States ship of war St. Louis, arrived at Smyrna, and, after inquiring into the circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that Koszta was entitled to the protection of this Government, and took energetic and prompt measures for his release.[1] Under an arrangement between the agents of the United States and of Austria, he was transferred to the custody of the French consul-general at Smyrna, there to remain until he should be disposed of by the mutual agreement of the consuls of the respective governments at that place. Pursuant to that agreement he has been released, and is now in the United States. The Emperor of Austria has made the conduct of our officers who took part in this transaction a subject of grave complaint. Regarding Koszta as still his subject, and claiming a right to seize him within the limits of the Turkish Empire, he has demanded of this Government its consent to the surrender of the prisoner, a disavowal of the acts of its agents, and satisfaction for the alleged outrage. After a careful consideration of the case, I came to the conclusion that Koszta was seized without legal authority at Smyrna; that he was wrongfully detained on board of the Austrian brig-of-war; that, at the time of his seizure, he was clothed with the nationality of the United States; and that the acts of our officers, under the circumstances of the case, were justifiable, and their conduct has been fully approved by me, and a compliance with the several demands of the Emperor of Austria has been declined.

[1] July 2, 1853.

For a more full account of this transaction and my views in regard to it, I refer to the correspondence between the Chargé d'Affaires of Austria and the Secretary of State, which is herewith transmitted. The principles and policy, therein maintained on the part of the United States, will, whenever a proper occasion occurs, be applied and enforced.

The chief letters in the correspondence referred to were one from Baron Hülsemann, Austrian Chargé d'Affaires, to William L. Marcy, American Secretary of State, written on August 29, 1853, and the Secretary's reply of September 26. Hülsemann asked that the United States "disavow the conduct of its agents . . . hasten to call them to a severe account, and tender to Austria a satisfaction proportionate to the outrage." Marcy's answer defended the position of the United States throughout on the grounds that Koszta had ceased to be a citizen of Austria even by the law of Austria; that when seized and imprisoned he was already invested with the nationality of the United States, and this government had therefore the right, if it chose to exercise it, to extend its protection to him; that from international law Austria could derive no authority to obstruct or interfere with the United States in the exercise of this right in effecting the liberation of Koszta, and that Captain Ingraham's interposition for his release was, under the extraordinary circumstances of the case, right and proper.

The position taken by Secretary Marcy has since been accepted by the authorities in international law.

The ringing letter of the Secretary met with universal approbation from the American people, and contributed materially toward strengthening the President, for Pierce had been harshly criticized by the "Hards," a faction of New York Democrats who coöperated with the South, for appointing to the chief office in his cabinet a man who belonged to the opposite faction, known as the "Softs," who were prone to make political dickers with the Free Soilers. Captain Ingraham became a popular hero for his prompt and decisive action in the Koszta affair, and resolutions of thanks to him were passed in the House of Representatives on January 11, 1854, by a vote of 174 to 9. In remarks upon the resolutions the points in international law which had been raised in the Hülsemann-Marcy correspondence were ably discussed by John Perkins, Jr. [La.], Gilbert Dean [N. Y.], John S. Millson [Va.], and David T. Disney, [Ohio].

The Koszta Affair

House of Representatives, January 11, 1854

Mr. Perkins.—Although I approve the doctrines contained in the letter of the Secretary of State, I do not admit that the letter itself embodies any new principle. The secretary himself protests against this idea.

He says, speaking of nationality resulting from domicile:

> "It is no new doctrine now for the first time brought into operation by the United States; it is common to all nations, and has had the sanction of their practice for ages; but it is new that, at this late period, when the United States assert a claim to it as a common inheritance, it should at once be discovered that it is a doctrine fraught with danger, and likely to compromit the peace of the world."

The merit of the secretary's letter is, however, greater to my mind than if its doctrines were novel. I think it no light thing that he has brought forward, in a bold and forcible manner, on a highly proper occasion, a great principle of international law that has been suffered to lie long dormant in our law books. As early as 1817, in the case of Pizarro, 2d Wheaton, this doctrine of nationality, resulting from domicile, was laid down in broad terms by Judge Story, and concurred in by Judges Marshall, Washington, Livingston, and Johnston. Secretary Marcy has only given to it vitality by its application to persons as well as property. There is no just reason for its being restricted, so as to apply to one and not to the other.

The principle is broad enough for both, and that it has not always been extended to protect both is attributable to the watchful jealousy with which the monarchical governments of Europe have sought to make perpetual the allegiance of the subject. Recognizing, as we do in this country, the opposite doctrine—the right of an individual to expatriate himself—the reasoning of the secretary, and the conclusions of his letter, are in harmony with the spirit of our institutions.

I think we have acquiesced long enough in European interpretation of the law of nations. For the last fifty years it has been molded to suit the necessities of particular nations. At this time it is practically little more than a code, conventional in its character, for the protection of existing institutions—interpreted always against the individual, and in favor of the government.

Sir, the time is coming when this country will be forced to declare, in some degree, its independence of a code which is framed to justify tyranny in almost all its forms, and which is too often made a screen for the perpetration of great national crime. When we do declare our independence of the perversions of this code, I believe the act will be attended with moral results almost equal to those which attended the establishment of our colonial independence.

Mr. Dean.—I desire, as one of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—to which this subject was referred—and as a member of this House, to say here in my place, distinctly and unequivocally, that the object of this testimonial is not merely a personal compliment to Captain Ingraham, highly as he deserves it; that compliment he has received by the united voice of the civilized world, by the unanimous declaration of the press of this country and the liberal press of Europe; but hero worship is no part of our duty; we are to legislate and to affirm principles. If we pass these resolutions, as I trust we shall, while we thank the gallant captain, we declare, as the representatives of the American people, that we approve the act in the light of all its surrounding circumstances, and affirm those great principles of natural and international law on which only it is to be justified. We do more, we throw a light into the darkened firmament of Europe, blazing a meteor for an hour, and shining a fixed star forever.

I must dissent from the remark which has been made during the debate—that Congress is not the place to enunciate principles. So thought not the signers of the Declaration of Independence; but they, "in Congress assembled," proclaimed their principles and to their maintenance pledged fortune, life, and honor; and we, by adopting the proposition now before us, will announce and affirm a principle of vital importance.

I will now state what I understand by these resolutions:

I understand the first resolution—and that is the one which contains the whole declaration of principles—to contain three distinct propositions. The first is the right of an individual to expatriate himself, to choose his own place of residence, irrespective of the accident of birth, and a distinct denial of the right of a prince to track his subject into foreign countries, and there claim jurisdiction over him. The assertion that the seizure of Koszta was "illegal" is a direct and positive enunciation of this principle. The second proposition is the right of this Government to afford protection to such persons as choose to come here and adopt this country as their place of residence. The third proposition is the approval by Congress of the act of Captain Ingraham, and the act of our Government in sustaining him. If there is any man in the House who is not prepared to take this new step, who is not now ready to assume this position, I trust that he will vote against the resolutions. I believe the time has come when we should, and when we must, concur in these principles. The executive branch of the Government has already done so in the letter of Secretary Marcy, which has so often been referred to—a letter which, let me say, is destined to an immortality almost equal to Magna Charta or the Declaration of Independence, if it is not sacrilege to compare anything to the Declaration of Independence. This letter, sir, is another Magna Charta—one that has long been needed—an American Magna Charta for adopted citizens.

MR. MILLSON.—It seems to me that the friends of this resolution unnecessarily create prejudice against it, by attributing to the letter of the Secretary of State a position which he never meant to assume. My friend from New York has just told us that the position taken by the Secretary of State in his letter was one novel and hitherto unknown in international history. Now, I wish very briefly to call his attention to a paragraph in that letter, in which I think he will discover that the secretary did not regard his position as at all novel or unknown.

"The vindication of these agents is not placed upon any principle new to the international code, or unknown in the practice of enlightened nations. These nations do not hesitate, in the exercise of the right of protection, to extend it to persons (not always subjects according to their municipal laws) who are clothed with their nationality; and in some instances they have carried this right of protection to limits which this Government would not venture, because it would not feel justified, to approach; nor have any of these nations been disposed to abandon the exercise of this right from a timid apprehension that it might possibly bring them into an occasional collision with other powers."

Mr. Marcy never said that the Government of the United States were bound to protect Martin Kozsta, but in twenty instances he has said that they had the right to protect him; and in saying this he expressly says that he asserts a principle not new to the international code. And the whole experience of the present day justifies him in saying it. At this very moment it is a question under considerations by England and France whether they shall not interpose, in the exercise of their sovereign discretion, for the protection of the Sultan of Turkey. Yet no gentleman will pretend that the Sultan is a citizen of either power, or that there is any obligation resting upon them, except in their own discretion, to afford him any such protection.

MR. PARKER.—The secretary says:

"This right to protect persons having a domicile, though not native-born or naturalized citizens, rests on the firm foundation of justice, and the claim to be protected is earned by considerations which the protecting power is not at liberty to disregard."

I think this is conclusive upon this point.

MR. DEAN.—I had the letter of the secretary open, and was about to read that precise sentence in reply to the remarks of my friend from Virginia. But he misappehends me or the secretary. I was speaking of the doctrine of allegiance, or subjection as it exists in Europe, as contradistinguished from our laws on that subject, and Secretary Marcy, in the passage which the gentleman has cited, was commenting upon an entirely different subject—the right exercised by all civilized nations to extend protection to those whom they do not regard as subjects or citizens, but who, for commercial purposes or otherwise, have been invested with their nationality.

The Austrian Chargé d'Affaires on this subject says:

"In our opinion, Koszta has never ceased to be an Austrian subject. Everything combines to make the Imperial Government persist in this estimate of the matter. The laws of his country are opposed to Koszta's breaking asunder of his own accord, and without having obtained permission to expatriate himself from the authorities of that country, the ties of nationality which bind him to it."

The American Secretary of State, in reply to this assertion, answers:

"There are great diversity and much confusion of opinion as to the nature and obligations of allegiance. By some it is held to be an indestructible political tie, and though resulting from the mere accident of birth, yet forever binding the subject to the sovereign; by others it is considered a political connection in the nature of a civil contract, dissoluble by mutual consent, but not so at the option of either party. The sounder and more prevalent doctrine, however, is that the citizen or subject, having faithfully performed the past and present duties resulting from his relation to the sovereign power, may at any time release himself from the obligation of allegiance, freely quit the land of his birth or adoption, seek through all countries a home, and select anywhere that which offers him the fairest prospect of happiness for himself and his posterity."

Here, then, is a distinct issue between the two governments on this question. Captain Ingraham carried out the American doctrine, and we, by approving his conduct, affirm this principle and indorse the action of the Government in sustaining him.

But we are told that, though this Government may have the right, it is not its duty to protect persons standing in the same relation which Koszta occupied. This cannot be, for allegiance and protection are reciprocal—the former proceeds from the latter; and the American law upon this subject is most beautifully and forcibly stated in the following extract from the secretary's letter:

"Whenever, by the operation of the law of nations, an individual becomes clothed with our national character, be he a native born or naturalized citizen, an exile driven from his early home by political oppression, or an emigrant enticed from it by the hopes of a better fortune for himself and his posterity, he can claim the protection of this government, and it may respond to that claim without being obliged to explain its conduct to any foreign power; for it is its duty to make its nationality respected by other nations, and respectable in every quarter of the globe."

My colleague from New York [Mr. Maurice] refers me to another portion of the letter, in which the secretary asserts that Koszta, on the ground of domicile, had a right to ask, and that, on that ground, it was the duty of the Government to afford, protection as long as his character of a domiciliated resident continued. In this he is clearly right, and sustained by both reason and authority.

When gentlemen say that the act of Ingraham is one of doubtful propriety, I tell them that upon that point the Administration take issue with them, and for the verdict appeal to the country. That there may be no misapprehension, and that no one may vote for this resolution ignorant of the facts, what did Captain Ingraham do? And here let me pause to say a word in reply to the objection raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones]. The gentleman wants to know why we do not tender this vote of thanks to Mr. Brown, the American consul, instead of to Captain Ingraham? If the gentleman will look at the letter of Mr. Hülsemann, he will see that Mr. Brown directed, or rather advised, Captain Ingraham to demand the release of Koszta. Well, he did demand his release, but what use would it have been if he had stopped there? The letter of his instructions beyond this was silent. But Captain Ingraham, having demanded the release of Koszta, went further, took the means necessary to make that demand effectual, and told the representative of the Austrian Government—the commander of the Hussar—on the morning of the 2d July, that unless the man was delivered up by four o'clock in the afternoon he would take him by force. It was his gallant, prompt, and judicious conduct in going further that awards the great merit to Captain Ingraham, and which has invested his name and the flag he bore with such peculiar glory.

Mr. Hülsemann says that he then drew his ship up in line of battle, and prepared to carry out his threat. I will say, further, that the captain of the Austrian brig waited until within ten minutes of four o'clock before he undertook to release his prisoner. Koszta was in the hold of his vessel, and in irons. At that time, having made previous threats of shooting him, they sent down for him. He was afraid that they were taking him to be shot, for he had been told in the morning that such would be his fate if the demand of Ingraham was persisted in. It was a sublime sight—one which has rarely been equaled in history—to see Captain Ingraham standing on the deck of his vessel, with her guns pointed, the torches lighted, and he awaiting, with watch in hand, to give the word of command to fire; the Austrian officers, however, just before the expiration of the time, said, hurriedly, to the prisoner, "We want you no longer here"; and he was delivered just three minutes before four o'clock.

The gentleman inquired the other day whether, if Koszta had not been given up, Ingraham would have been justified in firing into the Austrian vessel? I answer promptly that he would; and, if he had done it, the whole American people, and the laws of nations, would have sustained him. He was at that time the representative of our nation, and demanding the release of a man who claimed the protection of our Government, and who had in his possession papers which entitled him to that protection.

There is another ground upon which the American people will justify Captain Ingraham, and that is this: Our diplomatic representatives, whether properly or not, have been charged with remissness in asserting the rights of Americans traveling abroad. They have waited, and they have doubted. Ingraham, in this case, the moment he received the word from our agent that there was a man claiming the protection of the American Government in imprisonment, did not send home to search the parish registers to know where he was born, nor trace out the branch of the genealogical tree from which he claimed to spring. He did not wait to examine the records of all the courts to see whether he had declared his intention to become a citizen—or to ascertain the genuineness of the papers he bore, or inquire into the power of the court to grant them. Is an American commander to do so in any case? On the contrary, when the right is claimed by one whom he is satisfied is entitled to it, he should get nine points of the law—that is, possession—leaving the question involved to be afterward settled between the two governments. That is the manner in which our representatives should act. And the conduct of Ingraham, acting as he has, promptly and successfully, upon these principles, has given us respect abroad, and dignity and consideration everywhere.

I was reading but yesterday an extract from a letter received from one of the officers of the St. Louis, which stated that when Captain Ingraham entered the harbor of Alexandria he was received amid the joyful ringing of bells and firing of cannon; and that when he entered the theater the American flag was flying, and he was received with cheers. Such tributes as these, sir, make an American proud of his country, and will have their effect in the army and navy. No single battle has ever added such luster to the American name. It has given us a respect abroad which could not be secured by the most successful naval engagement.

We are now to take our position in reference to the rights of our citizens abroad. And those who favor the passage of these resolutions mean to send word to all that it is the deliberate voice of the American Congress that the rights of an American citizen abroad shall be guarded as vigilantly as if he were upon our own soil; and, if necessary, that the whole force of the Government shall be invoked to afford him protection—that the deck of an American ship is sacred; and the spot on which a person entitled to the protection of our Government stands, whether at home or abroad, is as inviolable as the sanctuary of the gods.

Mr. Disney.—It has been remarked, as well in the Koszta letter as upon this floor, that the Secretary of State set forth on that occasion no new doctrine; that he only referred to principles known to the law of nations. To this I must give my dissent. I do not so read it. For the purposes of commerce, the laws of nations have recognized the fact that an individual may acquire a domicile in a country alien to the one of his origin. They have recognized that, for commercial purposes, he may be clothed with the nationality of a country alien to the one to which he owes his allegiance; and the error of the secretary consists in this—he has confounded political with commercial law. That, while he finds the language which he uses running through the books upon the subject, yet he has omitted to notice and recognize the distinction of which I have spoken, that the nationality which is given by domicile is conferred for commercial purposes. This distinction is palpably and unmistakably laid down in the very authorities which the secretary himself cites; and in this nationality the individual must be limited to such acts as are not incompatible with his allegiance.

As the property of a country constitutes a part of its strength, so the legitimate right of a country in time of war is to weaken its enemy by the destruction and capture of its property; and the courts of England and France, as well as those of our own country, have held that in the execution of this right it is not to be permitted to an individual, under cover of a different nationality, though a resident of the country, to protect the property which is the product of the hostile soil.

The whole difficulty in this case has arisen from confounding political with commercial law—from confounding commercial relations with the right and duty of an individual, as a subject; and I use the word "subject" not in contradistinction to the term which we use in this country—that of "citizen"—but to designate the relations between the governed and the government. I am inquiring into the political relations of the individual under the government. The right and duty of an individual under a government, viewed in his political relations to that government, and the rights of that individual toward that government, in his commercial transactions, in regard to the property of the country in which he is a resident, are different and separate things. There are two sorts of allegiance. The books of this country and Europe recognize them with entire distinctness. The temporary allegiance growing out of a domicile, and connected with the commercial transactions of the country; the personal duty while within the jurisdiction; and the permanent allegiance growing out of the duties of the citizen in the abstract, without regard to his commercial relations and his connection with the property of the country, which reach beyond the jurisdiction of the country. Permanent allegiance imposes upon an individual the obligation to support, defend, and obey the Government, whether at home or abroad. Temporary allegiance imposes upon the individual the necessity of obeying the laws of the country while he is within the jurisdiction of the country within which he is residing, within which he domiciliated, provided they are not incompatible with the obligations he owes to the country to which his permanent allegiance is due. This is a distinction which the Secretary of State has overlooked. It is an important one, vast and mighty in its consequences.

Take the case of Koszta to illustrate this: while he remained within the limits of the Republic, with an intention to remain permanently here, he owed temporary allegiance to the Government, and was entitled to protection within its jurisdiction. But if he had left these shores without the intention of returning, no sooner had he quitted the dock at New York than he would have been divested of all his obligations of temporary allegiance to this Government, and this Government would have been relieved from all obligations in respect to his protection. They were under obligations to protect him in his property and in his relations to his property, whether within or without the jurisdiction of the United States, but not to protect the individual, in his political relations, outside of the jurisdiction of the country, on account of any claim which he may have acquired in his political relations to the institutions of the country during his residence here.

But, sir, before we can decide whether Martin Koszta was entitled to any privileges even of domiciliation, we must first inquire into the intention of the party in leaving our shores—whether it was for temporary purposes merely. He left, as we understand, with the intention of returning to this country. What, then, was the position he occupied? To that question my reply is that he occupied precisely the position of a British subject residing—domiciliated—as a merchant in New York, who leaves the country and takes a voyage to France, to accomplish purposes connected with his business. Now, sir, while he is there, in the heart of France, he is an American merchant, but a British subject—with a temporary allegiance to the United States, but a permanent allegiance to Great Britain. Martin Koszta, in commercial matters, would have been as an American merchant who was temporarily in Smyrna; but though occupying such relations he might have been an Austrian subject beside. Such is the doctrine of the law. It was the right and duty of the United States to protect his property as an American merchant; but in his political relations, as soon as he left our shores, he was absolved from all allegiance to this Government, and the Government at the same time was absolved from obligations to protect him while he remained without the jurisdiction of the country. As an individual, Koszta owed no allegiance to the American Government; and, as I before observed, when he left our shores the American Government was relieved from the correlative duty of affording him its protection. He stood in the attitude of an American citizen, so far as property was concerned; and as such the American Government was placed under obligations to protect him in his property. His right to such protection would have been recognized in any of the courts of Europe, or in any courts of our own country.

With regard to the policy of adopting the doctrine that an individual coming here without any assumption of allegiance creates a duty upon the part of this Government to extend to him its protection, the idea is utterly absurd; and if this Government attempts to defend such a position it will ere long be compelled to retract and retrace its steps. Our Government is but one among a community of nations.

The very authorities which the secretary has consulted, and whose language may be found in every page of this document, have laid down the doctrine for which I contend, and the limitations which he has entirely overlooked—that is, that the nationality of which he speaks is acquired for commercial purposes, and can impose no duty incompatible with allegiance.

In the case of the Venus (8 Cranch), the Supreme Court is remarkably explicit: "What are the consequences to which this acquired domicile may legally expose the person entitled to it, in the event of a war between the government under which he resides and that to which he owes a permanent allegiance?" is the question asked, and to this the court replies, that "to his native country he cannot be considered an enemy, in the strict sense of the word; yet he is deemed such with reference to the seizure of so much of his property concerned in the trade of the enemy as is connected with his residence. It is found adhering to the enemy. He is himself adhering to the enemy, although not criminally so, unless he engages in acts of hostility against his native country"; that is to say, against his permanent allegiance. Grotius is quoted to the same point—563. The domiciliated party, says the court, in the same case, "are bound by such residents to the society of which they are members, subject to the laws of the State, and owing a qualified allegiance thereto. They are obliged to defend it, with an exception in favor of a subject in relation to his native country."

But Judge Marshall was unwilling to go even to the extent which the majority of the court assumed:

"I think [said he in the same case] I cannot be mistaken when I say that, in all the views taken of this subject by the most approved writers on the law of nations, the citizen of one country residing in another is not considered as incorporated in that other, but is still considered as belonging to that society of which he was originally a member."

"For commercial purposes [says the judge], the merchant is considered as a member of that society in which he has his domicile." "The policy of commercial nations receives foreign merchants into their bosom, and permits their own citizens to reside abroad for the purposes of trade, without injury to their rights or character as citizens." "Nor will they hastily construe such residence into a change of national character, to the injury of the individual."

I am asked if the repeal of the prohibitory clause in relation to aliens going abroad during their probation does not involve an obligation to protect them while they are abroad? To this I answer that I suppose that the repeal of that clause merely places an alien where he would have been if that clause had never been enacted. It goes only to his capability to become a citizen.

This country is now occupying a position among the nations of the earth vastly more important than what she has heretofore done. And proud as we are, and just in proportion as we are proud of the glory, and the honor, and the renown, and dignity, and the reputation of this Republic, we will be chary of putting the country in a position which may inflict hereafter a stain upon that reputation and renown. I say, for this Government, exalted as she is in character, and developed as she is in strength, to lay down doctrines from which, in the future, she will be compelled to recede would be a stain upon that character; and it is to avoid a position of the kind that I have felt myself called upon to direct the attention of the House and the country to the doctrines which have heretofore been entertained, not only by our own Government, but by every government in Europe.

CHAPTER VI

Nativism

[THE KNOW-NOTHING MOVEMENT]

Rise of the "Know Nothing" Party—Debate in the House of Representatives on the Party and Its Principles: in Favor, Nathaniel P. Banks [Mass.]; Opposed, William S. Barry [Miss.].

SINCE Tammany Hall, the local Democratic organization of New York City, largely recruited its membership from immigrants, in conferring citizenship on these the officials in charge of naturalization in the city, being members of the Hall, winked at the grossest violations of the law. These abuses finally became so glaring that in 1835 a new party arose in opposition to them, which called itself the American Republican.

Its growth was rapid: in two years it elected the mayor of New York. The movement spread to Philadelphia, where the same abuses of the naturalization laws existed, and by 1844 it had secured six Congressmen from these two cities. Then it suddenly dwindled, and in the succeeding Congress, when it assumed the name of Native American, it had but one Representative (who came from Philadelphia). However, it revived again after the Presidential election of 1852, when the Whigs (who received few accessions from the foreign-born population) had become embittered by their overwhelming disaster and the prospect of still greater defeats at the hands of the swelling numbers of the Democracy, and were ready to form any new political combination which should cut off recruits from the dominant party.

By this time the organization had taken the form of a secret fraternity. Its name was said to be "The Sons of 76," or "The Order of the Star-Spangled Banner," though its members were pledged by oath not to reveal its real name, and were instructed to reply to all inquiries concerning the same, "I don't know," whence arose the popular designation of the party as "Know-Nothing." Its purpose was apparent: the restriction, so far as possible, of American citizenship and political preferment to those persons born in this country, with especial exclusion of Roman Catholics. Its favorite countersign was an order which General Washington is reported (on uncertain authority) to have given on a critical occasion during the Revolution: "Put none but Americans on guard to-night."

On June 17, 1854, in the same year in which the Republican party was organized, the Know-Nothings formed a constitution under the name of the American party, the contents of which, though officially considered secret, soon transpired. This proscribed from office-holding not only all foreign-born persons, but also native Americans who were members of the Roman Catholic Church, to whose hierarchical tendencies and not its religious beliefs objection was made. Justification of this position was found in the facts that Brownson's Review and the Freeman's Journal, the leading Roman Catholic papers of the country, asserted the right of the Church to dictate and review the acts of public executives and representatives, and that dignitaries of the Church, such as Archbishop John Hughes of New York, demanded that Roman Catholic parochial schools be supported by the public funds. The controversy over public aid to the parochial schools continued to be a State issue (particularly in New York) for many years. Thomas Nast, the cartoonist, most vigorously attacked the "Roman Catholic hierarchy" for its opposition to the democratic principle of divorce of Church and State in the school question and other related issues.

The Roman Catholic bishops of New York also demanded that Church property be placed in their hands, although the constitution of the State required that all religious bodies be incorporated and that their property be held by trustees. This demand was resisted by a number of Roman Catholic congregations, and Cardinal Bedini was sent over by the Pope in 1853 to settle the difficulty. Now this nuncio had aided in suppressing a revolution in Bologna, one of the patriots being executed. Accordingly he was stigmatized as "Ugo Bassi's executioner," and was insulted in a number of cities where he appeared in public. He decided in favor of the bishops in the controversy over Church property, and, when the trustees resisted the transfer, excommunicated these, whereupon they petitioned the State legislature, complaining that the penalty had been incurred because of their fidelity to the law. The legislature upheld the trustees, although eight years afterward the law was amended so that the bishops obtained a virtual victory.

In the State elections of 1854 the American party carried Massachusetts and Delaware and made a strong showing in New York. In the next year it gained the legislatures of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, California, Kentucky, and Maryland, and was beaten only by small majorities in a number of Southern States. Encouraged by this success it prepared in the presidential campaign to oppose to the anti-slavery issue of the rival new party, the Republican, that of nativism, or opposition to foreign influence in American politics.

On February 21, 1856, in secret convention at Philadelphia, the American party adopted a platform containing the following principles:

"(3) Americans must rule America; and to this end native-born citizens should be selected for all State, Federal, and municipal offices. (9) A change in the laws of naturalization, making a continued residence of twenty-one years necessary for future citizenship. (12) The enforcement of 'all laws' until repealed or decided unconstitutional. (13) Opposition to Pierce's administration for its expulsion of 'Americans' from office and for its reopening sectional strife by repealing the Missouri Compromise."

On February 22 the convention nominated Millard Fillmore [N. Y.] for President and Andrew J. Donelson [Tenn.] for Vice-President. These nominations, though not the platform, were ratified by the Whig national convention held at Baltimore on September 17. The issue of the party, however, could not replace that of slavery in the minds of the people, and only Maryland cast its votes (eight in number) for the candidates. Thereafter the party speedily dwindled. In 1857-9 it had five Senators and from fifteen to twenty Representatives in Congress, and in 1859-61 two Senators and twenty-three Representatives, mostly from the border States. The Civil War completely killed the party, although its principles cropped out at times thereafter in minor political organizations such as the American Protective Association, known as the "A. P. A."

The new party formed the chief subject of discussion in the House of Representatives during the session of 1854-55. The debate was inaugurated with an attack on the party by William S. Barry [Miss.] on December 18, 1854, in a speech on "Civil and Religious Toleration." This was replied to on the same day by Nathaniel P. Banks [Mass.].

The Know-Nothing Party

House of Representatives, December 18, 1854

Mr. Barry.—This society, or association, known by the name of "Know-Nothings," is one which has recently sprung into existence. Its founders are unknown; its purposes are unknown, because the purposes avowed by those who are supposed to belong to it—by those advocating it—are contradictory in their character. These are to be deduced, not from authorized avowals of those acknowledged to belong to the society, but they are to be gathered by scraps, collected here and there from the declarations of those who are suspected of being members, or who have incidentally acquired information. It is not like other political organizations here, avowing principles, and meeting and daring the responsibility of the avowal. It is not like other associations, which having principles believed to be of vital importance to the country, their members are willing to declare those principles, and to stand or fall with them. If, then, in attempting to find out the purposes of this order, I shall do injustice to it—if I shall ascribe to it that which its advocates deny, let members upon this floor, if there be such belonging to the order, rise and correct me. I shall be willing to be supplied with the information—more willing, perhaps, than they will be to give it.

This association appeals to that which is strong in every country. It appeals to that feeling of nationality without which a nation cannot exist as an independent government, but which, at the same time, when kindled and maddened, may destroy all that is good in government, and subvert the very principles on which it was established. There is no nation in the world in which this prejudice against foreigners cannot be aroused; but the most beautiful and soothing effect of civilization, the loveliest influence of our own institutions, has been to mollify this prejudice against those outside our borders, and to bring the whole family of nations, as it were, into a common brotherhood. According to the degree of a nation's civilization, you will find this prejudice and hostility to foreigners. In proportion as a nation is elevated in its consciousness of power, and in its knowledge of the high duties of civilization, will it receive and treat with respect those who spring from a foreign soil, or are reared under the influence of different ideas; as it sinks in the scale of self-respect and civilization, in the same degree do you find this prejudice; and as a nation is possessed of a rabble instead of a people, it will be seen that its fury can be aroused against all who cannot pronounce its shibboleth.

One of the most frequent justifications of this organization, Mr. Chairman, is that there are secret associations of foreigners which must be counteracted in this manner. If such political associations exist among the foreign population of this country, it certainly seems a strange method to rebuke the error by forming other associations, in which is embodied all that is wrong in those we condemn. We give dignity and consequence to their conduct by imitating it, and lose all the advantage of honest principles by leveling our own conduct to the standard of those we reprobate. If the foreigners have adopted rules of action incompatible either with social order or political rights, there can be no duty more consistent with pure philanthropy or elevated patriotism than the attempt to correct their error, and infuse into their minds juster views of the duties of the citizen, both to his neighbor and to the State. We have adopted the humane and tolerant opinion of Mr. Jefferson, the great apostle of the Democratic party, and who infused into it that generous and trusting faith in man, whether native or alien born, which has been the germ of the chief differences between the two great parties of the country, "That little is to be feared from error, while reason is left free to combat it." The evils that we see are not to be cured by persecution; the faggot and the stake are exploded arguments; and having discarded the more open, manly, and responsible instruments of torture, we will not now turn to seize upon those which are secret, sinister, and irresponsible.

Secret political associations have heretofore existed in oppressed countries, for enlarging the rights of the citizens, and limiting the powers of rulers; but this is the first, so far as my reading extends, in which the effort has been made, through such an organization, to narrow the liberty of man, and graft an oppressive principle upon the government. There has been a strong repugnance to these political associations in this country from the earliest period of our history. The society of the Cincinnati, formed immediately after the Revolution, and composed of men fresh from the baptism of fire and blood in that holy struggle, has decayed, and almost expired, under the distrust felt by the American people of secret associations, which might be wielded to the detriment of the public liberty, or to serve the ambitious purposes of those who would make the association the instrument of their own advancement. The times are not so improved, nor men grown so patriotic, that a power which was denied by public opinion to the best patriots of the purest days of the Revolution can safely be intrusted to the hands of those who can show no peculiar claim, either of service or purity, to special confidence.

Mr. Chairman, two distinct questions are presented in examining this subject—first, the purposes which the order has in view; and, secondly, the means by which they are to be accomplished.

These purposes, as gathered from supposed members, from newspapers professing to advocate the views of the order, and from the writings and speeches of those affecting to sympathize with it, are—

First. The exclusion of all foreigners from office.

Second. The extension of the term of naturalization from five to twenty-one years, or some other period longer than five years.

Third. The entire repeal of the naturalization laws.

Fourthly. The exclusion of Roman Catholics from office.

The means by which these things are to be accomplished are a secret political association, in which the members are bound by the most solemn oaths to obedience, to silence, and to mutual fidelity.

I shall speak, first, of the organization, and then of the purposes the order has in view.

I can but believe that a secret political association is dangerous to the rights of the people and to the stability of the Government. In a free government, where every man is entitled to declare his opinions, and there is no punishment for the avowal of whatever doctrines he may entertain, what excuse can there be for a resort to secrecy? When the people are oppressed by a tyrannical government, and the penalty of death awaits every man who dares to speak or think against the power that is crushing him, there may indeed be an excuse for patriots scheming in the darkness of midnight, and in the security of unknown places of meeting; but, in the midst of a people who enjoy every liberty that the most liberal institutions can bestow, where freedom of thought, of speech, of action, and of the press are the birthright of every man, how can a secret proscriptive organization be allowed to take root, and rights, the dearest that man can exercise, or government protect, be taken from the people by means so insidious and so fruitful of danger?

The Constitution allows no oaths to be forced upon the voter, nor tests to be imposed in the use of that franchise. The sense of duty and the personal stake of each man in the welfare of the community were thought sufficient to insure its faithful exercise. But this secret association attempts to bind men by the most stringent oaths to exercise the right of voting only as certain native patriots shall determine, in the secrecy, and perhaps in the darkness, of midnight. The citizen who assumes these oaths and obligations parts with his individual freedom, abandons his personal independence, and comes to the polls, not an untrammeled voter, but a mere machine to carry out, by his suffrage, the elections and the purposes which others—perhaps against his consent—have determined on. He barters away his freedom who makes any pledges or swears any oaths which impair his right to modify his ticket at any time prior to depositing it in the ballot box. The electoral franchise is one which is conferred on each individual who exercises it, and which he has no right to trammel the free, judicious use of, by private oaths and secret combinations; and his duty is to his country and the Constitution, not to midnight caucuses of ambitious and crafty men, who glaze over their schemes of selfishness with well-affected anxiety for the public good.

Here Mr. Barry quoted what was said to be the oath of the society.

In my judgment, sir, a man who is a member of an established government, from which he receives the amplest protection of person and property, and to which, in return, he owes the amplest measure of fidelity and obedience, has not the moral right to take such an oath as that I have quoted. He may as well owe allegiance to a foreign sovereign, and be ready to obey his commands, as assume obligations to any society of his countrymen which place him in collision with his own government. So plain, and almost self-evident is this truth, that a year since no one in this country could have been found to question it, as no one will a year or two hence, when this bubble, with its tints that delude some eyes, shall have passed into oblivion, with its elder brothers, the Alien and Sedition Laws, and when the public mind, which is now swayed from its self-poised equilibrium by a temporary excitement, shall have recovered its just position.

The oath provides that the member shall "not, under any circumstances, expose the name of any member of this order, nor reveal the existence of such an organization." This portion of the oath, perhaps, explains why those not in the order have never met a man who confessed that he belonged to it. And, sir, we have heard men deny connection with it, who we have every reason to be satisfied were members. Has any man the right to take an oath binding himself to the continuous statement of an untruth. Can that institution be good whose first fruits are thus evil? No, sir; it is wrong, radically wrong. Nor can the guilt of the deception be escaped by the flimsy evasion that the real name of the order is not "Know-Nothing," and that, consequently, a man may safely say he does not belong to one of that name, though he really is connected with the order which the public have designated by that title, and he well knows it is the one alluded to by the inquirer. Since his intention is to deceive, he is responsible for the deceit. Nor can he escape by the plea that the querist has no right to put the question, and that he is, therefore, at liberty to disregard the truth in his answer. It is by no means certain that each citizen has not the right to ask every other any question he may see fit, in reference to public matters, without being liable to the charge of inquisition or impertinence; and though the person asked may have the choice of silence or speech, he is under the common obligation that rests on all men, if he an- swers at all, to tell the truth. No oaths sworn, however solemnly, nor with the direst penalties that a secret midnight association ever devised, can discharge a citizen from the eternal duty of veracity. The difficulties in respect to truthfulness, in which a member is involved, arise from his oath to conceal the existence of the order, and his own connection with it. The object seems to be to protect the members from the odium with which secret political associations have been viewed in this country, and to secure the benefits of such an organization, while they escape the responsibility of a connection with it. There is more of wily cunning than of republican frankness and manhood in such a course.

But this secrecy necessarily destroys all confidence between men. Till this new order sprang into existence, with its frightful demands upon the conscience of its members, there existed among the citizens of our country such mutual trustfulness that the statements of men of good character were received without distrust upon all subjects; but since it has come to be admitted that some men, of hitherto unquestioned veracity, have falsely denied their connection with the order of the Know-Nothings, and it has even been more than suspected that some of those from whom we have a right to expect an especial purity of life, and by whom we have been accustomed to be taught that it is better to die than to stain our lips with untruth, have taken the oath before quoted, which requires of them conduct so much at variance with their teaching, it is not to be wondered at that some have become skeptical of the existence of human veracity. The whole social fabric rests upon the belief of truth among men; and the strongest bond of faith in an individual's truthfulness is the well-founded opinion that he has never once voluntarily defiled his soul with falsehood. To conceal effectually their connection with the order, the members may be, and some possibly have been, driven to a line of conduct, in my opinion, more reprehensible than a direct denial of the truth—the acting of a protracted and systematic falsehood. Having formerly belonged to the old Whig and Democratic parties, and not daring to excite suspicions, or to confirm those already entertained, of their belonging to the Know-Nothings, by separating themselves openly from their old friends, they still affect to retain their interest in party action and party success, allow themselves to be treated as members of their old parties, become possessed of information, which is given to them, as they well know, on the belief of their being still faithful to their former friends, and yet, while acting thus, they are under oaths which bind them to different parties, different principles, and different candidates.

That this is no idle supposition of my own, as some credulous persons, who think that such things cannot be in a free and manly country like our own, may be tempted to exclaim, I will quote from the resolves of a Know-Nothing Council in Brooklyn, New York. The preamble to those resolves declares that "good men and true had already been nominated by the great political parties of the State, the nomination of some of whom was effected by the direct action of this order." If any man, Whig or Democrat, had smuggled himself into a meeting of the other party, by pretending to belong to it, the judgment of all men would reprobate the act as perfidious and disgraceful. The contempt of all honorable men would follow him like a curse. What rule of morals can tolerate in members of this order that which is condemned in all other parties? Their first departure from sound principles in joining the order involves subsequent delinquencies to conceal it, and make it effectual. If trade and commerce require good faith and sincerity in those who follow those callings, how much more are they indispensable among those who are acting for the public, and whose conduct may influence for years to come their country's welfare.

It has been claimed, in support of the order, that both of the old parties are corrupt, and that it was necessary to form a new party, of purer principles and better material. An architect who should pronounce both of two buildings which he had examined unsound and unsafe in structure and detail would hardly be thought reliable if he should attempt to construct another edifice of the brick and stone which he had just condemned as useless and unworthy. Yet this order assumes to form, out of the corrupt members of the old parties, a society of immaculate patriots. A few of the old partisans get together and rate themselves above reproach, and then adopt such other citizens, members of the old corrupt parties, as are willing to unite in asserting the knavery of all other men and their own purity. This Pharisaical assumption of superiority is worthy of all rebuke and contempt. Those of this order supposed to be in this House, I must say, in all courtesy, I cannot rank one whit above the average of their fellow members in the qualities of citizens or legislators. Self-canonized saints and self-elected patriots are of questionable stuff. There is a spontaneous distrust of the assumption that arrogates to itself a Benjamin's portion of the common stock of human virtue and excellence, and the claim of impostors is usually extensive in proportion as it is groundless.

In a free government, I hold, sir, that there is no right in a portion of the people, whether a minority or a majority, to adopt a secret political policy, or pursue it by secret means. The commonwealth is the joint product of the thoughts and wills of the people who compose it. They have risked their mutual interests in a common venture. Counsel and service are due from each to all. Whatever pertains to the common benefit is the proper subject of mutual deliberation. I, as a member of society, may justly expect its protection in every right which the laws or the Constitution give me—protection not only against foreign invasion, but also against domestic violence; against the man who assaults my person, or wrests my property from me; but not a whit less against those who, by means of secret cabals, midnight assemblages, unnatural oaths, and malicious combinations, would peril, impair, or destroy any one of my civil or political rights. Society can protect me, can protect itself against the effects of these secret political associations, only by extirpating them. They are the fruits and the offspring of revolution: putrid bodies which the thunder of anarchy lifts from the deep in which they slumbered.

All citizens, I think, sir, are under obligations of candor and sincerity toward each other in matters political. I think the very nature of a free government requires it of them. The ballot of each voter is intended to be secret only so far as to protect him against violence, or any undue influence in preparing and casting it. This right to absolute freedom in performing this high civil act is not clearer than the corresponding obligation of every other man to refrain from all attempts to disturb, oppress, or intimidate him in the exercise of it. But when the ballot is put into the box, it ceases to be a mere private act, and becomes a part of the public history. An attempt at concealment provokes inquiry, and justifies it. There can be but two reasons for keeping a vote secret—timidity, if we think ourselves right, or shame and conscious guilt, if we believe ourselves wrong. And a man must be deficient in some of the better qualities of citizenship who is willing to assign either of them as an excuse for a secret vote. And the motives that prompt the vote, since he has no right to be influenced by any but those of the public good, are also proper subjects of inquiry, and, if the voter be a man, of free and truthful answer. No man ever cast a secret vote, even if his purpose were as kindly a one as to avoid making a preference between rival friends, but felt his self-respect lowered, and that he had not acted up to the full dignity of citizenship. There is, and there should be, no penalty attached to the exercise of the right of voting, but the estimate which the public may attach to a man's character, according as he is thought to have used his privilege well or ill. It is simply an item going to make up the aggregate of character. Nor should there be laws compelling him to declare how he voted; in free countries, the great mass of men being independent, in fact, as well as name, will spurn concealment in the matter; and I do not know, in all history, of more than one inquisitorial attempt, by an ex post facto law, to compel the citizen to declare for whom he had voted; and this attempt, so tyrannical, was made, not by foreigners, who, ignorant of the genius of republicanism, might, unconsciously, have violated its principles; nor by the old parties of the country who, immersed in senility and corruption, might be indifferent to the forms of liberty, but by the conclave of patriots who assembled in New York as a Know Nothing council, representatives of those who are to regenerate America; who, mourning the decay of public spirit and the corruption of national virtue, have, by self-election, and the imposition of their own hands, set themselves apart for the work of reformation.

Public opinion is one of the most efficient restraints on human action. The punishments of this world seem, with but too many, more terrible than the retribution of that which is to come. The criticism, the censure of men often restrain evil-disposed persons, and an enlightened public opinion guides and sustains the virtue of individuals. We find the action of political parties is purest when it is most under the public eye; and, as the veil of secrecy is thrown about it, there is a culpable laxity of conduct. A private caucus, though there is no obligation of secrecy, is thought less free from corruption than a public convention. Meetings of which there is no record but the unsafe memory of those present are likely to be less judicious than those in which everything is recorded and published. A railroad, or other corporation directory, which gives its proceedings no publicity in a twelvemonth is the subject of distrust, and too often falls into downright knavery. These things we all see and know; and yet it is maintained that it is possible for an association, secret, irresponsible, its members unknown, and denying their connection with it, to select its candidates and elect them, and to control the government of a great country without danger to the rights of the people or of corruption among the members. Where this secrecy begins, freedom ends. When the streets of Paris streamed with blood; when the guillotine was the only engine whose activity was not palsied by the general terror that pervaded the land, the orders that plunged France into such frightful calamities issued from the midnight, secret, irresponsible association of the Jacobins. A career that begins in religious and political proscription may well end, like theirs, with the lamp-post and the guillotine.

The first avowed purpose of the order which I shall discuss is the exclusion of foreigners from office. The pledge of the member on entering the order is that "he will not vote or give his influence for any man for any office in the gift of the people unless he be an American-born citizen." A judicious man, it seems to me, will hardly deny that it is equally criminal to do, by indirection, as to do openly that which we are forbidden under the Constitution. That instrument confers on alien-born citizens a complete eligibility to seats in the House of Representatives and Senate, when the respective periods of age and citizenship have been completed, as upon native-born citizens. No man will deny that Congress possesses no power to add, by law, to the age or period of citizenship fixed by the Constitution, and that such a law would be unconstitutional and void. Any attempt to do so would be an assault upon a right which the framers of the Constitution thought of sufficient importance to guard by a special provision, and I can see no distinction in justice between attempting to rob them of the rights by a law and by a secret association.

There is no obligation, in my judgment, to vote for a foreigner to any office more than for any other citizen; but there is an obligation not to form a combination against him by which he is to be disfranchised or stinted in the enjoyment of any constitutional right.

If it be true that foreigners are less fit for office than native citizens, it is a gross distrust of the national common sense to suppose the people will not act upon it, and a poor commentary upon public spirit that special oaths and the terrors of a secret inquisition are needed to urge them up to the discharge of an obvious duty. I cannot but believe that true policy and justice are, in this case, harmonious. These foreigners are in our midst; they have come under our invitation, and have trusted to the liberal spirit of the age and the generous provisions of our laws and Constitution, and our purpose should be, by acting up to the full measure of good faith, to encourage them to the highest standard of republican citizenship. They are citizens, with the right to vote, and policy dictates that they should be so treated as soonest to nationalize them, that the peculiarities of their birth, education, language, and ideas may be lost in the character of our own people. There is no safety in a course that excludes them from any right which is theirs by the Constitution and laws, and which induces them, from wounded pride, to perpetuate the distinctions which separate them from the native-born citizens.

Justice would teach us that foreigners should receive a share of offices proportioned to their number, if the subject becomes a matter of mathematical division; but it would be more fortunate for the peace of the country if the question of nativity and religion were never raised, and if selections to office were made according as Mr. Jefferson's strong questions are answered, "Is he honest? Is he competent? If he faithful to the Constitution?"

Second. The extension of the term of naturalization to twenty-one years, or some other period longer than five years.

The intermingling of races here is one potent element of our growth and success. Those nations have been foremost in the world's history whose characters have been the amalgam of the greatest variety of the best races of the earth. A constant immigration of enough to produce variety, but not to perpetuate diversity, would, I believe, contribute to preserve and increase our vigor. But I wish to see no foreign settlements in our country; no papers, schools, and school-books in a foreign tongue; no regions of country in which a traveler might fancy himself on the banks of the Rhine, or the greensward of Ireland. I desire our people to be homogeneous in language and institutions; I would have the first generation of foreigners to be the last, their children I would have American in tongue, in education, in principle, and in law.

It is said that this extension is rendered necessary by the abuses of the present system.

These abuses are chiefly through false naturalization papers and false swearing. They exist, I am inclined to think, less through any defect in the present laws than through the defect in their enforcement. The use of false naturalization papers, illegal voting, and the perjury attendant upon both are offences against the laws of the State where they are committed; and it is to the State tribunals that the citizens must look for redress and the vindication of their rights. There is no ground, none whatever, to believe that grand juries would be more active to find indictments under a new law than under the old one, nor that petit juries would be more prompt to convict.

It is useless to cumber the statute book with laws which there is not the public virtue to enforce. No law can execute itself; it must have the agency of man to administer it, and it is useless to attempt to make the barbarous severity of the statute atone for the apathy of the people. If the evil exists in the magnitude described, if offences are so many and punishments so rare, the root of the evil would seem to lie deeper than an imperfect statute. It cannot lie in the law merely, for that would be pointed out and remedied; nor in the officers of the law, the juries, the attorneys, and the judges, for a wholesome public opinion would impel them to the discharge of their duty; but it lies deeper; I fear it lies in a corrupted public sentiment. Individuals dislike the labor and inconvenience with which a prosecution is attended, and, after an ebullition of temper and a few newspaper paragraphs upon election frauds, the matter is allowed to drop. Another reason, perhaps, quite as effectual, is that both parties in the cities have been engaged in the disreputable work of procuring fraudulent votes, and each fears to provoke inquiry into its own conduct by attempting to expose the crimes of the other. But even if all the illegal voting complained of were confined to foreigners, by whom is the temptation to commit the offence offered? Certainly by our own native citizens; and it seems strange that the whole indignation is visited upon the foreigner, who is denounced as "ignorant and corrupt," and scarcely a censure is bestowed upon the native who debauched him, and who, I suppose, by contrast, is to be regarded as "intelligent and virtuous."

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the cause of the evil which is ascribed to the immigration of foreigners may be justly sought for even further back than the condition of public sentiment where it exists. As a state becomes more refined and populous, the disparity in the condition of the people becomes greater. The inequalities of wealth and social advantages are more obvious; the rich become richer and the poor poorer. If there be any method of preventing this result, political philosophy has not yet announced it; and the evil has begun to be felt in this country in our large cities. There is, in all of them, a portion of the community, happily for us yet small, who are sunk in vice and ignorance. As the population becomes denser there will be accessions constantly to the number, and in due time there will exist a class in this country, as in the Old World, in which vice, and crime, and destitution will be the hereditary condition. It is from this class, and those who approach its condition, that the material for fraudulent voting is drawn. So far as this class exists in our midst, a large share of it, I believe, will be found among the foreign population; because they congregate about the cities, where the vice of proletarianism mainly flourishes, and because the native population, from its superior intelligence and familiarity with the mode of life here, has retained the more lucrative occupations, leaving to the foreigner the humbler and cheaper ones, and those which are first to suffer from revulsions in trade and commerce. Population and production march on closely together; there will not, for any great length of time, be a wide disparity between the supply of food and the number of people to consume it. And when the amount produced and that requisite for consumption are about equal, a slight decrease of the former, or of the supply of labor by which it is to be produced, results in poverty and starvation. Such is the state of things in the greater part of Europe. Such, in a mitigated form, is getting to be the condition of our larger cities. The accounts of the destitution now prevailing in some of them among the honest and industrious and the gloomy anticipations of the coming winter are heartrending. Yet government has not caused it; the tariff has not caused it; foreigners have not caused it; nor even the present war, though that event may have precipitated it. It is the effect of those mutations which are the inevitable condition of existence, and which are brought about by the whole variety of those perplexed causes which have produced that result which we call "the present state of things." Our very prosperity has been as effective in bringing it about as any other cause. High excitements in the commercial world are always followed by periods of languor and depression, and the suggestions of quacks and their still more dangerous remedies are alike to be discarded. Republican institutions can protect us against unjust legislation, oppressive taxes, and guilty wars, but they cannot secure us against the inexorable laws of trade, commerce, and manufactures. It is, then, unjust to ascribe to transient causes evils which appear inseparable from the structure of civilized society.

But, sir, if all these evils were the result of fraudulent voting, how would the mischief be remedied by extending the period of probation from five to twenty-one years? If five years' delay is so irksome that the foreigner will risk the penalties of fraudulent voting and perjury to escape it, it seems to me the temptation would be multiplied fourfold by increasing the delay to twenty-one years.

So far as the extension of the period to twenty-one years is a sentiment, a mere gratification of a feeling or a prejudice, it is either above or beneath reason, but, as a statesman's remedy for an existing abuse, it seems entirely incompetent and unsatisfactory.

The discussion of this subject is too portentous, too pregnant with the high philosophy of races, population, and government, to be handled by those whose whole political pharmacy is persecution, whose highest ambition is the ejection of an Irish tide-waiter from his office, and the summit of their statesmanship to combine the "isms" that are out against the Democrats who are in. The real danger is that foreigners will congregate in some States of the Union in such numbers, preserving the language, manners, and traditions of the Old World, as to root out the native population speaking the English tongue, and that we may come to be a confederacy of States as foreign in origin, in language, customs, institutions, and religion as are the several nations combined by force under the sway of the Emperor of Austria or the Czar of Russia. Nothing can tend to accomplish this more speedily than proscription. If the foreigner finds himself one of a degraded caste while living among the native population, he will naturally seek those regions in which his own countrymen are numerous, and a little more concentration of the foreign population in some of the Northwestern States will give them an absolute numerical majority and insure the control there. In such an event they would, of course, retaliate the proscription under which they had suffered; they would, perhaps, become even as intolerant as the Know Nothings, and permit no native-born citizen, nor the son of a native, to vote or hold office; they would send naturalized foreigners to represent them here in both Houses, as they would have the constitutional right to do; they would have their relative weight in presidential elections, and the "foreign vote" would then be something distinct and palpable for politicians to intrigue after. No state of things could be more deplorable than the war of races, of which this order is the beginning, and, if it be not crushed at once by the honesty and common sense of the people, it may give to our history a chapter as dark and bloody as that of the English revolutions or of the religious wars of the Huguenots and Catholics in France. You know, sir, that this is the evil to be dreaded in the future, compared to which all German anti-Sabbath societies, Irish riots, illegal voting, and foreign military companies sink into utter insignificance, and before which, as remedies, the extension of the term of naturalization to twenty-one years and the Know Nothing remedy of exclusion from office are but as bands of tow to devouring flames. Neither of these would diminish perceptibly the number of immigrants; and, while the annual supply continues or increases, any law which tends to perpetuate the distinction of races will only make the ultimate danger more formidable.

The duty of excluding paupers, vagrants, convicts, and felons is imperative; and, if the evil be as great as is charged, the only surprise is that we have allowed a public mischief of such gravity to exist so long. Laws, rigorous and effective, should be enacted if such are not now on the statute book; and every citizen who regards the public weal should unite heartily in their enforcement.

The third remedy proposed is the repeal of the naturalization laws. But even this would not protect us from the influx of foreigners, nor from the ill effects of their voting, in case any of the States see fit to bestow that right upon them; and, if the naturalization laws should be repealed, or the term extended to twenty-one years, under the influence of a temporary excitement, the natural reaction of popular feeling would demand a restoration of the old law; or the right of voting and other privileges of citizenship would be conferred by the States upon their alien inhabitants. The power of each State, then, is ample over its own ballot-box, and it can be approached only by those on whom she confers the right. There is not a voter of the Union who derives his power from the Federal Government; he may be naturalized under a law of Congress, and possess all that such laws can bestow, yet never be permitted to cast a vote or hold a State office in the Union. This is fortunate, as the necessities of States are different. The evil is local, so should the remedy be.

I do not deny—on the contrary, I affirm—the right of a nation to impose such terms on the influx of foreigners as a due regard to her own interest and safety requires. She is the sole judge of the evil and the remedy. If there were just reason to apprehend such an immigration from Europe or Asia as would unduly crowd our people, impoverish our labor, or exhaust our soil, I should advocate a policy more prompt and adapted to the emergency than the ritual of the Know Nothings, or their clumsy imitation of the secrecy and persecution of the Jesuits. We have the right, and I should favor its exercise in that extremity, to deny all foreigners admission, and I would, in that case, have our coast present an iron front to the tide of immigration as it does to the waves of the ocean, so long as the danger existed. But I would appeal to the manly common sense of the people, and have our action, if any were taken, wear all the dignity of national justice and self-defence, and not the sinister aspect of a revengeful intrigue and midnight cabal. I do not believe the time for such action has come; and, if it were now thick upon us, the remedies of Know Nothingism are poor, flimsy—wholly inadequate.

It cannot be denied that the policy of our Government has been to encourage immigration. The vast amount of fertile unoccupied territory, the number of canals to be dug, of railroads to be built, and all the variety of labor required in a new country induced our ancestors to solicit foreign aid. The surplus labor and capital of Europe found employment here. Most of the immigrants settled in the Northern and Northwestern States, and it is owing to this addition to their native population that their numbers have increased faster than the Southern States. These foreigners not only brought their strength to increase our productive industry, but the aggregate of money they have introduced into the country has been very large; many of them, being inferior in education and social advantages to our native population, turned to those occupations which are almost solely physical, requiring vigor of muscle and strength of constitution, leaving to the native population almost a monopoly of the more scientific and remunerative branches of industry. This population has furnished to the North a large increase of capital. It has supplied capital with a cheaper labor by increasing the amount of it. It has given greater activity to manufacturers by adding several millions to the number of consumers. It has strengthened the shipping interest by an amount of passage money equal, it is said, to the whole export freights of the country. The North could not have completed one-tenth of her improvements and kept up her other interests to their present extent without this foreign labor. Most of these improvements at the South have been made by the native labor and without materially diminishing the annual supply of the staple productions of the country. As a section, the North has reaped the benefits of this immigration, and it will have to meet the consequences which flow from it. The question of the organization of labor, its rights and duties, is perhaps the most vexed one of all that disturb the body politic. By immigration we are perhaps fifty years in advance of what we should have been had increase in numbers been natural only. The difficulties that attend our condition are not mainly attributable to the foreign origin of a part of the population, but to the number of the population. If every foreigner were this day removed from the country, and natives in equal numbers substituted, the difficulties which exist now would be as great then and substantially the same. It matters not where the population is born, if there is not work for them to do and they have no accumulations in store, there will be want, misery, and destitution. It results from the density of population and not from its nativity. If the population of New York City were to-day wholly native, would the cessation of business, the partial suspension of manufactures, trade, and commerce, afflict them less sorely than it does the present mixed population? But yesterday and there was labor for all, and, with labor, food and contentment; to-day there is a deficient supply, and at the same time a greater scarcity and dearness of the necessaries of life. If there be any way to prevent these fluctuations in business, and the suffering consequent upon them, it has never yet been made known.

The last purpose to be achieved by the Know Nothings is the exclusion of all Catholics from office. It is not to be denied that there is diversity of opinion among the brethren of different sections. The order seems already to have fallen into the most corrupt practice attributed to the old parties and to the most corrupt class of the old politicians, that of varying its creed with every change of latitude. In the infancy of its existence it is already mature in its vices, and, with a most surprising harmony between the end and the means, it aims at political and religious intolerance by seizing on every prejudice and adopting every creed. The foreign Protestant is told that the order strikes only at Catholicism, and the native Catholic is assured that it interferes with no man's religion, but attempts to limit the influence of foreigners.

In Louisiana Catholics are allowed to join the order, we are told—and why? Because that denomination is too numerous there to be assailed openly.

It is something that will, I dare say, excite surprise through the civilized world, when it becomes known, that the people of this country, who have been first to practice, in its fullest extent, the great Christian doctrine of toleration, are engaged in discussing whether or not the Government is safe while it continues. With what show of justice or consistency can we plead to the Catholic sovereigns of Europe for the toleration of Protestantism in their dominions while we disfranchise our fellow citizens of the Catholic faith? How can we ask them to go forward in relaxing the fetters of opinion while we are going backward? How dare we talk of freedom of conscience when more than a million of our citizens are to be excluded from office for conscience sake?

Yesterday to have argued in favor of religious toleration in this country would have been absurd, for none could have been found to deny or question it. But to-day there is a sect boasting that it can control the country, avowing the old papist and monarchical doctrine of political exclusion for religious opinions' sake. The arguments by which they sustain themselves are those by which the Inquisition justified their probing the consciences, and burning the bodies, of men five hundred years ago, and against which Protestantism has struggled since the days of Luther. You, sir, and I, and all of us owe our own right to worship God according to our consciences to that very doctrine which this new order abjures; and, if the right of the Catholic is first assailed and destroyed, you, sir, or another member who believes according to a different Protestant creed, may be excluded from this House and from other preferment because of your religious faith. The security of all citizens rests upon the same broad basis of universal right. Confederates who disfranchise one class of citizens soon turn upon each other; the strong argument of general right is destroyed by their united action, and the proscriptionist of yesterday is the proscribed of to-morrow. Human judgment has recognized the inexorable justice of the sentence which consigned Robespierre and his accomplices to the same guillotine to which they had condemned so many thousand better men.

If the Catholic be untrustworthy as a citizen and the public liberty is unsafe in his keeping, it is but a natural, logical consequence that he shall not be permitted to disseminate a faith which is adjudged hostile to national independence; that he shall not be allowed to set the evil example of the practice of his religion before the public, that it shall not be preached from the pulpit, that it shall not be taught in the schools, and that, by all the energy of the law, it shall be utterly exterminated.

This was the course which England pursued when she entertained the same fears of the Catholics three hundred years ago, and which she has lived to see the absurdity of, and has removed almost, if not quite, every disability imposed. Perhaps, however, this new sect will not startle the public mind by proposing too much at once, and holds that it will be time enough to propose further and more minute persecution when the national sentiment is debauched enough to entertain favorably this first great departure from the unbounded toleration of our fathers.

It is the experience of this country that persecution strengthens a new creed. The manhood of our nature, of all true, genuine men, clings more ardently to a faith which brings peril to the believer. With the history of Protestantism in our minds, and remembering how every effort to destroy it only planted it deeper in the hearts of the faithful, it is natural to believe that persecution will invigorate other creeds and sects. In my judgment, this attempt at proscription will do more to spread Catholicism here than all the treasures of Rome or all the Jesuitism of the cardinals.

Now, sir, what is this movement at the North, and who are engaged in it? It is a combination of all the "isms" of that section. Abolitionism, Free Soilism, Whigism, Woman Rightism, Socialism, Anti-Rentism, gathered together from a thousand fretful rills and mingling their currents in one common channel. Abolitionism and Know Nothingism are akin; the first is a denial of the rights of a section of the Union and an attempt to destroy them because, in its wisdom, it has determined that those rights have not the proper moral sanction; the other is a denial of the rights of a class of citizens, regardless of section. One is a crusade against the rights of States; the other against the rights of individuals. The one openly spurns the Constitution; the other attempts a flimsy evasion of it. This daringly attempts a breach and an assault; that more cunningly adopts and prepares a surprise. The one almost commands respect for nefarious schemes by boldness and courage; the other would bring discredit on the best of causes by evasion, circuity, and irresponsible assaults. In Massachusetts, where the sect made their own nominations, so far as I can learn the politics of those elected to Congress, all are ultra anti-slavery men.[1]

Those whom the order voted for elsewhere in the North are of the ultra stamp almost without exception. To secure the vote of the Free Soilers and Abolitionists of both the old parties it was indispensable to have a candidate tinctured strongly with those heresies, and a flavor of Know Nothingism was added to secure the coöperation of certain Democrats whom unadulterated Whiggery and Abolitionism might have disgusted. It was a combination and a triumph of all that was ultra, and factious, and discontented, over all that was moderate, and judicious, and studious of the public peace.

Now that most of the elections at the North are over, a laborious attempt is made to persuade the South that the order is free of those Abolition tendencies which secured its triumph.

[1] "Know-Nothings" from this State, such as Nathaniel P. Banks, shortly became radical Republicans.

The one great fact relied on is that the order in New York is opposed to Seward.

Mr. Seward's reason for refusing to join the order, I doubt not, was that, with his sagacity, looking to ultimate success, he could not fail to see that the whole movement would be short-lived, and that, when it ended, no political act, not even membership of the Hartford convention, with its secret proceedings, could be more destructive to the prospects of a public man than to have avowed the principles of the order. You, sir, and I, we all know that it is the almost universal opinion in political circles here that this thing will have a brief day. The most anxious wet-nurses of the bantling hardly expect it to live through the presidential canvass of 1856. There is everywhere the most feverish anxiety among the faithful to secure some little official crumb of comfort before it is forever too late. Each longs to be carried into the pool while the waters are troubled, for the time of the troubling, they know full well, will soon be past, and then where shall they be healed? Evidences of premature decay are already visible. The party will vanish as suddenly as it arose and leave scarcely a wreck behind. Its members feel the sandy foundation slipping from beneath their feet. They feel their sentence is pronounced each time they hear repeated the wise and tolerant doctrines of our political religion, which are grafted upon our Constitution. Blank annihilation stares them in the face. They see indignation and distrust without, discord and rebellion within. Their secrecy is betrayed and mocked, their intolerance is despised, and their prestige is broken.

Were there no cause for the dissolution of the order in its principles, the discordant materials which compose it would soon precipitate its destruction. The ultra men already elected, agreeing in nothing but hostility to the South, to aliens, and to Catholics, can harmonize in no course of action, foreign or domestic, unless, by the happening of a Whig majority in Congress, the tariff should be altered to suit the protectionist theory, or some other doctrine of that party be embodied in a law. If this order takes hold in the South, it will surprise both friends and opponents. It will be a matter of wonder why that section, suffering none of the hardships which are pleaded as an excuse for the order in the North, and from her institutions peculiarly averse to secret and irresponsible associations, should discard a long history of generous toleration to adopt the creed of proscription, and wear the name of an order which, in the Northern States, has beaten down the defenders of the Constitution and

State rights, and inaugurated more fully than ever before the era of consolidation and fanaticism.

In a crisis like the present it becomes the Democratic party to remain steadfast to its old principles. In the "act for establishing religious freedom," adopted in Virginia in 1786 and originating in the benevolent mind of Mr. Jefferson, it was enacted that,

> "No man shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burdened in his body or goods, nor shall he otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief, but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument, to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same SHALL IN NOWISE DIMINISH, ENLARGE, OR AFFECT THEIR CIVIL CAPACITIES."

On this tolerant principle the Democratic party, through all the variety of disaster and success, has stood from that day to this. It has been the guardian of every civil and political right, of every individual, and of every section. No error has been too gigantic for its assault, no right too insignificant for its protection. When the rights of the States were in peril during the Federal Administration of the elder Adams, it was the champion of our faith, Mr. Jefferson, who was foremost in their defence, resting their security upon principles as wise and venerable as the Constitution itself, and triumphantly sustained by the Democratic party. It was during his Administration that the "Alien and Sedition Laws," so violative of personal right, were effaced from the statute book by the votes of the same Democratic party which it is now attempted to seduce into heresies more abominable than those which it then abolished. This new ism is the old "alien law," under a thin disguise; and these two, with "Native Americanism," are bodies into which the old unlaid spirit of Federalism has insinuated itself, hoping, under these forms, to obtain a favor which was always denied it when recognized. It is like Petruchio's nether wedding garment, "a thrice-turned pair of old breeches," betraying the nakedness it was intended to conceal.

MR. BANKS.—It is but a few years since we asked for a secret or independent ballot, in virtue of the right of every man to give a vote, not only uncontrolled by, but unknown to, other men. It only perfected the right of citizens to vote by ballot, for the ballot itself is a secret institution; but no proposition could have excited greater commotion than this.

Other difficulties were not of rare occurrence; that element of power which is now exciting such attention throughout the country, which seems to have hitherto held a balance of power in nearly all communities, and to have decided nearly every contested election, upon a policy dictated by its leaders, was not without its power among us; and a recent and most important contest, so decided, has impressed a seated grief upon many thousand hearts. I mean the influence of foreign votes.

All these causes, some operating on one mind and some upon another, have produced discontent among men of all parties. It was not to be expected that ordinary men could rise superior or be wholly indifferent to them. Nor is it a recent nor sudden ebullition of feeling. For many years indications of revolt have been noted. New combinations have appeared and disappeared. One by one, men have abandoned their former organizations, with more or less success, but not in such strength as to give courage to the timid or security to the weak; and the masses of men remained in camp, waiting only a fitting opportunity to escape party drill. At length it came. In that mysterious manner so aptly described by the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi, somebody constructed a sort of subterranean passage by which men could pass from one camp to another, seeing nobody, knowing nobody, and saying nothing to anybody. Sir, you should have seen them go. Eighty thousand men, of every pursuit and opinion, in the brief space of three months, attested their belief in its efficiency and necessity. And was it not their right? Who will say that the people—the sole depositories of political power—discontented with existing parties, may not, even in this mysterious manner, make new combinations for the transaction of their own affairs, and erect new standards of policy for themselves? Is it not their right? Who says no? Their justification stands not so much upon their necessities as their convenience; and who can point out a more effectual or natural method of doing what they have done—the transposition of the rank and file of all parties into a new organization, excluding nobody but the leaders, taking everybody inside that desires to come, and leaving nobody outside but the driver? Who will say it is not the right of the people? Does the gentleman from Mississippi complain of their secrecy? Is it secrecy that makes the wrong? Sir, secrecy is their right. It belongs to them. No man and no power can justly take it from them. What have they done? As yet they have done nothing. You cannot punish men for that. Well, sir, these men have done nothing yet, except to carry an election here and there, and that is not treason, even though a Pennsylvania judge did charge a jury that certain things could not be done, or ought not to be done, or were criminal in point of law. Sir, it is the people who are passing through these avenues, those who make judges and district attorneys, and they will take care of them all. They will take care of the juries and sheriffs as well as judges.

MICHAEL WALSH [N. Y.].—Has this avenue you have been speaking of any connection with the "underground railroad"?[1] [Laughter.]

MR. BANKS.—It has not. It is altogether another line of business. I own no stock in that corporation. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, a word upon secrecy in politics! Who made the President of the United States? The people, you will say, have elected him to the office. But who laid the train to which the people set fire? Sir, there never has been a presidential election in this country which has not been controlled by secret associations and combinations; and, let me say, too, by a combination which has no popular elements; which has no popularity in its constitution; which operates through a few privileged members; and it is, in fact, such combinations that control the government of the country. Who can undertake to say that the next presidential conventions will not be controlled by coteries of men whose only power is the secrecy with which their plans and purposes are held? Who will deny that it has been ever thus, or that it will be ever thus? Why is that criminal in the people which has been the constant practice of politicians?

But I am for publicity as well as secrecy. I go beyond the gentleman from Mississippi in that respect. I am for publicity when a man assumes to act for other men; but when he acts for himself I say that no man has a right to require him to divulge his purposes or views. If he choose to wear them on his sleeve, it is his right to do so; and, if he choose to keep them in his own breast, and to say nothing, and to know nothing [laughter], it is equally his right. But when a man assumes to act for others, then, sir, he has not the right, as a representative party, to secrecy; and, if the original power call upon him for a development of his policy, he cannot withhold it.

I may say here, in passing, that the secrecy which this country has, in some degree, contributed to fasten on the diplomacy of the world is an element of power which is doing more to crush the nations of the earth than any other element of oppression. The five millions of men who are this hour in arms, under whose heavy tread the earth shakes, are not doing one-tenth part of the wrong to the generations now existing and yet unborn which the secret and false diplomacy of the world is producing in its effects upon them; and, so far as this country contributes, in any degree, to sustain the secrecy of diplomacy, so far, I say, its policy should be changed; and therefore I voted —as I think my friend from Mississippi did not vote—for an exposition of what our friends and diplomatic agents were doing in the congress of Ostend.

Mr. Bayly, of Virginia.—Oh, let that alone.

Mr. Banks.—Yes, if the committee will report soon. [Laughter.]

Then I ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the program which the gentleman from Mississippi exhibited as the proposed operations of what he calls the Know Nothings. I do not know whether he is right or wrong; but in a paper published in Pennsylvania I read some months since an exposé of what the purposes of that organization are, and of the means through which they intend to operate. In the first place, I did not see anything there about the naturalization laws; nothing of their repeal nor the limitation of the term; nor any other matter or topic referring to that subject. The Pennsylvanian published the document, and it was copied in our section of the country as a full, entire, and perfect exposé of the purposes of the secret association existing in Pennsylvania and having its ramifications throughout the country. Therefore, it does not appear that interference with the naturalization laws is one of these purposes. I looked carefully to that point, but I saw nothing referring to that, nor to the Catholic Church or Catholic religion.

Mr. Barry.—Will the gentleman allow me to correct him. I read here from the same paper, The Pennsylvanian, and if the gentleman admits this to be an authentic copy of the rules of the body——

Mr. Banks.—Sir, I admit nothing. I know nothing. [Laughter.]

Mr. Barry.—I hold in my hand the paper to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers—The Pennsylvanian—and I find in the oath which the member is required to take the following sentence:

"That you will support, in all political matters, for all political offices, second degree members of this order, providing it be necessary for the American interest; that, if it may be done legally, you will, when elected to any office, remove all foreigners, aliens, or Roman Catholics from office, and that you will, in no case, appoint such to office."

Mr. Banks.—I call the attention of my friend to the fact that in his speech he used the term "Catholics"; he now reads it "Roman Catholics."

Mr. Barry.—Well, in our section of the country Catholics are understood as Roman Catholics.

Mr. Banks.—I beg the gentleman's pardon if I say that there may be a distinction in the terms.

Mr. Barry.—I venture to say that no other gentleman in the House misunderstood me, in speaking of Catholics, except the gentleman from Massachusetts, who might do so on Know Nothing principles. [Laughter.]

Mr. Banks.—I noticed the distinction, and I purpose to speak of it. I have no objection to any man of the Catholic Church or faith. Here is our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Chandler], an amiable, learned, and eloquent man; I might be willing to vote for him, Catholic as he is, in preference, perhaps, to others nearer my political faith than he is. It cannot concern me, and it can concern no man, that, as a matter of faith, any person cherishes the doctrine of transubstantiation, accords the full measure of Catholic veneration to sacred relics or images, and accepts every article of the Nicene creed. Each man is accountable for his own faith, as I for mine. And, even though my name were appended to the declaration read to us by the gentleman from Mississippi from The Pennsylvanian, I might still vote for such a man if otherwise it lay in my way to do so.

But there is another branch of this subject. It is a current belief that the Pope, the head of the Roman Church, who stands as the Vicar of God, and is invested with his attributes of infallibility, is not only supreme in matters of faith, but has also a temporal power that can not only control governments, but, in fitting exigencies, may absolve his disciples from their allegiance. The power was asserted in England under Henry VIII and Elizabeth, and it has never been disavowed there, nor in Spain, nor in any other land, Catholic or Protestant, by the authority of the Roman Church. My name is not appended to the exposé read to us here, nor do I know much about it; but I will say that, if it be true that the Pope is held to be supreme in secular as in sacred affairs, that he can absolve men from their relations with others not of the true faith, it is not strange that men should hesitate in support of his followers. I would not vote for any man holding to that doctrine, and, I doubt not, other gentlemen here would concur with me in that feeling.

And then, again, as to our foreign population. I bear no enmity toward foreigners. I have stood by the adopted citizens of my own State, without any distinction of person whatever, whether they were high or low, rich or poor. But if

THE UNSEEN SIGNAL OF THE JESUITS

From the collection of the New York Public Library

they hold as the supreme head of secular power the Pontiff of Rome, and consider that he can in any case absolve them from their allegiance to the commonwealth of Massachusetts or to the United States, why they have no claim whatever upon any man for support. If they understand that their interests are separate from those of American citizens, if they take direction from their spiritual guides in political matters, and, by preconcerted and private arrangements, form associations and make parties of their own, seeking to obtain and hold the balance of power, throwing their weight first into one scale and then into the other, as they may understand their own interest to dictate, they will force upon American citizens the alternative either to make similar combinations against them, by refusing to divide upon the ordinary maxims of party policy, or to abdicate the seats of political power. A balance of power, under such circumstances, is absolute power, and the direction of public affairs is in the hands of those who wield it.

Now, I understand the breaking up of preëxisting organizations that were based upon the minute differences of opinion upon past questions, thus throwing an unfailing balance of power into the hands of a small minority of citizens, not of national origin, and possibly of only quasi-national interests, to be the purpose and object of the American organizations that have been so vigorously denounced. Of course I must admit that the necessity of such combinations to guard against the public dangers arising from causes I have stated—obedience to ecclesiastical direction in political affairs and the silent assumption of that position which gives to a small number of men a despotic balance of power—is denied. But I hesitate not to say that, in my own State, many thousand people entertain the belief that there is cause of fear, and my experience in its recent political history forces upon me a participation in that conviction.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the present condition of the country as it regards emigration, and to contrast its results with that period when the Constitution and the early statutes of naturalization were adopted. Then the emigration from abroad, according to the estimate of Professor Tucker, was at the rate of five thousand per annum.

Look, now, at the returns made to us of European emigration. Within the present year, the last quarter of which has not yet expired, the foreign emigration will amount to very nearly four hundred thousand persons. And has this emigration reached its head? Who can say that? Look at the condition of Eastern and Western Europe, of Asia, of China? The earth shakes under the heavy tread of more than five million armed men, and every state is subjected to the general scourge of actual or impending war.

But emigration presents an avenue of escape from the evils of actual or impending war. Where shall they go? To Canada? To unstable Mexico? To South America? They will come to the United States. The three and a quarter millions of foreign-born people, and their descendants here, have so many heart strings out to draw their kith and kin to the New World. Our country begins to be known abroad. The most favorable account of this country, lately published, was written by a gentleman[1] who ten years since asked an American how it was possible he, who had seen Europe, could live in America? They begin to feel that America is the only land where men can reach their true standard of greatness. Our institutions are debated by the light of every camp-fire and hearthstone on the face of the earth. The excited imaginations of distressed and heartbroken men invest that liberty we actually enjoy with the attributes of an almost fabulous and impossible prosperity and freedom. When one State is exhausted another is opened. How is it possible that emigration can have reached its head? Who can doubt its increase; or that it may, even in our time, be doubled?

Look to the East, to China, India, Japan, with their six hundred millions of people, often without employment or subsistence. They have already an idea of the institutions and capacity of the American continent. The Chinese, whose emigration has been limited to Japan, now seek the United States and the islands of our southern seas. They are already upon the Pacific Coast. Thirty or forty thousand are in California; and when we are, by steamships, within ten or twelve days' sail of their crowded empires, who can prophecy the extent of this new and unanticipated emigration? Who can check its encroachments? Not the State; that has been decided by the supreme judicial tribunal. What power is equal to that duty?

Shall we fend off with the bayonet? No, sir, if they come we shall admit them. There may be legitimate uses for them in the economy of God's providence. But have they a Christian character adapted to the institutions of this country? I ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether we shall give to them the rights of citizenship at the close of their first five years' residence? Or are we to have another extension of judicial decrees, another code of judicial fictions, that, in the absence of any legislation, shall determine what affinities of race, and color, and blood make it impossible for men ever to participate in the powers of government?

Did the framers of the Constitution declare that foreigners had a right to participate in the affairs of government? Not at all! They made the Constitution proscriptive. They declared by a unanimous vote of the convention that, after a brief period, no man but a native-born citizen should be eligible to the office of President. They declared that nine years' citizenship should be required to make a man eligible to the Senate, and seven years to the House of Representatives. They took from the States the power to confer citizenship which the States then exercised. There is nothing to show that they entertained the idea advanced here that foreigners had a right to participate in the highest prerogatives of government. It was made a question of expediency. It was a privilege conferred.

Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts—afterward Vice-President during the administration of Mr. Madison—said that he wished "in future eligibility might be confined to NATIVES. He was not singular," he said, "in his views. A great many of the most influential men in Massachusetts reasoned in like manner." Similar views were expressed by leading men of the Federal and Republican parties.

How is it with the foreign population of our day? The gentleman from Mississippi alluded to the flattery of foreign voters by General Scott in the campaign of 1852. But how was it with the Democratic party in that canvass? Where were the different parties of all the States? And how will it be with all the parties in the contest of 1856? May not they, too, go down on their knees to those who may hold the balance of power in that contest?

How is it that so many gentlemen of foreign birth hold diplomatic stations at foreign courts? Is it because General Pierce is President? Would not General Scott have pursued the same policy? May not the next man who occupies the presidential chair do the same thing? I do not censure one party and excuse another because the necessities of action are equally imperative on all.

There is no remedy for this state of affairs but that UNION which has been described to us, and that, I understand, to be a chief object of the party whose members are called Know Nothings. While it denies no rights to a minority, it demands the rights of a majority. While it denies to foreigners nothing that belongs to them, it claims and assumes the prerogative of government which is here the unquestioned right of Americans. Denying to no person the rights of conscience, or the freedom of religious opinion, it establishes and perpetuates both of these in placing the Government upon the basis which was contemplated by the Constitution and by the Fathers of this Republic.

In 1848 I supported the Democratic candidate for the presidency. I was intimate with one who likewise advocated the claims of General Cass, but who always said he would be defeated. It was a tight battle, as everyone knows; and none but very wise men knew its result until after the election. Some months after my friend mentioned to me his prediction. "How was it," said I, "that, while you labored for Cass, you were certain of his defeat?" Said he, "I am a Jesuit; and our instructions were to shout for Cass but to vote for Taylor."

Now, sir, I know that a change of the statutes of naturalization will not remedy any possible evil of this character. But the revision of these statutes may be pressed upon our attention by the increased number of convicts and paupers of other governments that are sent here; by the hitherto unanticipated emigration from the Chinese Empire; by what we know of the past and fear of the future. These things do not, in my judgment, demand a repeal of the statutes of naturalization, but they will justify an extension of the term of residence now required and a more stringent execution of the laws existing than has been usual hitherto.

The gentleman from Mississippi suggested that this was a land of toleration—of religious toleration. Sir, I go far beyond that. I do not agree merely to the toleration of Catholics or Protestants here. They have an absolute right. Every person is entitled to religious freedom. The Catholic and the Protestant have their right under our institutions. No one will be more reluctant than myself to disturb or curtail the right. I am for extending it to the professors of every faith in the largest possible degree. But the concessions of the Constitution and laws end there. In matters of politics we extend to citizens from other lands the right of participation, not the right of control. In establishing the charter of religious freedom we neither avoid the responsibilities nor abdicate the duties of government.

Eliot [Mass.] Introduces in the House Another Bill Framed to Avoid Constitutional Objections; It Is Passed by Congress; Vetoed by the President; Passed by Congress over the Veto.

IN the case of the negro the National Government permitted the exercise of civil duties before it conferred upon him civil rights. Thus from the beginning of the nation he was allowed to serve as a soldier [see Vol. VI, chapter IX.]

During the Civil War and for some time thereafter the negro was treated by the Government as a ward, somewhat in the manner in which it has always treated the Indian.

Before the end of 1864, says Alexander Johnston in his "American Political History," the advance of the Union armies had freed three million persons, of whom at least a million threw themselves helplessly upon the Federal Government for support. Attempts to employ some of them upon confiscated or abandoned plantations failed through the rapacity and inhumanity of the agents employed; and in 1863 great camps of freedmen were formed at different points, where the negroes were supplied with rations, compelled to work, and kept under some degree of oversight. The next year, 1864, this great responsibility was transferred from the War to the Treasury Department, but was still a mere incident of the military or war power of the President, as commander-in-chief, and was without any regulation of law.

A bill to establish a Bureau of Emancipation had been introduced in the House on January 12, 1863, but it failed to pass. Another bill passed the House on March 1, 1864, but failed in the Senate.

The Freedmen's Bureau

One of the last acts approved by President Lincoln (on March 3, 1865) established in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees.

By this act the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, was authorized to appoint a Commissioner of the Bureau and one assistant commissioner for each seceded State, or military officer detailed for the duty, the function of whom was to superintend the disposition of provisions, clothing, etc., issued by the War Department, to supply the immediate needs of the beneficiaries, and to set apart in seceded territory tracts of land which had been either abandoned by the former owners or confiscated or purchased by the Government, said tracts being divided into forty-acre lots for the freedmen, who were to hold them for three years at an annual rental of not more than 6 per cent. of the appraised value of such lots in 1860, and who, during this term or at its expiration, were to be allowed to purchase them at the said valuation.

In order to aid the freedmen to take advantage of this opportunity to purchase land a number of philanthropic citizens throughout the North, headed by Peter Cooper of New York City, organized a Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, which was incorporated by Act of Congress, approved on March 3.

On the same day the President approved an act of Congress removing all disqualification of color in carrying the mails.

Freedmen's Aid Bill

Congress, December 20, 1864–March 3, 1865

The House bill, postponed from the previous session, came before both Houses on December 20, 1864, and a joint conference committee was appointed, consisting of Senators Charles Sumner [Mass.], Jacob M. Howard [Mich.], and Charles R. Buckalew [Pa.], and Representatives Thomas D. Eliot [Mass.], William D. Kelley [Pa.], and Warren P. Noble [O.].

On February 2, 1865, Mr. Eliot reported to the House of Representatives the bill drafted by the majority of the committee, which was to create an independent bureau of the Government for the administration of the affairs of the freedmen, with powers substantially those which were afterward granted.

Francis Kernan [N. Y.] opposed the bill, chiefly because of the military character of the commissioners, who were to exercise authority in certain instances over white persons.

> Sir, I submit that the experience of the last few years must have made it apparent to every gentleman here that these military commissions are characterized by a want of certainty as to the conviction of the guilty and the certainty of frequently convicting the innocent.

On February 9 the President laid before the House a memorial which he had received from officers of the private freedmen's aid societies of the country, and which asked that the Government establish the proposed bureau.

The work was too great for private charity, said the petitioners, besides, it was the Government's duty to undertake it.

> It is the magnitude, not the nature, of the work that appalls us, and drives us to the Government for aid and support. We have found the freedman easy to manage beyond even our best hopes; willing and able to fight as a soldier; willing and able to work as a laborer; willing and able to learn as a pupil; docile, patient, affectionate, grateful, and although with a great tribal range of intellect from nearly infantile to nearly or quite the best white intelligence, yet with an average mental capacity above the ordinary estimates of it.
>
> We have no doubts of the aptitude of the slave for freedom under any fair circumstances. But we see that his circumstances must inevitably be unfair under the best arrangements the Government can make, and that, independently of a great paternal care on the part of the Government, they will be so bad as to wring cries of shame and indignation from the civilized world, dishearten the friends and advocates of emancipation at home, and give new vitality to the disloyal suggestions of the slaveholders' allies in the North and West.
>
> Has the Government any moral right to free the slave without seeing to it that, with every chain it breaks, the best within its power is done to keep the freedman from hankering after his master and his bondage, from feeling that his liberty is a burden, his life a curse, and his domestic affections even more fatal to his peace under our flag than beneath the plantation whip? Shall he hunger and thirst, shall he go naked and cold, shall he wander houseless and die unburied, shall his aged parents and young children be scattered where he cannot find them, and in unspeakable misery lay their bones together, too old and too young to contend with their fate upon the strange and distant soil to which fear and want have driven them? While anything remains undone within the power of the nation or the Government to do to alleviate or diminish this misery, the Christian principle and pity of our people will allow none who are responsible for it to rest in peace.
>
> Let not this anxiety for a bureau of emancipation, as an expression and organ of government solicitude and care, be confounded with a disposition to overdo the care of the freedmen; to come between them and the natural laws of political economy; to substitute supervision and direction for their own latent energies and self-helpfulness. The utmost extent to which the ordinary principles of free light and labor can be applied to the blacks should be insisted on; the least possible done for them, the most possible expected of them; as little difference made as can be between them and other laborers, their > treatment always leaning rather to too little than too much aid and direction.

Gen. Robert C. Schenck [O.] argued for placing the bureau under an existing department, preferably the War Department, since its activities, which he considered to be chiefly directed to the present relief of the freedmen, would end with the war. He wished to add to the bill the features of a bill already before the House (submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs), which provided for the relief of destitute whites in the South as well as blacks.

William D. Kelley replied to General Schenck:

> The view taken by the gentleman from Ohio is a very narrow one. It does not comprehend the scope of this bill or of the want for which it proposes to provide. He seems to desire to enlarge its purposes by embracing a class of people not contemplated by the bill, but proposes really to narrow them by reducing the functions simply to those of feeding exiled people or hungry refugees. The bill contemplates a temporary organization for systematizing the labor of the four million people who hold no other relation than life and nativity to our country or its institutions. They have no experience of life beyond the plantation, or, if they have, they have derived it as they have gone in gangs from one slave market to another, or from the market to the field of labor. They have not been permitted to know the cares and responsibilities of life.
>
> We provide by national law for the care of the newly arrived immigrants, and why? Because many of them come to us in ignorance, and most of them without knowledge of our country, its laws, its habits. We protect them against the vices of our own people. We induct them, as it were, into the great temple of American civilization.
>
> The system, or rather want of system, proposed by the gentleman from Ohio would, in my judgment, create and foster an immense body of paupers, while the aim of every provision in the bill of the committee of conference is to elevate into independent, self-sustaining, self-governing men and women the freedmen of the country. They hold no relation, I say, to our laws. They are not witnesses under the laws of the States in rebellion; they may not sue; they may be robbed of their earnings, and there is no court before which they can successfully present or press their claims. They are, thanks to the infernal system of laws under which they have been reared, unable to read or write.

This bill would throw around them for a brief time the care of the Government, and see that contracts are fairly made with them and fairly enforced. It involves no large amount of patronage. It involves no cost. It proposes to add immensely to the revenue of the country by making lands that otherwise would lie waste bloom and bear, and to quicken the industry by giving the stimulant of a just reward to those who, without such care, would wander in vagrancy and pauperism, under the general provisions of the bill which the gentleman from Ohio would substitute.

Mr. Speaker, it is not often given to a legislature to perform an act such as we are now to pass upon. We have four million people in poverty because our laws have denied them the right to acquire property; in ignorance because our laws have made it a felony to instruct them; without organized habits because war has broken the shackles which bound them, and has released them from the plantations which were destined to be their world.

We are to organize them into society; we are to guide them, as the guardian guides his ward, for a brief period, until they can acquire habits and become confident and capable of self-control; we are to watch over them, and, if we do, we have, from their conduct in the field and in the school, evidence that they will more than repay our labor. If we do not, we will doom them to vagrancy and pauperism, and throw upon another Congress, and perhaps upon another generation, the duty or the effort to reclaim those whose hopes we will have blasted, whose usefulness we will have destroyed.

Mr. Eliot asked General Schenck to support the bill now and later offer one for the aid of the destitute whites, which bill, he promised, he would heartily support. He objected to placing the Freedmen's Bureau under the War Department because of the conflict which would ensue with the Treasury Department, which had authority over the abandoned lands. This authority would shortly pass to the War Department, and then the Bureau could be put under the control of the Department. There was urgent need, he said, to pass the bill at once.

The House agreed to the report by 64 yeas to 62 nays.

On February 13 Senator Sumner reported the bill of the majority of the committee to the Senate.

Garrett Davis [Ky.] objected to the military character of the bill, on the ground already advanced by Representative Kernan.

On February 21 Thomas A. Hendricks [Ind.] argued that the Bureau should logically be under control of the Interior Department, which had similar charge of the lands and well-being of the Indians.

James W. Grimes [Ia.] objected to the bill because it applied only to the rebel States. The 12,000 colored refugees in the District of Columbia ought also to come under its provisions. Furthermore, the destitute white loyalists in the South ought to have equal treatment with the negroes. He also feared that the unlimited power given to the commissioners to hire out the freedmen might some time be abused. He therefore advocated the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, which contained none of these objectionable features.

Samuel C. Pomeroy [Kan.] feared that an independent bureau might become a permanency and that the freedmen would never be thrown on their own resources but always be sustained by the Government. Thousands of colored and white refugees had come into his State, and he had observed that the former were more self-reliant than the latter, having learned in the bitter school of slavery readily to adapt themselves to hard conditions.

I am looking for a speedy return of the colored population of this country to freedom and to taking care of themselves and adapting themselves to that condition; and all I think the exigencies of the case demand is some temporary expedient for a year or two.

William Sprague [R. I.] was opposed to the measure if the elective franchise could be granted to the negro.

When a man can vote he needs no special legislation in his behalf. The freedmen's department, as proposed by the bill under discussion, uncoupled with the rights and privileges of free men for the colored men, in my opinion, will illustrate history in the style that the Indian Bureau illustrates the beginning and end of the Indian. Sir, I am for perpetuating all races of men. I do not believe that it is necessary to secure the prosperity of one race that another should be destroyed. I fear that the bill under discussion will destroy the negro race in this country. I desire that those who advocate this bill will stop here and spend their time and talent in demanding for the negro race all the rights and privileges of freedom. Do this, and no freedmen's bureau is at all necessary.

Senator Sumner resisted postponement, as he feared that this meant killing the bill.

I am pained by this opposition. It is out of season. Sir, I am in earnest. Seriously, religiously, I accept emancipation as proclaimed by the President, and now, by the votes of both Houses of Congress, placed under the sanctions of constitutional law. But even emancipation is not enough. You must see to it that it is not evaded or nullified, and you must see to it especially that the new-made freedmen are protected in those rights which are now assured to them, and that they are saved from the prevailing caste which menaces slavery under some new alias; and this is the object of the present measure.

The Senator from Iowa renews now the objections which he made at an earlier stage of this legislation. So far as I understand his objection then and now, it is twofold: first, that the freedman is placed under constraint, and that he is not a freeman; and, secondly, that he is treated too much as an infant or a pupil. Now, I undertake to say that the objection in both these forms is absolutely inapplicable.

The freedman is treated in every respect as a freeman. Again and again in the bill his rights are secured to him. Thus, for instance, in the fourth section it is expressly provided that "every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law." In face of these positive words, so completely in harmony with the whole bill, it is vain to say that the freedman is not a freeman. Sir, he is a freeman just as much as the Senator himself, with a title derived from the Almighty which no person can assail. When the Senator finds danger to the freedmen in this measure he consults his imagination, inflamed by these hostile sentiments which he has allowed himself to nurse.

But the Senator complains that the freedman is treated too much as an infant or a pupil. Let him point out the objectionable words. The freedmen, it is admitted, are under the general superintendence of the commissioner. But are we not all under the general superintendence of the police, to which we may appeal for protection in case of need? And just such protection the freedmen may expect from the commissioner, according to his power. The Senator himself is under the superintendence of the presiding officer of the Senate, whose duty it is to see that he is protected in his rights on this floor. But the presiding officer can do nothing except according to law, and the commissioner is bound by the same inevitable limitations.

But there are regulations applicable to the contracts of the freedman. Very well. Why not? To protect him from the imposition and tyranny of the dominant race it is provided that "no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract, reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent." Mark the language, "voluntary contract." What more can be desired? But this is to be reduced to writing. Certainly, as a safeguard to the freedman and for his benefit. Then, again, the commissioners are to act as "advising guardians," in which capacity they are to "aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages." But do not forget that the freedman is a freeman, and if he does not need such aid or advice he may reject it—just as much as the Senator himself. Look at other clauses, and they will all be found equally innocent.

But there is the section originally introduced on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Waitman T. Willey], providing that "whenever the commissioner cannot otherwise employ any freedmen who may come under his care he shall, so far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons at a just compensation for their service." Here again are tyranny and outrage carried to the highest point. But how? The commissioner is to act as an intelligence office. That is all; and everything that he does is to be "in conformity with law." This clause, even if it were in any respect ambiguous, must be ruled by those earlier words which declare that "every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman."

What more can be desired? With this rule as a touchstone, no freedman can suffer in his rights.

But the strange complaint is made that this measure is too favorable to the freedman, and, indeed, we have been told that something is needed for the whites. Very well; let it be done. I trust that an enlightened government will not fail to recognize its duties to all alike. Meanwhile, it is proposed that abandoned lands shall be leased to freedmen, and, if they are not able and disposed to take the lands for a twelvemonth, then they are to be leased to other persons. And why not? The freedmen for weary generations have fertilized these lands with their sweat. The time has come when they should enjoy the results of their labor at least for a few months. This war has grown out of injustice to them. Plainly to them we owe the first fruits of justice. Besides, this provision is essential as a safeguard against white speculators from a distance who will seek to monopolize these lands, with little or no regard to the freedmen. Ay, sir, it is too evident that it is essential as a safeguard against grasping neighbors who still pant and throb with all the bad passions of slavery.

Mr. President, the objections to the measure are vain. It is not hurtful to the freedman. It is not hostile to liberty. Its declared object is the good of the freedman. Its inspiration is liberty. Look at it as a whole or in detail and you will find the same object and the same inspiration. It only remains that the Senate should adopt it, and give a new assurance of justice to an oppressed race. In the name of justice, I ask your votes.

The Senate refused to postpone the bill by a vote of 13 yeas to 16 nays.

John B. Henderson [Mo.] opposed the bill.

It will, if adopted, instead of benefiting the freedmen of the South, be attended with consequences sufficient in time to reënslave them. Does the Senator from Massachusetts take into consideration the vast number of freedmen to be found in the Southern States—from three to three and a half millions? It is intended that the eighty-eight superintendents who are provided for in the bill shall go on to look into the condition of these negroes, and wherever they cannot make otherwise suitable provisions on the lands they may seize upon in the Southern States it will be their duty to look out homes for them, and put them with those parties that they see fit to place them under, for such compensation and for such a time as they may desire. What will be the result of this? Will there be enough abandoned lands in the Southern States upon which to place the negroes?

Again, these commissioners and superintendents are to act as guardians, and they are to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages and in the application of their labor. I do not profess to have been an anti-slavery man a great while, but the Senator from Massachusetts is certainly too old an anti-slavery man to have been the author of a proposition of this character. What was the old argument in favor of the institution of slavery? It was that the African race is not competent to self-government, that the negro is not able to take care of himself, that he needs a guardian. Though I am not a very old anti-slavery man, I can say to Senators here that I never believed a word of that argument. I believe to-day that if you turn loose the negroes of the Southern States and tell them to take care of themselves they will do it. There is no doubt about it. They will make a better contract for themselves than any white man who is their next friend will make for them. They are intelligent enough to do it; and, Mr. President, I tell you that, so far as my experience goes, they are as industrious as the white man. They take care of their wages as well as the white man does, and they are just as capable of making contracts.

Senator Sumner.—Allow me to say to the Senator, then, that this bill will have no application to such persons. No person need be aided in making a contract unless he stands in need of it. Every person under the bill will be as free as the Senator himself, just as free to make a contract to the right or the left as the Senator from Missouri. It is only if he stands in need of it that he may claim that aid.

Senator Henderson.—Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is made a duty. If my proposition be true that these negroes can take care of themselves, why the necessity of this aid? Turn loose the negroes in this country and let them take care of themselves. Take the letter "d" out of that word "freedmen," leave them to be "freemen" and not "freedmen." I am opposed to keeping up the idea that these negroes when they have been turned free are to have guardians, supervisors, superintendents, and commissioners to take charge of them.

Henry S. Lane, of Indiana.—Overseers.

Senator Henderson.—Yes, "overseers," for they are nothing else.

Now, let us look at another provision of this bill. It is not made the duty of the negroes to take charge of the abandoned farms in the South. The Senator says that if these negroes can take care of themselves they will be just as free as I am. The Senator is mistaken. Why does he make it the duty of these officers to take charge of all the lands in the Southern States? Why not let the negroes go and take charge of them themselves? I ask the Senator now, and I ask for an answer, is it possible for a single negro to get possession of a home after the appointment of these superintendents unless it be their free will to put him upon the land?

I venture to predict that, after the machinery of this department is put into full operation in the Southern States, and this vast number of clerks and superintendents shall have been appointed, there will be a system of fraud and swindling that will astound the Senator from Massachusetts. Let me tell the Senator that the negro would be much better off without these superintendents. The negro knows how to cultivate the cotton lands of the South much better than the gentlemen who will be sent down there as superintendents, and who never saw a cotton plant in their lives.

But what else is there? If the lands and other property shall not be required for the freedmen, the officers may rent or lease them to other persons. It is also provided that all contracts of the freedmen are to be in writing. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that when a contract is once reduced to writing the writing itself is the evidence of the contract and no oral testimony can be taken against it. Does he not know that nine-tenths of the negroes of the Southern States cannot read and write? And if these superintendents are permitted to superintend every contract and to make contracts for the negro, as they will do, does he not know that it will be utterly impossible for the negro in any court of justice anywhere to introduce testimony outside of the contract? These contracts will be made by dishonest superintendents again and again in order to benefit themselves and to rob the negro of the earnings of his labor. Such will be the fact; and the Senator from Massachusetts in less than two years from to-day will discover that what I say is true.

On February 22 John P. Hale [N. H.] spoke. He objected to letting the negroes have the first choice of the abandoned lands, thus leaving the destitute white men without relief at a time when they most needed it.

If at any time one of your officers under this bill may feel inclined to make some provision for some loyal, suffering white person, though he may have got the contract nearly consummated by which the outcast and the refugee is to obtain a place of shelter for himself, his wife, and his little ones, if a colored man comes up and says he wants it, your officer's hands are tied and he cannot move for the benefit of the white refugee.

I confess that I do not hold to that sort of philanthropy. I think I go as far as Christianity and humanity require me to go when, in cases of this kind, I let the white and the black stand together; but I am unwilling to have placed by my vote upon the statutes of this country a provision which would actually forbid our officers from extending any relief, even the slightest, to a white refugee, provided there was a colored person who wanted it.

Henry S. Lane [Ind.] opposed the bill, reiterating the arguments that had been presented by former opponents of the measure.

I am in favor of temporary relief and temporary support to poor colored persons and equally to the white refugees. But I have an old-fashioned way of thinking which induces me to believe that a white man is as good as a negro if he behaves himself. [Laughter.] Now, sir, the report of this committee of conference goes upon the supposition that the negro is wholly incompetent to take care of himself. The reason assigned for slavery by slave masters for the last fifty years has been that these people are helpless, utterly unable to take care of themselves; that they have been under the guardianship of their masters so long that you cannot trust them with their own interests. As long as you keep them under the guardianship either of their masters or of overseers to be appointed under this bill, so long will they be helpless and unable to take care of themselves. As long as you hold them up they will never stand alone; but the very moment you make them freemen and secure their rights in the courts of justice, I believe they will be fully competent to take care of themselves. This proposition of the committee of conference only proposes a change of masters, under the provisions of the ninth section. You appoint commissioners who have a right to take possession of the farms, lease them to whomsoever they please, and then they may hire out these negroes at any price they shall agree upon between themselves and the lessees of the lands. That is what I understand to be the provisions of the bill, and, under such provisions, it would introduce, in my opinion, a system of fraud and swindling unheard of in the history of the world. You give these poor creatures to the kind protection of broken-down politicians and adventurers, and decayed ministers of the gospel, and make them overseers to make fortunes out of these poor creatures, and they will treat the negroes, in my opinion, under this bill, far more cruelly than their masters under the old slave system did.

I am opposed to the whole theory of a freedman's bureau. I would make them free under the law; I would protect them in the courts of justice; if necessary, I would give them the right of suffrage, and let loyal slaves vote their rebel masters down and reconstruct the seceded States; but I wish to have no system of guardianship and pupilage and overseership over these negroes.

Garrett Davis [Ky.] objected to the bill because it would perpetuate the vicious system of trading in cotton already inaugurated by Northern men in the subjugated parts of the South.

There is a delusive intimation in the proposition that it is to be made self-supporting; but any man who is acquainted with the South, with free negroes, and with the general subject of the bill knows that for years and years at least this system never can be worked so as to become self-supporting.

But the particular objection I have to it is, in the first place, that every assistant commissioner and every superintendent of freedmen and of abandoned lands in all the districts will be a secret partner of every man to whom he lets these lands upon lease and to whom he assigns any portion of the freedmen for their cultivation. No guards or provisions which can be thrown around the system by legislation will ever prevent it from degenerating into that abuse. Here, then, will be from twenty-two to twenty-five assistant commissioners and from fifty to sixty local superintendents, with their retinue of clerks and other officers, who are by this bill required to be sustained by the military power of the United States. That will give them energy and give them strength by which all of their schemes and all of the policy which they will bring into this new freedmen's department shall be rigorously executed at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. President, what will be the consequences? These are gentlemen in the Senate who have visited Southern plantations. They know that the negro cabins are huddled together in the form of villages around the mansion of the owner, and the slaves who have been in the habit of laboring in the fields come there at night for rest and depart in the morning to their labor. This measure proposes that lands to the quantity of fifty acres shall be let by the commissioner and the assistant commissioners to the freedmen. Where will a freedman find a house in which to shelter himself and his family upon fifty acres of a vast cotton estate? There are no such houses except in these villages that are built up by the owner of the estate around his mansion. They are not distributed and located so as to be let in tenements of fifty acres. In addition to that, where will the freedman get the capital to buy his horse or his oxen and his plow and other agricultural implements to put his crop of cotton or corn in the ground? All these require capital—capital far beyond the ability of the freedman to command—and this fact renders the scheme impracticable so far as it professes to be for the benefit of the freedman.

The inevitable result will be that the freedman will lease no land. He will not be able to lease and to cultivate land. He will not be able to purchase equipments of horses and agricultural implements that will be necessary for its cultivation. Then he must fall into general line and become simply a laborer, to be hired by the assistant commissioners or by the superintendents, and to be hired to some man with whom they are secretly in partnership, with whom they are to share the profits and the produce of the freedman's labor from these abandoned lands.

In the language of the honorable Senator from Indiana, it will be but changing the form of slavery. There will be the name of freedman attached to the negro, but he will be subject to be taken by the assistant commissioners and the superintendents to be hired out; and, if there is any obstacle in the way of the performance of this duty, they are to be backed by the military power of the United States. The consequence will be that a few favorites and secret partners of these Government officials, corrupted by cotton, will obtain leases of all the cotton lands in large bodies.

When their business will be to hire the freedmen to cultivate the cotton fields the profits of the culture of which they are to share, is it not inevitable that there will be vast abuse in the discharge of the duty of hiring the freedmen by these officials? They will gather them together, they will present this law to the freedmen, they will show that the law itself authorizes them to command the freedmen to assemble upon any plantation that they may designate, to go into the service of any lessee they may name, at any wages they may agree upon, and the freedman, awed and intimidated by the law, becomes submissive and entirely obedient to the mandate of the commissioners and superintendents. He becomes as tractable, ay, more tractable and obedient than he ever was to his former master or overseer, because here is the power that has given to him the name of freedman sending its official agents into the region of country where he lives, exhibiting the law which authorizes those agents to assemble and to command the attendance and the rendezvous of the freedmen at any place they may designate, and provides that the freedmen shall labor according to their mandate at such prices as they may agree upon. The consequence will be inevitably that the negro will labor for the white man, will labor for the lessee in connection and as a secret partner of the superintendents and of the assistant commissioners. The whole scheme will become a system of corruption, of plunder, of fraud and oppression upon the freedmen to enrich the white adventurers who go into the business of discharging the duties of commissioners and superintendents.

Sir, I cannot doubt that, if the condition and relations of parties were changed, if the Democratic party was now in power and was wielding the vast forces of this Government, and was endeavoring to enforce upon the Republican party out of power the identical principles and measures which the latter has been so swift to impose upon the whole country, the Black Republican party would rise as one man, with one heart, and with indomitable energy, and oppose all this policy and these measures which they are now seeking to fasten upon the country.

By a vote of 14 yeas to 24 nays the report of the committee was not concurred in.

Another joint conference committee was appointed, consisting of Senators Henry Wilson [Mass.], James Harlan [Ia.], and Waitman T. Willey [W. Va.], and Representatives Robert C. Schenck [O.], George S. Boutwell [Mass.], and James S. Rollins [Mo.]. It brought forward on February 28 the bill in its final form. Both Houses passed the bill on March 3, the vote being taken viva voce. President Lincoln approved the act on the same day.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, selected as the commissioner of the bureau Gen. Oliver O. Howard, whose character was well indicated by the appellation generally given him of "the Christian Soldier." James G. Blaine, in his "Twenty Years of Congress," says of his administration of the bureau:

He was subjected to unreasonable fault-finding, often to censure and obloquy; but throughout the whole he bore himself with the honor of a soldier and the purity of a Christian—triumphantly sustaining himself throughout a Congressional investigation set on foot by political malice, and confronting with equal credit a military inquiry which had its origin in the jealousy that is often the bane of army service.

In the administration of the freedmen's bureau it had been found that its effectiveness was hampered by lack of power on the part of its officers. Accordingly, on January 12, 1866, Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] introduced in the Senate from the Judiciary Committee a supplementary act to enlarge the powers of the bureau.

The President of the United States, through the war department and through the commissioner of the bureau, was authorized to extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employees, agents, and officers of the bureau; and the Secretary of War was authorized to issue such provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores, and to afford such aid as he might deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he might direct. The President was also authorized to reserve from sale or settlement under the homestead and preëmption laws public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not to exceed three millions of acres of good land in all, for the use of the freedmen, at a certain rental to be named in such manner as the commissioner should by regulation prescribe; or the commissioner could purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts as might be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen depending upon the Government for support.

It was further provided that wherever in consequence of any State or local law any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to the white persons, such as the right to enforce contracts, to sue, to give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, or convey real and personal property were refused or denied to freedmen on account of race or color or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, or whenever they were subjected to punishment for crime different from that provided for white persons, it was made the duty of the President, through the commissioner, to extend military jurisdiction and protection over all cases affecting persons against whom such unjust discriminations were made. But the jurisdiction was to cease "whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred shall cease," and was in no event to be exercised in any State "in which the ordinary course of judicial proceeding has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in those States after they shall have been fully restored to their constitutional relations to the United States, and when the courts of the State and of the United States, within their limits, are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice."

This bill was brought at the height of the contest between President Johnson and Congress over reconstruction of the Southern States, and partisan spirit flamed high in the ensuing debate, which covered not only every phase of the question of negro rights, but the constitutional aspect of Reconstruction as well. Nearly every Senator of prominence spoke upon the bill, and most of them with marked ability. However, since the arguments are presented in other debates on reconstruction this one is here omitted.

The bill was passed by the Senate on January 25, 1866, by a vote of 37 to 10.

When the bill reached the House it was referred to the Select Committee on Freedmen's Affairs (Thomas D. Eliot, of Massachusetts, chairman). It was promptly reported and came to a vote on February 6, when it passed by 136 yeas to 33 nays, a strictly partisan vote.

The most notable speech on the bill in the House was one delivered on February 1 by Ignatius Donnelly [Minn.], who possessed an original mind that ran along lines out of the usual grooves of Congressional thought. Looking beyond the satisfaction of the material needs of the freedmen and the grant to them of civil and political rights, he insisted that the negro needed over and above these education, to "fit him to protect himself in that not distant day when the bureau must necessarily be withdrawn." It is true that he did not foresee the special kind of education—industrial—which later such institutions as those at Hampton, Va. (founded 1868), and Tuskegee, Ala. (founded 1881), were established to promote among the negroes (and, in the former case, among the Indians also), but his speech aided in turning the attention of Congress and the country to the general need for negro education, and from this there sprang up inevitably in the minds of practical philanthropists the particular direction which such instruction should take.

Mr. Donnelly offered an amendment, providing "a common-school education to all refugees and freedmen who shall apply therefor." It was not adopted.

Education and Citizenship

Ignatius Donnelly, M. C.

Sir, this is a new birth of the nation. The Constitution will hereafter be read by the light of the rebellion; by the light of the emancipation; by the light of that tremendous uprising of the intellect of the world going on everywhere around us. He is indeed fearfully cramped by the old technicalities who can see in this enormous struggle only the suppression of a riot and the dispersion of a mob. This struggle has been as organic in its great meanings as the Constitution itself. It will leave its traces upon our Government and laws so long as the nation continues to exist.

The measure under consideration should not awaken opposition. It is right and necessary. So long as oppression continues, the Government must intervene in behalf of justice and liberty, and through what machinery can it better intervene than through this bureau?

But, sir, even more than all this is needed. What, let me ask, is the condition of the mind of the South?

Gentlemen demand that the ballot shall be universal. They must go further; they must insist that capacity properly to direct the ballot shall be likewise universal.

Said Washington:

"In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened."

Said Jefferson, in the famous ordinance of 1787:

"Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever established."

Says Horace Mann:

"If Republican institutions do waken up unexampled energies in the whole mass of the people, and give them implements of unexampled power wherewith to work out their will, then these same institutions ought also to confer upon that people unexampled wisdom and rectitude." . . . "I know we are often admonished that without intelligence and virtue as a chart and a compass to direct us in our untried political voyage we shall perish in the first storm; but I venture to add that without these qualities we shall not wait for a storm—we cannot weather a calm. If the sea is as smooth as glass, we shall founder, for we are in a stone boat."

It is not necessary to demonstrate the importance of education. The common sense of mankind approves it; the success of our nation attests it; a million happy homes in our midst proclaim it. Education has here fused all nations into one; it has obliterated prejudices; it has dissolved falsehoods; it has announced great truths; it has flung open all doors; and thank God, it has at last broken all the shackles in the land! The rebellion sprang from popular ignorance; its suppression came from popular education. When the Englishman described the North as a land "where every man had a newspaper in his pocket," he touched at once the vital point of our greatness and the true secret of our success.

Let the great work go on. Its tasks are but half completed. Let it go on until ignorance is driven beyond our remotest borders. This is the noblest of all human labors. This will build deep and wide and imperishable the foundations of our Government; this will raise up a structure that shall withstand the slow canker of time and the open assaults of violence. The freedom of the people resting upon the intelligence of the people! Who shall destroy a nation founded on this rock?

The one great error of our country has been that education was not from the very first made a matter of the State, and as essential to the citizen as liberty itself. Education means the intelligent exercise of liberty, and surely without this liberty is a calamity, since it means simply the unlimited right to err. Who can doubt that if a man is to govern himself he should have the means to know what is best for himself, what is injurious to himself, what agencies work against him and what for him? And the avenue to all this is simply education. Suffrage without education is an edged tool in the hands of a child—dangerous to others and destructive to himself.

Now, what is the condition of the South in reference to all this?

I assert that it is such as would bring disgrace upon any despotism in Christendom.

The great bulk of the people are rude, illiterate, semi-civlized; hence the rebellion; hence all the atrocious barbarities that accompanied it.

The number of ignorant is indicated by the proportion unable to read and write; indicated, I say, but not fully shown, because, of the practically ignorant, of those who read neither books nor newspapers, and are thus cut off from acquiring information through its ordinary channels, the proportion who have never learned their letters or to write their names may be small indeed.

I repeat, the condition of the South in this respect would be shameful to any semi-civilized people, and is such as to render a republican government, resting on the intelligent judgment of the people, an impossibility.

I appeal to the revelations of the census.

My statistics do not include the former slaves, but the white people of the South and the few freed negroes found among them in 1860.

It appears from the census that the adult male white and free negro population of the United States, in 1860, over twenty years of age, who could not read and write was but little short of half a million. In other words, that in the last presidential election, if the entire population of the United States had voted, half a million votes would have been cast by men who could not read and write.

When we recollect that upon our presidential elections depend the great interests and the life of the country, and remotely the cause of all mankind, we may well stand appalled before this vast force of half a million ignorant men deciding the destinies of the world.

But if we look exclusively at the Southern States we find still greater cause for surprise and alarm.

The census shows that in 1860 in the seven Southern States of Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Arkansas, and Kentucky there were 140,036 illiterate males, over 20 years of age, able neither to read nor to write. In the same year 715,551 votes were cast for presidential electors. Thus about one man in five was illiterate.

If, however, we add to each man entirely illiterate one other who, while able to read and write his name, derives no practical advantage from these mere rudiments of education in forming his opinions, we will find the total to be more than one-third of the total vote.

The total number of illiterate in the Southern States in 1860, over twenty years of age, exclusive of the then slaves, was 545,177. In these, with the comparatively ignorant associated with them, we see the upholders of the rebellion at the ballot box and in the field. Without these it could never have been inaugurated, or if inaugurated could never have maintained itself for six months against the mighty levies of the Union.

But, it may be said, these evils will correct themselves. The testimony is all the other way:

From 1840 to 1860, a period of twenty years, the number of illiterate over twenty years rose from 549,693 to 1,218,311; in other words, an increase of considerably more than one hundred per cent.!

At the same ratio of growth, in 1920 it would amount to the enormous total of 12,596,688.

Who will pretend that with such a mass of ignorance the Government could survive? It would be buried in the most disgraceful anarchy the world has ever seen.

But, Mr. Speaker, even these appalling figures do not tell the whole story. These figures do not include the then slaves, now freedmen. We must add to the ignorant population of the South the 4,000,000 blacks just released from slavery. Giving these their natural increase, in 1920, when it is supposed that the total population will be 120,000,000, the illiterates will be 18,591,500, one-fifth of the entire number and nearly one-third of the entire vote.

I trust, then, that no gentleman will doubt the propriety of the amendment I have submitted. We are interfering in behalf of the negro; let us interfere to educate him. We thus strike out at one blow a large proportion of the ignorance of the South; we shame the whites into an effort to educate themselves, and we prepare thus both classes for the proper exercise of the right of suffrage.

Nor shall it be said that the ignorance revealed by these statistics is an exotic, that it results from foreign immigration. While it is true that in the North a large proportion of the illiterate are from foreign lands, in the South the reverse is the case. In North Carolina, in 1860, the illiterate persons of native birth were 74,877, while those of foreign birth were but 100.

We find that the Southern States have a population about equal to the Middle and Western States combined, while the number of illiterate in the former is 545,177, as against 241,854 in the latter; and this not including the vast number of illiterate freedmen in the South, who would make the disproportion still greater. So that the South outnumbers in illiterate the most unfavorable portions of the North more than two to one.

Who can fail to see in this vast disproportion the cause of the rebellion? In the language of Henry Ward Beecher:

> "As upon the coast you can trace the line between the dark and treacherous sea on the one hand, and the firm and trusty land on the other, by the row of light-houses; so you can mark between the deep, damnable wickedness of treason and the supernal luster of patriotism by the line of schoolhouses."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I put it to this House, and through it to the whole people of the country, North and South, whether this state of things is to continue. This is not a political question. It rises above the level of politics and directly affects the welfare of all the people and the life of the nation itself.

If, sir, this enormous growth of ignorance is to continue we can meet with no fate save that which has overtaken too many of the free governments of the world.

We cannot count upon our representative system. The struggle we have gone through shows too plainly that reforms must originate with the people. The people may be converted, the representatives never. They are precisely what the people behind them are, and no more. If the people are ignorant, they will have demagogues for their representatives.

The preservation of this Government through the many dangers that have encompassed it since its birth I look upon as the marvel of modern times. The hand of God is plainly visible in it. Let us do our part now to prepare the way for the mighty future that awaits us. There is no loftier task on earth.

We cannot leave the population of the South, white or black, in the condition they are now in. We must educate them. When you destroy ignorance you destroy disloyalty; for what man with a free, broad scope of mind, and with a knowledge of all the facts, can fail to love this just, benevolent, and most gentle Government?

Let us turn, then, to the next consideration. What chance is there for the black man in the South without the intervention of this bureau?

We have liberated four million slaves in the South.

It is proposed by some that we stop right here and do nothing more. Such a course would be a cruel mockery.

These men are without education, and morally and intellectually degraded by centuries of bondage. They have neither the arts nor the knowledge nor the power of combination to protect themselves against the superior race from whose grasp they have just been forcibly wrested. That race did not willingly yield them up; to abandon them to their former masters would be to consign them once more to inevitable slavery. The master would have every inducement to reënslave his former bondman, and not a single barrier would stand in his way.

But it may be said the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery would protect them. Sir, a grand abstract declaration, unenforced by the arm of authority, is not a protection.

Slavery consists in a deprivation of natural rights. A man may be a slave for a term of years as fully as though he were held for life; he may be a slave when deprived of a portion of the wages of his labor as fully as if deprived of all; he may be held down by unjust laws to a degraded and defenceless condition as fully as though his wrists were manacled; he may be oppressed by a convocation of masters called a legislature as fully as by a single master. In short, he who is not entirely free is necessarily a slave.

What has the South done for the black man since the close of the rebellion?

Let us examine the black codes of the different States adopted since that time.

In South Carolina it is provided that all male negroes between two and twenty, and all females between two and eighteen, shall be bound out to some "master." The adult negro is compelled to enter into contract with a master, and the district judge, not the laborer, is to fix the value of the labor. If he thinks the compensation too small and will not work, he is a vagrant, and can be hired out for a term of service at a rate again to be fixed by the judge. If a hired negro leaves his employer he forfeits his wages for the whole year.

The black code of Mississippi provides that no negro shall own or hire lands in the State; that he shall not sue nor testify in court against a white man; that he must be employed by a master before the second Monday in January, or he will be bound out—in other words, sold into slavery; that if he runs away the master may recover him and deduct the expenses out of his wages; and that if another man employs him he will be liable to an action for damages.

The black code of Alabama provides that if a negro who has contracted to labor fails to do so he shall be punished with damages; and if he runs away he shall be punished as a vagrant, which probably means that he shall be sold to the highest bidder for a term of years; and that any person who entices him to leave his master, as by the offer of better wages, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be sent to jail for six months; and, further, that these regulations include all persons of negro blood to the third generation, though one parent in each generation shall be pure white; that is, down to the man who has but one-eighth negro blood in his veins.

The Mississippi legislature passed a law prohibiting negroes from acquiring lands or real estate. This was promptly overruled by the United States authorities. Whereupon the legislatures of Mississippi and Alabama passed laws making the owner of the property, who rents or leases a negro a house or land, responsible for everything he buys—his meat, his bread, his doctor's bill, and even his taxes. Of course no one will rent a black man a house or lease him land under such a law; and of course also the negro will have to be driven out upon the highway and become a vagrant, and thus become subject to the vagrant law.

The black code of Tennessee provides that the vagrant negro may be sold to the highest bidder to pay his jail fees; and to make sure that he be kept a vagrant no housekeeper shall harbor him; his children may be bound out against his wish to a master by the county court; if his master fails to pay him he cannot sue him nor testify against him. It further provides that colored children shall not be admitted into the same schools with white children, while it makes no provision for their education in separate schools.

The black code of Virginia provides that any man who will not work for "the common wages given to other laborers" shall be deemed a vagrant; the masters have formed combinations and have put down the rate of wages to the freedmen below a living price; the negro refusing to work for these wages is seized as a vagrant, sold to service "for the best wages that can be procured" for three months; if he runs off he shall work another month with ball and chain for nothing.

It is true General Terry has declared that the order shall not be enforced; but of what avail will this be when the military are withdrawn and Virginia is reconstructed?

All this means simply the reëstablishment of slavery:

1. He shall work at a rate of wages to be fixed by a county judge or a legislature made up of white masters, or by combinations of white masters, and not in any case by himself.

2. He shall not leave that master to enter service with another. If he does he is pursued as a fugitive, charged with the expenses of his recapture, and made to labor for an additional period, while the white man who induced him to leave is sent to jail.

3. His children are taken from him and sold into virtual slavery.

4. If he refuses to work he is sold to the highest bidder for a term of months or years, and becomes in fact a slave.

5. He cannot better his condition; there is no future for him; he shall not own property; he shall not superintend the education of his children; neither will the State educate them.

6. If he is wronged he has no remedy, for the courts are closed against him.

Said a Georgian the other day:

"The blacks eat, sleep, move, live, only by the tolerance of the whites, who hate them. The blacks own absolutely nothing but their bodies; their former masters own everything, and will sell them nothing. If a black man draws even a bucket of water from a well, he must first get the permission of a white man, his enemy. If he sleeps in a house over night, it is only by the leave of a white man. If he buys a loaf of bread, he must buy of a white man. If he asks for work to earn his living, he must ask it of a white man; and the whites are determined to give him no work, except on such terms as will make him a serf and impair his liberty."

This, then, is slavery, less the protection which the master formerly afforded his chattel. The slave now has a mob for his master. General Schurz says, in his admirable report:

"The emancipation of the slaves is submitted to only in so far as chattel slavery in the old form could not be kept up. But although the freedman is no longer considered the property of the individual master, he is considered the slave of society; and all independent State legislation will show the tendency to make him such. The ordinances abolishing slavery, passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude."

The enemies of the black man, those who opposed his liberation, now point to him and say, "See the condition to which you have reduced him. He is worse off than before. His race is perishing from the face of the earth under the innumerable miseries which liberty has inflicted upon it."

For one, with the help of Almighty God, I shall never consent to such cruel injustice. Having voted to give the negro liberty, I shall vote to give him all things essential to liberty.

If degradation and oppression have, as it is alleged, unfitted him for freedom, surely continued degradation and oppression will not prepare him for it. If he is not to remain a brute you must give him that which will make him a man—opportunity. If he is, as it is claimed, an inferior being and unable to compete with the white man on terms of equality, surely you will not add to the injustice of nature by casting him beneath the feet of the white man. With what face can you reproach him with his degradation at the very moment you are striving to still further degrade him? If he is, as you say, not fit to vote, give him a chance; let him make himself an independent laborer like yourself; let him own his homestead; let the courts of justice be opened to him; and let his intellect, darkened by centuries of neglect, be illuminated by all the glorious lights of education. If after all this the negro proves himself an unworthy savage and brutal wretch, condemn him, but not till then.

He must have this opportunity. He cannot remain in an amphibious condition between liberty and slavery. He must be either full slave or full freeman; he must either be master of himself or the servant of another.

Do not believe the delusive hope uttered by some that the race which has all the privileges will some day willingly divide them with the race that has none. The world's history tells no such story. The Old World's royalties and aristocracies rest upon ancient conquests; and yet how unwilling, even after centuries have passed, have the victors ever been to permit the vanquished to rise! Let the wretched condition of the masses in those countries at the present day testify.

Is the right of suffrage necessary to the negro?

The right to vote is the right of self-protection, through the possession of a share in the Government. Without this a man's rights lie at the mercy of other men who have every selfish incentive to rob and oppress him. This is the great central idea of a republican government. The absence of this is the source of all despotism. I would ask, what white man would consider himself safe without the right to vote, especially if the Government was exercised exclusively by a hostile race?

What shield and safeguard can the negro have if it be not the right to vote? To whom can he appeal when the highest earthly tribunals are filled by his enemies?

No man can rest with safety upon the mercy and generosity of any other man. The law protects the ward from its guardian, the child from its parent, the wife from her husband, nay, even the dumb brute from its owner. Can we, then, as the Representatives of a free people, consign a helpless race to the mercy of its hereditary oppressors? Can we, in the heart of a free government, permit the erection of such a strange and abnormal system of despotism?

Mr. Speaker, it is as plain to my mind as the sun at noonday that we must make all the citizens of the country equal before the law; that we must break down all walls of caste; that we must offer equal opportunities to all men.

Injustice is the mother of revolutions. In no case has rebellion raised its head in the midst of equal laws; for what more can a man ask than equality? But I challenge the historian to point to a single community where unjust laws have not sooner or later given birth to revolution; to the efforts of one class to perpetuate and of the other to resist injustice.

If you give the negro an equal opportunity with the white man he becomes perforce a property-holder and a law-maker, and he is interested with you in preserving the peace of the country. If you hand him over to oppression, if you deprive him of all hope, if you debase him into a brute, you can expect nothing from him but poverty, turbulence, and wretchedness. If, then, your object, if the object of all government, is to advance the prosperity of the people, can you do so by ruining one-eighth of the entire population?

The true issue before the South is justice or anarchy. We must save the South from herself. The negroes now know themselves to be freemen. They may be made savages, but never again slaves. The cruel, heartless course the South seems bent on pursuing will sooner or later set the land aflame with insurrection. And in that day are we ready, we, the Christian people of the North, to hold down with our armies the poor writhing wretches who will tell us that their title deeds of liberty bear our superscription; and who will fling into our faces while we are manacling them the sacred promises of the proclamation of emancipation? Never! never! This thing cannot be. Our own hearts would revolt at it; the world would cry us: Shame! The name of American would become an epithet of contempt in the mouth of all mankind.

We must hold our faith. We made great vows to God when the fury of the tempest smote us, and night and darkness seemed settling down upon our frail bark forever. Let us not, like the drunken sailors of the Mediterranean, abandon those vows amid the profligacy of the harbor. It becomes a great people to hold its faith as the most sacred thing beneath the wide canopy of the heavens.

If it is, then, true that we must make the freedmen fully free, and, if the right of suffrage is necessary to this freedom, then it is equally necessary that education should accompany freedom.

Pass the amendment I have proposed, and the Freedman's Bureau will not only protect the negro now but give him the means of self-protection hereafter. Without this the ballot is a useless, perhaps a pernicious, instrument in his hands. Without this your bureau will be but a temporary relief, and in a short time the negro will relapse into oppression. Educate him, and he will himself see to it that common schools shall forever continue among his people; and in doing him an act of justice you will increase the safety of the nation forever.

Let not the objection of expense be made. No outlay is too great which is necessary to the safety of the people, since in that is involved all the wealth of the country. It is a madman's economy to save money by rendering the people unfit for self-government and then lose all in the misgovernment which is sure to follow.

Universal education must go hand in hand with universal suffrage. Either alone will be unavailing; together they will create the mightiest government and the ablest race the world has ever known.

If you pass the amendment I have offered, the Freedman's Bureau becomes an instrumentality of more good than was ever before achieved in the world by any merely human agency. Its influence will be greater than even Jefferson's famous ordinance, which gave to freedom the Northwestern Territory. And who shall count the results yet to flow from that great measure? A thoroughly educated negro population in the South means a white population forced into education through mere shame; it means an intelligent and, necessarily, a loyal people; it means industry, prosperity, morality, and religion everywhere; a land rejoicing in wealth and glorious with liberty.

The bill was vetoed by President Johnson on February 19 for the following reasons: (1) that it abolished trial by jury in the South, and substituted trial by court-martial; (2) that this abolition was apparently permanent, not temporary; (3) that the bureau was a costly and demoralizing system of poor relief; and (4) that Congress had no power to apply the public money to any such purpose in time of peace.

The Senate voted upon the veto the day after it was received, 30 yeas to 18 nays, less than the two-thirds majority required to override it.

A mass meeting was held in Washington on Washington's birthday, to approve the President's action. The meeting adjourned to the White House, where the President made a long and abusive harangue against his Republican opponents, whom he arraigned by name. Saying that he had "fought traitors and treason in the South," he let it be inferred that he was in a similar contest in the North and would wage it with equal fearlessness. Beginning to recount his own career from humble beginnings, he was interrupted by a voice from the crowd reminding him that he had been a tailor, whereupon he said he had not done "patchwork" then, nor did he propose to do it now. He "wanted the whole suit," and it was not his practice to fail to perform what he had pledged himself to do. He said that a Congressman had said that he, the President, ought to be put out of the way of the bill. Interpreting this as a threat of assassination, he asked:

"Does not the murder of Lincoln appease the vengeance and wrath of the opponents of this Government? Are they still unslaked? Do they still want more blood? I am not afraid of the assassin attacking me where a brave and courageous man would attack another. I dread him only when he would go in disguise, his footsteps noiseless. If it is blood they want let them have courage enough to strike like men."

Later in the session (May 22) a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Thomas D. Eliot [Mass.] from the Select Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, continuing in force, with amendments, the act in existence. It was so framed as to escape the objections which had caused Republican Senators to sustain the President's veto of its predecessor. The most important changes were the limitation of the act to two years and the reduction of the sweeping judicial powers accorded the bureau. It also contained a new provision for applying the property of the ex-rebel States to the education of the freedmen—evidently a result of Mr. Donnelly's speech. It was not extensively debated, and came to a vote in the House on May 29, when it was passed—yeas 96, nays 32. The Senate passed it, viva voce, on June 26. Owing to the press of other business it did not reach the President until the first week of July. He vetoed it on the 16th for the same general grounds given in his first veto. On the same day it was passed over the veto: in the House by 104 yeas to 33 nays, and in the Senate by 33 yeas to 12 nays.

At the expiration of the statute, in June, 1868, the bureau was continued by law for one year longer in unreconstructed States. August 3, 1868, a bill was passed over the veto, providing that General Howard should not be displaced from the commissionership, and that he should withdraw the bureau from the various States by January 1, 1869, except as to its educational work, which did not stop until July 1, 1870. The collection of pay and bounties for colored soldiers and sailors was continued until 1872 by the bureau, when its functions were assumed by the usual channels of the War Department. Total expenditures of the Freedmen's Bureau, March, 1865–August 30, 1870, were reported at $15,359,092.27.

CHAPTER VIII

Suspended Sovereignty or State Suicide?

[RECONSTRUCTION OF REBELLIOUS STATES]

Message and Proclamation of President Lincoln on Amnesty and Reconstruction—Henry Winter Davis [Md.] Moves in the House of Representatives a Resolution Guaranteeing a "Republican Form of Government" to the States in Rebellion—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Davis, Fernando C. Beaman [Mich.]—Resolution Is Referred to a Special Committee, Which Reports a Bill for Reconstructing Governments of These States—Debate on the Bill: in Favor, Nathaniel B. Smithers [Del.], Thomas Williams [Pa.], M. Russell Thayer [Pa.], Ignatius Donnelly [Minn.], Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.], Sidney Perham [Me.], James M. Ashley [O.], Daniel W. Gooch [Mass.], William D. Kelley [Pa.], George S. Boutwell [Mass.]; Opposed, James C. Allen [Ill.], Charles Denison [Pa.], Myer Strouse [Pa.], James A. Cravens [Ind.], Francis D. Kernan [N. Y.], Nehemiah Perry [N. J.], Fernando Wood [N. Y.], Samuel S. Cox [O.], George H. Pendleton [O.]; the Bill Is Passed by House and Senate—The President Refuses to Sign It, and Gives His Reasons in a Proclamation, in Which He Also Sustains Reconstruction by Executive Authority—Protest of Senators Davis and Benjamin Wade [O.]—Reconstruction Bill Proposed in Next Session of Congress; It Is Tabled—Speech of President Lincoln on Reconstruction of Seceded States: "At Home Again in the Union."

THE subject of reconstruction of the seceded State governments was, during the Civil War, considered almost entirely in its constitutional aspect, and the debates thereon at that time properly belong to Volume V, treating of State Rights. However, after the war, the question of the maintenance of Civil Rights, especially of the negro, became the crucial issue in setting up loyal State governments in the South. That the subject may not be divided in treatment, all the debates upon reconstruction are presented in the present volume.

President Lincoln first broached the subject of reconstruction in his annual message of December 8, 1863, which he accompanied with a proclamation on the subject, combined with an offer of amnesty to former rebels taking oath of allegiance to the United States Government.

THE RAIL-SPLITTER [LINCOLN] AND TAILOR [JOHNSON] REPAIRING THE UNION

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

Of this proclamation he said in his message:

On examination it will appear, as is believed, that nothing is attempted beyond what is amply justified by the Constitution. True, the form of an oath is given, but no man is coerced to take it. The man is only promised a pardon in case he voluntarily takes the oath. The Constitution authorizes the Executive to grant or withhold the pardon at his own absolute discretion; and this includes the power to grant on terms, as is fully established by judicial and other authorities.

It is also proffered that if, in any of the States named, a State government shall be, in the mode prescribed, set up, such government shall be recognized and guaranteed by the United States, and that under it the State shall, on the constitutional conditions, be protected against invasion and domestic violence. The constitutional obligation of the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and to protect the State in the cases stated, is explicit and full. But why tender the benefits of this provision only to a State government set up in this particular way? This section of the Constitution contemplates a case wherein the element within a State favorable to republican government in the Union may be too feeble for an opposite and hostile element external to, or even within, the State; and such are precisely the cases with which we are now dealing.

An attempt to guarantee and protect a revived State government, constructed in whole, or in preponderating part, from the very element against whose hostility and violence it is to be protected, is simply absurd. There must be a test by which to separate the opposing elements, so as to build only from the sound; and that test is a sufficiently liberal one which accepts as sound whoever will make a sworn recantation of his former unsoundness.

But if it be proper to require, as a test of admission to the political body, an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and to the Union under it, why also to the laws and proclamations in regard to slavery? Those laws and proclamations were enacted and put forth for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. To give them their fullest effect, there had to be a pledge for their maintenance. In my judgment they have aided, and will further aid, the cause for which they were intended. To now abandon them would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and an astounding breach of faith. I may add, at this point that, while I remain in my present position, I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation; nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation, or by any of the acts of Congress. For these and other reasons it is thought best that support of these measures shall be included in the oath; and it is believed the Executive may lawfully claim it in return for pardon and restoration of forfeited rights, which he has clear constitutional power to withhold altogether, or grant upon the terms which he shall deem wisest for the public interest.

It should be observed, also, that this part of the oath is subject to the modifying and abrogating power of legislation and supreme judicial decision.

The proposed acquiescence of the national Executive in any reasonable temporary State arrangement for the freed people is made with the view of possibly modifying the confusion and destitution which must at best attend all classes by a total revolution of labor throughout whole States. It is hoped that the already deeply afflicted people in those States may be somewhat more ready to give up the cause of their affliction, if, to this extent, this vital matter be left to themselves; while no power of the national Executive to prevent an abuse is abridged by the proposition.

The suggestion in the proclamation as to maintaining the political framework of the States on what is called reconstruction is made in the hope that it may do good without danger of harm. It will save labor and avoid great confusion.

But why any proclamation now upon this subject? This question is beset with the conflicting views that the step might be delayed too long or be taken too soon. In some States the elements for resumption seem ready for action, but remain inactive apparently for want of a rallying-point—a plan of action. Why shall A adopt the plan of B, rather than B that of A? And, if A and B should agree, how can they know but that the general Government here will reject their plan? By the proclamation a plan is presented which may be accepted by them as a rallying-point, and which they are assured in advance will not be rejected here. This may bring them to act sooner than they otherwise would.

The objection to a premature presentation of a plan by the national Executive consists in the danger of committals on points which could be more safely left to further developments. Care has been taken to so shape the document as to avoid embarrassments from this source. Saying that, on certain terms, certain classes will be pardoned, with rights restored, it is not said that other classes, or other terms, will never be included. Saying that reconstruction will be accepted if presented in a specified way, it is not said it will never be accepted in any other way.

The movements, by State action, for emancipation in several of the States not included in the Emancipation Proclamation, are matters of profound gratulation. And while I do not repeat in detail what I have heretofore so earnestly urged upon this subject, my general views and feelings remain unchanged; and I trust that Congress will omit no fair opportunity of aiding these important steps to a great consummation.

Reconstruction Proclamation

The proclamation in regard to reconstruction contained the following provisions:

1. It offered amnesty to all but specified classes of leading men;
2. It declared that a State government might be reconstructed as soon as one-tenth of the voters of 1860, qualified by State laws, "excluding all others," should take the prescribed oath;
3. It declared that, if such State government were republican in form, it should "receive the benefits" of the guaranty clause;
4. It excepted States where loyal governments had always been maintained; but,
5. It added the caution that the admission of Senators and Representatives was a matter exclusively "resting with the two Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive." The proclamation further remarked that "any provision which may be adopted by such State government in relation to the freed people of such State, which shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which may yet be consistent, as a temporary arrangement, with their present condition as a laboring, landless, homeless class, will not be objected to by the national Executive."

The amnesty offered was accepted by very few persons.

On March 22, 1864, Henry Winter Davis [Md.] succeeded in getting before the House of Representatives a resolution which he had offered early in the session, guaranteeing to States in rebellion "a republican form of government."

Governments for Rebellious States

House of Representatives, March 22–May 4, 1864

Mr. Davis spoke as follows upon his resolution:

The vote of gentlemen upon this measure will be regarded by the country with no ordinary interest. Their vote will be taken to express their opinion on the necessity of ending slavery with the rebellion, and their willingness to assume the responsibility of adopting the legislative measures without which that result cannot be assured, and may wholly fail of accomplishment. The measure now proposed, or any adequate and proper measure to accomplish its purpose, is entitled to the support of all gentlemen upon this side of the House, not less of those who think that the rebellion has placed the citizens of the rebel States beyond the protection of the Constitution, and that Congress, therefore, has supreme power over them as conquered enemies, than of that other class who think that they have not ceased to be citizens and States of the United States, though incapable of exercising political privileges under the Constitution, but that Congress is charged with a high political power by the Constitution to guarantee republican governments in the States, and that this is the proper time and the proper mode of exercising it. It is also entitled to the favorable consideration of gentlemen upon the other side of the House who honestly and deliberately express their judgment that slavery is dead. To them it puts the question whether it is not advisable to bury it out of sight that its ghost may no longer stalk abroad to frighten us from our propriety.

It purports, sir, not to exercise a revolutionary authority, but to be an execution of the Constitution of the United States, of the fourth section of the fourth article of that Constitution, which not merely confers the power upon Congress, but imposes upon Congress the duty of guaranteeing to every State in this Union a republican form of government. That clause vests in the Congress of the United States a plenary, supreme, unlimited political jurisdiction, paramount over courts, subject only to the judgment of the people of the United States, embracing within its scope every legislative measure necessary and proper to make it effectual and what is necessary and proper the Constitution refers, in the first place, to our judgment, subject to no revision but that of the people. It recognizes no other tribunal. It recognizes the judgment of no court. It refers to no authority except the judgment and will of the majority of Congress and of the people on that judgment, if any appeal from it. It is intended to meet all the emergencies of the national life.

It is the result of every principle of law that there can be no republican government within the limits of the United States that does not recognize, but does repudiate, the Constitution, and which the President and the Congress of the United States do not, on their part, recognize. Those that are here represented are the only governments existing within the limits of the United States. Those that are not here represented are not governments of the States, republican under the Constitution. And, if they be not, then they are military usurpations, inaugurated as the permanent governments of the States, contrary to the supreme law of the land, arrayed in arms against the Government of the United States; and it is the duty, the first and highest duty, of the Government to suppress and expel them. Congress must either expel or recognize and support them. If it do not guarantee them it is bound to expel them; and they who are not ready to suppress them are bound to recognize them.

The Supreme Court of the United States in declining jurisdiction of political questions such as these, in the famous Rhode Island cases, declared, by the mouth of Chief Justice Taney, in the presidency of John Tyler, that a military government, established as the permanent government of a State, is not a republican government in the meaning of the Constitution, and that it is the duty of Congress to suppress it. That duty Congress is now executing by its armies. He further said in that case that it is the exclusive prerogative of Congress—of Congress, and not of the President—to determine what is and what is not the established government of the State! and to come to that conclusion it must judge of what is and what is not a republican government.

What jurisdiction does the duty of guaranteeing a republican government confer, under present circumstances, upon Congress? What laws may it pass? The rebel States must be governed by Congress till they submit and form a State government under the Constitution; or Congress must recognize State governments which do not recognize either Congress or the Constitution of the United States; or there must be an entire absence of all government in the rebel States; and that is anarchy. To recognize a government which does not recognize the Constitution is absurd, for a government is not a constitution; and the recognition of a State government means the acknowledgment of men as governors and legislators and judges actually invested with power to make laws, to judge of crimes, to convict the citizens of other States, to demand the surrender of fugitives from justice, to arm and command the militia, to require the United States to repress all opposition to its authority, and to protect it from invasion—against our own armies; whose Senators and Representatives are entitled to seats in Congress, and whose electoral votes must be counted in the election of the President of a Government which they disown and defy! To accept the alternative of anarchy as the constitutional condition of a State is to assert the failure of the Constitution and the end of republican government. Until, therefore, Congress recognize a State government, organized under its auspices, there is no government in the rebel States except the authority of Congress. In the absence of all State government, the duty is imposed on Congress to provide by law to keep the peace, to administer justice, to watch over the transmission of decedents' estates, to sanction marriages; in a word, to administer civil government until the people shall, under its guidance, submit to the Constitution of the United States, and, under the laws which it shall impose, and on the conditions Congress may require, reorganize a republican government for themselves, and Congress shall recognize that government.

But we have not yet suppressed the insurrection. We are still engaged in removing armed rebellion. Is it yet time to reorganize the State governments, or is there not an intermediate period in which sound legislative wisdom requires that the authority of Congress shall take possession of and temporarily control the States now in rebellion until peace shall be restored and republican government can be established deliberately, undisturbed by the sound or fear of arms, and under the guidance of law?

What is the condition of the rebellion at this time? There is no portion of the rebel States where peace has been so far restored that our military power can be withdrawn for a moment without instant insurrection. There is no rebel State held now by the United States enough of whose population adheres to the Union to be intrusted with the government of the State. One-tenth cannot control nine-tenths. Only in West Virginia, and possibly Tennessee, does our authority exist. You can get a handful of men in the other seceded States who would be glad to take the offices if protected by the troops of the United States, but you have nowhere a body of independent, loyal partisans of the United States, ready to meet the rebels in arms, ready to die for the Republic, who claim the Constitution as their birthright, count all other privileges light in comparison, and are resolved at every hazard to maintain it.

The loyal masses of the South, of which we hear so much, what was their temper at the outbreak of the rebellion? what is their temper now? It is the most astounding spectacle in history that in the Southern States, with more than half of the population opposed to it, a great revolution was effected against their wishes and against their votes, without a battle, a riot, or a protest in behalf of the beneficent Government of their fathers —a revolution whose opponents hastened to lead it, without a martyr to the cause they deserted except the nameless heroes of the mountains of Tennessee, or a confessor of the faith they had avowed save the illustrious Petigru of South Carolina!

Doubtful of the issues of the war, exhausted by bloodshed, anxious for peace—peace and independence—there are some who will accept peace and union, but they are not men who will draw the sword for the United States, and they would be equally content with peace and independence.

What, then, are we to do with the population in these States? To make "confusion worse confounded" by erecting by the side of the hostile State government a new State government on the shifting sands of that whirlpool, to be supported by us while we are there and to turn its power against us when we are driven out? That would be to erect a new throne where

> "Chaos umpire sits,
> And by decision more embroils the fray
> By which he reigns."

In my judgment it is not safe to confide the vast authority of State governments to the doubtful loyalty of the rebel States until armed rebellion shall have been trampled into the dust, until every armed rebel shall have vanished from the State, until there shall be in the South no hope of independence and no fear of subjection, until the United States is bearded by no military power and the laws can be executed by courts and sheriffs without the ever-present menace of military authority. Until we have reached that point this bill proposes that the President shall appoint a civil governor to administer the government under the laws of the United States and the laws in force in the States respectively at the outbreak of the rebellion, subject, of course, to the necessities of military occupation.

When military opposition shall have been suppressed, not merely pushed back, then call upon the people to reorganize in their own way, subject to the conditions that we think essential to our permanent peace and to prevent the revival hereafter of the rebellion, a republican government in the form that the people of the United States can agree to.

Now, for that purpose there are three modes indicated. One is to remove the cause of the war by an alteration of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting slavery everywhere within its limits. That, sir, goes to the root of the matter, and should consecrate the nation's triumph. But there are thirty-four States—three-fourths of them would be twenty-six. I believe there are twenty-five States represented in this Congress; so that we on that basis cannot change the Constitution. It is therefore a condition precedent in that view of the case that more States shall have governments organized within them.

The next plan is that inaugurated by the President of the United States in the proclamation of the 8th December, called the amnesty proclamation. That proposes no guardianship of the United States over the reorganization of the governments, no law to prescribe who shall vote, no civil functionaries to see that the law is faithfully executed, no supervising authority to control and judge of the election. But if, in any manner, by the toleration of martial law lately proclaimed the fundamental law, under the dictation of any military authority, or under the prescriptions of a provost marshal, something in the form of a government shall be presented, represented to rest on the votes of one-tenth of the population, the President will recognize that, provided it does not contravene the proclamation of freedom and the laws of Congress; and, to secure that, an oath is exacted.

Now you will observe that there is no guaranty of law to watch over the organization of that government. It may combine all the population of a State; it may combine one-tenth only; or ten governments may come competing for recognition at the door of the executive mansion. The executive authority is pledged; Congress is not pledged. It may be recognized by the military power and may not be recognized by the civil power, so that it would have a doubtful existence, half civil and half military, neither a temporary government by law of Congress, nor a State government, something as unknown to the Constitution as the rebel government that refuses to recognize it.

But what is the proclamation which the new governments must not contravene? That certain negroes shall be free, and that certain other negroes shall remain slaves. The proclamation therefore recognizes the existence of slavery. It does just exactly what all the constitutions of the rebel States prior to the rebellion did. It recognizes the existence of slavery, and they recognize the existence of slavery; and, therefore, the old constitutions might be restored to-morrow without contravening the proclamation of freedom. Those constitutions do not say that the President shall not have the right, in the exercise of his military authority, to emancipate slaves within the States. They say nothing of the kind. They do not even establish slavery.

There is not a constitution in all the rebel States that formally declares slavery to be the supreme law of the land. They merely recognize it just as the proclamation recognizes its existence in parts of Virginia and in parts of Louisiana. So that the one-tenth of the population at whose hands the President proposes to accept and guarantee a State government can elect officers under the old constitution of their State in exactly the same terms and with exactly the same powers existing at the time of the rebellion, and may under his proclamation demand a recognition. No man will say that there is one word in their laws that contravenes what purports to be a paramount, not a subordinate, order. So soon as the State government is recognized the operation of the proclamation becomes merely a judicial question. The right of a negro to his freedom is a legal right divesting a right of property, and is to be enforced in the courts; and then the question is what the courts will say about the proclamation. Is it valid or invalid? Does it of itself confer a legal right to freedom on negroes who were slaves? Is it within the authority of the Executive? These are the only questions open under such a government; and how local State courts created by the Southern people will decide such a question no one can doubt; for it is quite certain that the great mass of that population is devoted to the system of slave labor; and, though if the question be whether they will give up slavery as the condition precedent to the restoration of a State government, they will abandon it; yet if it be whether they prefer to maintain or abolish slavery, there is not the least doubt that their voice would be almost unanimous for its maintenance. If they have the decision we know what it will be already. It is therefore under the scheme of the President merely a judicial question, to be adjudged by judicial rules, and to be determined by the courts. It is a question whether each individual negro be free. It is a question whether the master has the right of seizure, or the negro can control himself. It is to be determined by the writ of habeas corpus. It is a question of personal right, not a question of political jurisdiction. Its fate in the State courts is certain. Its fate in the courts of the United States under existing laws is scarcely doubtful.

Fernando C. Beaman [Mich.] supported the resolution. He denied the doctrine of secession and insisted that, though a State might commit treason, it was still the imperative duty of the national authority to provide a government for the people and restore domestic tranquillity.

In the beginning of the war, he said, the Government was very cautious that it should do nothing which might admit, even inferentially, that the rebel States had in law seceded. We did not clearly distinguish between abandonment or abrogation and legal secession. We did not immediately discover that the destruction of local government had prepared the way for the substitution of Federal authority. Hence State laws, especially in regard to slaves, were respected by the generals in the field.

Even in this hall, for a long time during the last Congress, we exhibited the farce of calling on South Carolina and her sister conspirators for bills and resolutions. In July, 1862, the President—with his habitual caution and prudence, and in consonance, it is believed, with a very extensive public sentiment, in a solemn document in relation to the confiscation act laid before both Houses of Congress—declared that it was "startling to say that Congress can free a slave within a State"; and yet, on the 1st day of January following, he issued a proclamation that will render his name as famous and imperishable as that of Washington, in which he declared freedom to nearly all the slaves in the seceded districts.

But now we have advanced from this position. We have, after much delay, determined to confiscate the property of rebels. We no longer drive back the fugitive from oppression to miserable bondage. We no longer force him against his will to prosecute acts of treason and rebellion, but we invite him to partake of the blessings of freedom; we give him a musket, and rank him among the defenders of the country. We have determined to prosecute the war in accordance with the laws of nations, disregarding the pretended constitutional claims of rebels in arms.

Still, sir, there is some difference of opinion in the country in regard to the proper mode of treating those States and in respect to the power of Congress over them. I regard the difference of opinion on this side of the House as one rather of terms than of ideas, of theory rather than of practice. Whether, as it seems to me, the State is out of existence, or as is alleged by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] the State survives, but the Government is abrogated and the Constitution is "absolutely dead" (which I think is substantially the same proposition), "and incapable of revival except by a revolutionary process"; or, as is affirmed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Thaddeus Stevens], the seceded States are foreign powers, is not perhaps material to the present discussion. The important inquiry is not what technical words will most aptly define the anomalous condition of the seceded districts, but the pertinent, practical questions are, What can we do with them? How far can the National Government exercise jurisdiction within its own territorial limits? To what extent may it intervene to protect its own loyal citizens in the midst of rebels? What are its powers as an agent in the reëstablishment of lawful State governments, and to what extent may it provide for security in the future?

Each of the theories to which I have referred asserts all the power necessary to warrant the passage of the bill in question, as well as all the authority that I have ever deemed requisite for a safe construction of the Government. If the State be abrogated we may permit a new creation with such restrictions as we may be pleased to direct. If the State survives, but her constitution and government have been destroyed, we may allow a reorganization under such conditions and with such limitations as we see proper to impose. If the State has become a foreign power, then, as a conquered province, we may treat her as a part of the national domain; and in either case we may provide for her people suitable government and for such length of time as she shall be unable to resume her place in the Union. Indeed, we are solemnly bound by the organic law to "guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." But how? What is the construction of this provision, and what is the extent of the obligation? It is clear that it does not bind the Union in any case to maintain a State government. Such an obligation would be as absurd as it would be impossible of performance.

This clause in the Constitution, by misconstruction, as it seems to me, has led the minds of gentlemen into the strangest and wildest mystification. They argue that as a necessary consequence of its existence, both in law and in fact, a State once organized and admitted into the Union will ever remain a legitimate, organized State; and, therefore, assuming this as a postulate, it is alleged that in theory a State cannot secede. Whether there may be secession in fact is a question of physical power. Should the rebels prevail and establish their independence, such a result would not vindicate the doctrine of secession, but it would be the establishment of secession in fact. Would it not, in that event, be ridiculous to affirm that because, by the Constitution, there is to every State guaranteed a republican form of government, therefore those established independent States were still States of the Union?

For the same reason, it is said that no State can commit suicide; but no sane man believes that a policy of life assurance will secure immortality to the assured.

Now it seems to me that the principles applicable to the questions of secession, State suicide, and abrogation of State constitutions and State governments are simple and easily illustrated. No State can, without consent, legally withdraw from the Union; therefore there can be no legal secession. No State can release her territory and people from the claims and injunctions of the Federal Constitution until she shall have established her independence by force of arms; so in that sense no State is out of the Union. When a State, by the consent and active participation of her officers and people, has repudiated and foresworn the Federal authority and joined an antagonistic confederacy, she is no longer a State in the Union; but her territory and people, until she shall have established her enfranchisement, will remain within the jurisdiction of the United States and amenable to Federal authority. If she succeeds, whatever may be the guaranties of the organic law, her whole territory is out of the Union. By the action of the people and the State authorities in making war upon the United States and forming a foreign alliance, the State, or the government, if you like the term better, is out of existence. Certainly you do not recognize the rebel authorities, and there is no other in those States; so it follows that there is no government in the seceded district that can be recognized under the Federal Constitution. As here used, I regard the terms State and government as synonymous, because I cannot conceive of a State, in the sense used, as applicable to our political system, without some kind of governmental organization.

Now, I repeat that the Constitution does not guarantee that every State shall maintain a State government. The Federal Government has pledged its faith that no State of the Union shall be forced or even permitted to have a monarchical government, and that it will render all needful aid to enable the people to sustain one republican in form; but if they will not have it you cannot exercise the functions of State government for them. Such is the present condition of the rebellious districts. They had State governments under the Constitution and within the Union, but they tore them into pieces and cast away the fragments. But amid the traitors, surrounded by the ruins of those fallen governments, are true patriots and loyal men. They are citizens of our common country, and entitled to all the benefits guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. They had not votes and arms sufficient to resist the traitors. You have strength to crush out rebellion, but you cannot vote nor elect officers for them. But you can give them temporary government, republican in form, such as is now enjoyed by hundreds of thousands of American citizens without the limits of State organizations; and adopt prompt and efficient measures for an early restoration to their former rights and privileges. Such, I understand, is the purpose of the bill.

The resolution was referred to a special committee, a majority of whom reported, on April 19, a bill with the following provisions:

1. Appointment of provisional governors for the seceded States by the President with the consent of the Senate.
2. When insurrection in any of the States has been suppressed the provisional governor shall enroll its white male citizens, and, when the number of those who take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government amounts to one-tenth of the whole, he shall call a convention of these to establish a State government.
3. The number of delegates to this convention shall be that of the last constitutional State legislature, appointed by the provisional governor among the counties. The provisional governor shall fix and control the election to the convention and preside over its deliberations.
4. No person who has held office (civil or military) under the rebel usurpation, or has borne arms against the Federal Government, shall vote for a delegate or be elected as one, even though he takes the oath of allegiance.
5. The State government adopted by the convention shall provide: (a) that no one who has held office under the rebel usurpation shall vote for State officers or serve as such; (b) slavery shall be forever prohibited; (c) no debt, State or Confederate, which has been contracted under the usurping power shall be recognized or paid.
6. The new constitution shall be submitted to the vote of the loyal people of the State, and, if it is ratified by them, the State shall be proclaimed by the President, with the assent of Congress, as a State on equal terms with those which had not seceded from the Union.

7. If the convention shall refuse to adopt a constitution on the conditions provided, the provisional governor shall dissolve it, and, when he has reason to believe that another convention will adopt such a constitution, shall call this for the purpose of doing so.
8. Until a permanent State organization has been affected the provisional governor shall execute the Federal laws, and the laws of the State the year before secession, and shall not recognize slavery. To assist him in this the President shall appoint such State officers as are necessary.
9. The taxes collected under the laws of the States shall be applied to the State administration, and any surplus shall be reserved in the Federal treasury to be turned over to the permanent State government when this is organized.
10. All slaves shall be freed, and persons attempting to restrain them of their liberty shall be fined and imprisoned.
11. Every person who shall hereafter hold any office, civil or military, in the rebel service is declared not to be a citizen of the United States.

James C. Allen [Ill.] a member of the committee, spoke against the bill. He said that the method proposed was an innovation in our political system and that the powers conferred were unconstitutional, being in derogation of the rights of the States and of the people.

If the States were out of the Union, he asked, when did they get out, and how did they become foreign States?

By resisting the authority of the United States with force? Surely not. They could not thus cut asunder the ligaments that bound them to the Federal Government and release themselves from the obligations and duties which they owed to it, unless this resistance had been carried to a point where the Government had given its consent to a separation, the point at which all revolutions become successful. It will not be contended by the friends of this bill that that point has been reached. Then if they have not thus hewn their way out of the Union to the position of foreign States, how else could they get out? There is but one other way, and that is by their ordinances of secession. If they could go out by act of secession without consent of the Federal Government, then they are foreign States, and their citizens owe obedience and allegiance to another government, and the war we have been waging against them is not a war to vindicate the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws of the Federal Government, but a war of conquest for the subjugation of a foreign people. If they became foreign States by the act of secession, then they had a right to secede. If they had no right under the Constitution and laws to secede, then their ordinances of secession were void, and they are yet States in the Union, and the allegiance and obedience of their citizens are due to the Federal Government, in all that the Federal Government has a right to demand.

But these States were not regarded by the Government as out of the Union. The President and Congress did not so regard them. The people, when they rallied under the call for troops, rallied under a belief that the war was a war to maintain the Union, to vindicate the supremacy of the laws over men and States in rebellion against rightful authority. It is true we treat their citizens, when captured with arms in their hands, as prisoners of war, entitled to the rights that pertain to belligerents under the usages of war; but we do this, not because we regard them as citizens or soldiers of a foreign government, but because humanity and the interest of our own soldiers captured by them require that we should thus treat them.

This bill is based upon the supposition that the time will come when these people will be willing to return to allegiance and duty. But it contains provisions which destroy the equality of these States and curtail the rights of their citizens. I know gentlemen are ready to answer that these people have forfeited the protection which the Constitution gives to the law-abiding citizen and have no right to claim the protection of the Constitution. I answer, they have rendered themselves amenable to the penalties prescribed by the Constitution and laws by their rebellion, and it will remain with the Government to say how far these penalties may be inflicted upon them when again brought within their reach; but you can only inflict penalties on individuals. You cannot, and ought not if you could, to fix the badge of inequality upon the States, for I assume if these States are not entitled to equality of right in the sisterhood of States then they ought not to be in the sisterhood. This is the theory of our Constitution, and has ever been the practice of the Government. No plan for the reorganization of these States will be successful that does not keep this fact in view. Their reorganization on any other basis will be effected only by force, and their people will yield only such obedience to the Government as is exacted by force.

The President's plan, as set forth in his amnesty proclamation of December last, is subject to the same objection. The House will pardon me if for a moment I wander from my argument upon this bill to pay a passing notice to that proclamation, although it may be deemed a work of supererogation to discuss a document of such unlimited pretension that has so soon fallen into such general contempt. In regard to it, I agree with much that was said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis], that it is not worth the paper upon which it is written; that the President possessed no constitutional power to enforce it; that it is a dead letter except in the presence of the army. That it was intended to increase the President's power on the floor of the House and of the Senate, and more particularly in the electoral college, are facts too palpable to be successfully controverted. I need not say that the powers assumed in the proclamation are not only dangerous to civil liberty, but that their exercise is military usurpation. If he can in time of war suspend one portion of the Constitution under the pretext of military necessity, he can suspend the whole instrument, and make his power not only absolute, but perpetual; he can suspend that provision of the Constitution which authorizes the people to elect his successor in November next, and install him into office on the 4th of March following; he can issue his mandate and disperse the two Houses of Congress; he can send his posse into your court-rooms and drive the judges from the bench. All these things he can do if he has power to dictate to a State what its State constitution shall or shall not contain. What power the President possesses, either in peace or in war, he derives from the Constitution. Whatever powers he exercises must be exercised in pursuance of its warrant, and when he steps beyond the power conferred by that instrument he becomes to that extent a usurper.

This bill in some respects is an improvement upon the President's plan of reconstruction. It preserves the geographical boundaries of the States, and would prevent the division of one of these States into two or more States. It also in a subsequent section provides that Congress shall determine when they have sufficiently reformed their State governments as to entitle them to a representation upon this floor and in the Senate. It vindicates, to this extent, the dignity and power of Congress over these questions, but at the same time it is obnoxious to serious objections, some of which are embraced in the President's plan. One of the most prominent is that it carries out a feature in the President's plan which enables one-tenth of the citizens to make constitutions and laws for the government of the other nine-tenths.

The President would have created a sort of order of nobility, the patent whereof he proposed to bestow, not for eminent service to the State or upon the field, or for valuable discoveries, which is usual in governments where these orders are created, but on account of their sycophancy, in taking an oath to support and maintain the President's proclamations as coming within his prerogative and power. This bill proposes to confer the same dignity upon one-tenth, but for a different reason; but it is no less objectionable in principle.

This bill is based upon the idea that these are yet States in the Union with the State governments usurped or overthrown. What, then, is necessary to be done to restore rightful rule within their limits? They have the same constitutions and the same laws they had before the rebellion; they have not been abrogated nor changed; no attempt has been made to change them in any very important particular except in the change of the form of oath which officers of State should take when they are required to take an oath to support the constitution of the Confederacy instead of the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Their constitutions in this respect are not really changed. Having no power to secede, not being out of the Union, the change in this regard is void and has no effect; so with whatever legislation has been had in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, it being the supreme law of the land operating there as elsewhere. What, then, is needed? Not constitution and laws; they have them already. But their offices, executive, ministerial, judicial, and legislative, have been usurped and their functions performed by men who refused to acknowledge their obligations to the Federal Government, and who have been sustained in this refusal by military force. What is needed, then are new incumbents in these offices, men who will acknowledge the authority of the Federal Government and pay respect and obedience to its laws. They require a reform in the administration of their State governments already existing. When this reform is wrought all conflict between the Federal Government and the State governments will cease.

These States do not, nor will they, occupy toward the general Government the relation of Territories. Hence no authority can be found to authorize this legislation in those provisions of the Constitution relating to Territories. Nor will they occupy the relation to the Government that conquered provinces occupy to the government making the conquest. Usually the laws of the conquered are so different, so antagonistic to the laws of the conqueror as to require radical change to adapt them to their new relation. But such is not the case in these States. Their constitutions and their laws are such as have always been recognized by the Federal Government as republican in form and consonant with the principles of our Constitution. Hence the power to enforce upon these people the provisions of this bill must be found in some other provision of that instrument. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] contends that he discovers the power in section four, article four, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

That provision cannot apply to States already having constitutions and laws republican in form.

Now, one who guarantees the performance of a contract is not the one who undertakes to perform its stipulations. So, when Congress is required to guarantee republican forms of government to the States, it requires only that Congress shall see that the States enjoy such a form of government, and protect them in its enjoyment.

Mr. Allen further objected to the bill as anti-republican, because it imposed State governments upon the people of the States without leaving them a really free choice in the matter.

The bill not only undertakes to direct what shall be in their constitutions on certain subjects, but it determines also who shall and who shall not enjoy the elective franchise and be eligible to office. This power not having been conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, belongs exclusively to the State. If any one controverts this position I would refer him to the first article, second section, of the Constitution, where, in providing for the election of Representatives to Congress, we read that "the electors in the several States shall have the qualifications requisite for electors to the most numerous branch of the State legislature," leaving the conclusion irresistible that it is to the State belongs the power of determining this question.

The bill is obnoxious to the further objection that it gives to the President of the United States the power, through his military governors and his provost marshals, to mold the Constitution and laws to suit himself on questions where Congress does not intervene, and between what power Congress exercises, and what the President, through his military, would exercise, the people would have none left. These questions should be left to the people as they are left in other States, without the intervention of Congress or the Executive.

I confess, sir, that in my view it is a very grave offence to resist, by force of arms, the authority of the Government. But is it such an offence as requires Congress, in violation of constitutional right, to step in and take away from the offender the elective franchise? If so, I fear that some, who, in the modern acceptation of the term, are extremely loyal, would suffer from such a law. Some in Massachusetts, in Ohio, and in my own State have been guilty, in times past, of resisting the authorities of the United States in enforcing the Fugitive Slave law.

If the people are not capable of making constitutions and laws for themselves, then our form of free Government is a failure, and let us say so, and take the necessary steps to change it. But do not, under the forms of a republic and under the constitution of a republic, play the dictator. Let us not, under the pretext of giving to the States a republican Government, force upon them one in which the main features of a republic are swallowed up in congressional dictation.

Again, this bill requires that the constitution which the State shall adopt shall contain a provision "that no debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power shall be recognized or paid by the State." That is also a question that ought to be left to the State to determine. There were many men in those States when the rebellion first broke out who had their property taken by the usurping State authorities under a promise to pay for it, men who were then, and are yet, true to the Union, but who were left without any protection from the Federal Government, who were left to the mercy of the usurping power; and for Congress to compel the State to repudiate such an obligation and leave one whom the Government did not, and could not, protect to beggary and want would, in my judgment, be to commit an injustice for which there can be no excuse. Let the State, in the exercise of a wise discretion, determine what ought to be paid and what ought to be rejected. The burden of such payments will fall upon the people of the States if they see fit to assume them. Let us not in a mere wanton exercise of power do that which will appear unjust in the eyes of the world. We can trust them on that question if we can trust them with the management of a State government.

But there is another provision by which Congress assumes to exercise a power which does not belong to it. I allude to the provision which requires these State to incorporate into their constitutions a clause prohibiting involuntary servitude. There are three provisions in this section that Congress declares shall be in their State constitutions; provisions over which the people of the State to be affected by them are to have no control; questions reserved to the States by the Constitution; questions which Congress cannot determine for them without exceeding its authority, and without violating the principles of republican government.

The bill contains other provisions not within the power of Congress. One abolishes slavery in these States as far as an act of Congress can abolish it. It not only abolishes it, but it takes away from the courts, as far as an act of Congress can take away, the power of passing upon the right of Congress to abolish it. It declares that, if any one declared free by this act shall be held under pretence of claim to service or labor, the courts, upon habeas corpus, shall discharge such a one.

Another provision attempts to give legal effect to the President's proclamation by prescribing the punishment of those who shall attempt to restrain the liberty of any one declared free by that proclamation.

In these two sections, as well as in section seven, the advocates of this bill "overleap" all constitutional barriers and press on to the accomplishment of their purposes, in contempt of the rights of the States and of the people, sowing broadcast, as they go, the seeds of distrust and revolution, fulfilling the prediction that when they obtained the power they would trample under foot and dishonor the Constitution. If this House have determined to pass this bill, I have no reason to suppose that anything I can say will be heard; since to its advocates the freedom of what slaves are left is of more moment than the Constitution, which secures the civil liberty of our own race.

But gentlemen say we must bury slavery out of our sight. If the people desire it buried let it be done, but let its funeral be conducted according to the covenants of the Constitution. Let us not break the faith pledged by the fathers. Let us not forget that by a faithful and strict compliance with our obligations in giving to each State and each individual that which belongs to them, under the Constitution, we vindicate the law and increase our own security, and that by violating its provisions we ourselves become revolutionists.

Let us not, in our effort to destroy slavery if it be alive or to bury it if it be dead, destroy the fundamental law of our Government, and leave our own race a prey to anarchy or despotism. Some one suggested that when slavery was buried upon its tombstone should be written, "Slavery—died of the rebellion." I warn gentlemen to beware, lest beside the grave of slavery be found another grave and another tombstone, whereon history will write, "Civil liberty—died of revolution."

Nathaniel B. Smithers [Del.], a member of the committee, supported the bill.

In a nation allegiance and protection are correlative. Therefore the loyal people of a seceded State are the repositories of its power and unorganized sovereignty. Providing the preliminary arrangements for reorganization must of necessity begin de novo with the rude elements of an unformed political society, the first step in the formation of a government based upon the will of the people is to determine of what persons that people shall be deemed to consist. By the terms of the bill all white male citizens are to be enrolled; but inasmuch as rebels are citizens of the United States, though arrayed against its authority, a test must necessarily be applied to ascertain who, being loyal, are entitled to participate in framing the organic law. The bill does not regard any right as pertaining to those adhering to the rebellion. They are excluded from all share in the Government formed under its auspices. The test proposed is an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. The persons thus taking the oath must constitute a majority of those who are enrolled. These persons so enrolled and testifying to their loyalty are deemed to constitute the people. By their assent the machinery of government is to be set in motion. On their consent the Constitution to be ordained is to rest, not only in the origin of the convention, but in its ratification by their express will.

How, then, can it be pretended that the Government is not based upon the consent of the governed? Is it because persons are excluded who refuse to qualify themselves by taking the oath of allegiance? Surely it can be no deprivation of any political right to declare that he who renounces obedience to the Government shall not have the privilege to determine concerning the form of State government to be established.

I deny that a rebel has any political rights. I deny that in any legitimate sense he is or ought to be held as one of the people authorized to form or administer government. That he is not recognized by this bill as entitled to citizenship is the result of his own refusal to acknowledge allegiance to the United States.

But it may also be alleged, Mr. Speaker, that the bill is objectionable because it provides that a number less than a majority of those who were formerly citizens of the State may ordain the constitution.

If this comprises all the loyal people it is difficult to discover on what principle it can be denounced as anti-republican. If they are satisfied with the law of restoration, in accordance with the act of Congress, who has the right to complain? By their own volition they accept the terms of reorganization, and it ill behooves those not subject to the laws which they enact for their own government to deny them the privilege of entering into the administration of their own domestic affairs.

The proportion to be established by the bill is a matter for consideration; not with the view of avoiding the charge of a violation of the principle of republican government, but of ascertaining whether there is a body capable of self-rule and of maintaining civil administration in the State.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are also met with the objection that this bill, by the provision of emancipation, interferes with the rights of the several States within its purview to regulate their domestic institutions. This is no novel suggestion. It is as old as the struggle for the adoption of the Constitution. It constituted a material portion of the argument of those who arrayed themselves against the formation of the National Government. From that time until now it has been constantly thrust forward in every discussion involving the right of Congress to adopt measures requisite for the national advantage. Do we propose to exercise the power of regulating the currency? We are met by the dogma of State rights, enlisted in the interest of local banks. Do we endeavor to exert our authority to regulate commerce? We are confronted with the same phantom of State rights, pressed into the service of some municipal corporation. Do we determine to save the Government, reeling beneath the blows of a formidable rebellion organized and operated by the instrumentality of African slavery? We dare not accomplish its suppression and prevent the contingency of future insurrections for fear we shall invade the hallowed precincts of State rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that there was an end to this delusion. The danger to this people is not from centralization, but disintegration. If indeed there were such antagonism between the two systems of government [national and State] that one or the other must perish, it would be for the people to judge which should be sacrificed: whether that which renders us great and powerful and prosperous should give way to the maintenance of petty municipalities that could secure neither respect abroad nor concord at home. Should the dread alternative be presented, I mistake the temper of the people, and their estimation of the solid and substantial benefits of the Union, if they would not choose a consolidated and centralized Government rather than underlie the calamities incident to individual States or miserable confederacies, the inevitable prey of intestine strife and foreign domination.

On April 29 Thomas Williams [Pa.] spoke in favor of Congress reconstructing the governments of the seceded States as if they were Territories, and against military reconstruction by executive power.

These States are either in the Union, or they are not. Some people may think it makes no practical difference how we conclude on this point while the war is flagrant. That is not my judgment. It has seemed to me that all the irresolution, all the unsteadiness in our counsels, all the doubt and hesitation and delay, all the apparent obtuseness and obliquity of the moral sense, and many of the differences between good and loyal men here, were mainly referable to the fact of the failure to settle this great question, and settle it correctly, in advance. The war was inaugurated on the theory that they were in, when the great fact of war, which individuals cannot wage in the social state, and peoples do not wage upon themselves, was a proclamation that they were out. The Democrats of the North were willing to accept the fact that they were out, without war—to adopt the principle of the laissez-nous faire—the "let us alone" of the rebel authorities, and to treat with them upon the idea of a reconstruction, upon that kind of compromise which involves generally a traffic in principles, and that sort of mutuality where all is demand on the one side and concession on the other. They were willing to waive the right and the treason absolutely, and declined the alternative of war on the ground that the obligation was an imperfect one, whose performance depended upon the mere will of the contracting parties, and could not be enforced. With them it was peaceful secession, with reconstruction by treaty. The ruling thought was, of course, to spare, to save, to do as little harm as possible to those who were not our enemies, but our brethren—sisters, perhaps, I should say, albeit a little "wayward," whose anger was to be kissed away. The rebels were Democrats, whom it would be a sin to kill, and a greater sin to rob of their sacred property in slaves. Better a hundred thousand free white Northern youth should die than one negro slave should be lost to his proprietor, or employed in arms against him. To carry out this policy we wanted conservative generals who would be sure to hurt nobody, and saw men made heroes—by newspaper process, as great men are now made since that manufacture seems to have passed out of the hands of Providence—not because they fought, and fought successfully, but because they would not fight at all.

But the light which was struck out from the collision of hostile bayonets, struggling up through the haze in which we were enveloped, began to dawn slowly upon the country. It was soon reflected back upon these Chambers, and statesmen began to feel that they were in the presence of a great fact that could not be conjured down by empiricism, or reasoned down except by the logic of artillery.

And now let us inquire for a moment how the public law of Christendom, as declared in the opinions of the publicists, and the practice of enlightened nations, squares with the present proposal.

It will be found, I think, that the most eminent of these writers are agreed in the opinion that the parties to a civil war, having no common judge, or common superior on earth, "must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies," and that "when a nation becomes divided into two parties absolutely independent, and no longer acknowledging a common superior, the State is dissolved, and the war between the two parties stands on the same ground, in every respect, as a public war between two different nations." This is the language of Vattel (pp. 425, 427), and the learned Barbeyrac, in his notes on the treatise of Grotius, (Book 3, cap. 6, sec. 27), affirms the same doctrine.

It is in direct antagonism therefore to the law which governs now, as to the facts, to say that these States are still in the Union as they were before. The theory that this Union was indissoluble refers only to the right, to its organic law, and to the purposes of the men who welded these States together; but never was intended to imply that it could not be ruptured by violence, as it has unquestionably been, leaving to the wronged and adhering States their remedy for the breach, not by enforcing a specific performance, which is impossible, but by the recovery of the territory which is ours by the contract, and the expulsion of the delinquents, with the forfeiture of all their rights in and under the Union, from which they have withdrawn.

To say with a gentleman from Kentucky [William H. Wadsworth] that this is an admission of the right to secede is to confound the fact, which is one thing, with the right, which is another. To assert with the gentleman from Missouri [Francis P. Blair, Jr.] that this is a concession of their independence, which would authorize their recognition by foreign powers, is to forget that we have rights which no violation of the contract by the other party can destroy. It would be just as sensible to insist that a judgment of outlawry was a release of the traitor from his allegiance, and authorized the government to which he fled to espouse his quarrel and adopt him as its citizen.

Upon this question of the forfeiture of political rights some further light may be borrowed from the practice of nations in the application of the jus postliminii, which refers, according to Grotius and Bynkershoek, as well to cases of territorial recapture where a whole community is involved as to those where the goods of a subject once seized as prize of war are afterward retaken from the hands of the captors. Here it will be found that even the provinces of a confederation which have been wrested from it by an enemy have not always been reinstated in their original privilege, as reason would seem to adjudge that they ought to be.

The speaker here instanced refusals of the States General of Holland to readmit into the Union provinces which had been wrested therefrom by the Spaniards and reorganized by the Dutch.

These, however, were cases of seizure and occupation by an enemy; ours, of a voluntary abdication of Federal rights and an organized resistance by governmental action to the Federal law. There is no case here, therefore, for the application of the law of postliminy. Some of these States, on the contrary, constructed out of Territories purchased by this Government, were lifted from the posture of subject and dependent provinces upon the platform of the Union, on the condition of obedience to its laws, and by their voluntary abdication of the privileges so conferred have, as it seems to me, by an inevitable logic, lapsed back again into the territorial condition. Where they have been recaptured the local governors have fled, the local organizations have been dissolved, and their territories are now under military occupation by the armies of the Union, or under provisional governors appointed by the Executive. This fact alone, as it seems to me, involves the admission that they are no longer in the Union. If they are, that occupation is unlawful. If their governments are dissolved, however, they must, of course, be reconstructed under the auspices of the conquering power, and that not by the Executive, but by the legislature of the Union, whose sword he bears, and which only, consistently with the genius of our institutions, the past practice of the Government, and the letter as well as spirit of the Constitution, can venture to determine what use shall be made of the territories conquered by it, and when and upon what terms they shall be readmitted into full communion as members of this Government. It is not certainly the military power that is to reorganize, and modify, and breathe new life into their defunct constitutions. Until the end of subjugation is achieved and the resistance entirely overcome, so as to give place safely to the reëstablishment of the civil authority, a military occupation is indispensable, of course. When that period arrives the sword must be sheathed, and the Territory return to the direction of the law-making power, which will prescribe the rule for its government, and allow to its people the privilege of reorganizing under republican forms. I call it Territory and invoke the law that governs there, because I know of no intermediate condition. To permit any executive officer to declare its law, and set it in motion, and place it under the control of a minority—a mere tithe of its citizens—with power to send delegates to Congress with representation unimpaired and unaffected—even though he should reënact a part of its abrogated constitution—would be, as I think, a monstrous anomaly, a violation of fundamental principles, and a precedent fraught with great danger to republican liberty. Here is the dilemma. To come back into the Union a State must either be born anew or come back with all its right unimpaired, except those material ones which have been destroyed in the progress of the war. There is, I think, no middle ground, as there is no power either here or elsewhere to prescribe terms which shall abridge the rights or privileges of a State that has not been out of the Union, or returns to it in virtue of its original title.

When I suggest, however, that these States are out, it is with this important qualification, that they are out in point of fact, with a forfeiture of all their franchises as members thereof, whenever the issue of battle shall have been decided against them; but subjects of it still—members, if you choose—in legal contemplation, so far as regards their obligations and duties under the Constitution, and our right to visit them with punishmen for the delinquency, proportioned to the magnitude of their offence. They are in for correction, but not for heirship; just like the unnatural child who has attempted the crime of parricide, and only succeeded in dyeing his murderous hands in the blood of his loyal brethren. It is bad logic to infer that because they are out without our consent, and have forfeited their rights thereby, that fact must be attended with a like forfeiture of our own. Nor would I, as already intimated, be understood as admitting that they are out as to foreign powers, who must respect our title, although our possession may be ousted, and treat the contest in all respects as a domestic one. No American of the right spirit would allow even a question of this sort to enter into our diplomatic correspondence with foreign powers, or consent to compromise our dignity and self-respect, which are at last the best security of nations, by uncovering the maternal bosom to the rude and insulting gaze of the stranger, and inviting his interference, either by misrepresenting the aims of our loyal citizens, or beseechingly deprecating his displeasure. I trust that our just pride as a people will not be again wounded by the production of another book like the diplomatic confessions of 1862.

It is suggested, however, by a gentleman from New York, on the other side of the House [Fernando Wood] that while we on this side are claiming to be for the Union, the enunciation of these doctrines by my able colleague [Thaddeus Stevens] amounts to a declaration that we are no longer a Union party. The meaning of this, if it means anything, is, that because the rebel States are out, without any agency of ours, but with a large share of the responsibility on the heads of those who, like the gentleman himself, encouraged the defection by their servility or by the assurance that they were opposed to coercion—as they oppose it now—and taught them to believe that they could go out with perfect impunity, and that New York and Pennsylvania would go out along with them—the mere statement of the fact that they were out is evidence that the party of the Administration on this floor is not in favor of the preservation of the Union! Well, we are in favor, at all events, of preserving all that is left of it, and intend, with the blessing of God, to win back the residue, and pass it through the fire until it shall come out purged of the malignant element that has unfitted it for freedom. But what does the honorable gentleman himself, what do those who vote with him really think on this subject? Does he, do they believe that the rebel States are not out? If he does not look upon them as a new and independent power in the commonwealth of nations why does he propose to treat with them, not with the revolting States singly, but with "the authorities at Richmond"? How is it that in his own resolution he proposes, in totidem verbis, the "offer to the insurgents of an opportunity to return to the Union"? Who are the "authorities at Richmond"? Will he inform us whether they are a people known to our Constitution, or how these States are to return to the Union if they were never out of it? He stands, self-condemned by his own logic, as no Union man. I will allow him, however, the advantage of the admission that it is but a slipshod logic that cannot distinguish between the law and the fact. But that is true of himself and his party which he unjustly charges upon my colleague. The difference is just this, that, although the rebels have spurned and spit upon their Northern auxiliaries, rejected all their overtures, and declared that they will no longer associate with them upon any terms, and are not willing that they should even come "betwixt the wind and their nobility," he wishes to treat for the privilege of serving them, while we propose to fight for the purpose of chastising them into submission. This may be the result only of a difference of taste; but all history attests that there always are, as there always will be, men who love to wear the livery of a master, and are uncomfortable without it; who regard the collar as a badge of distinction, and would, at all events, rather carry it than quarrel with it. No wonder, therefore, at the opinion so often expressed by men of this sort in relation to the black man, that he would neither run away, nor bear arms against his master or anybody else. They did him injustice in supposing that he was like themselves. Pompey, who was an involuntary slave, is tending toward the north star with a musket in his hand, while his whole non-combatant substitute, a voluntary slave, is rushing southward with the olive-branch in his hand, into the patriarchal arms.

The objection rests, however, as I suppose, upon the remark that our right to deal with the rebel States after they shall have been reduced to submission by force of arms is not a question under the Constitution, but outside of it. I desire to say, once for all, that I do not concur in this opinion, because I find the war power in the Constitution with all its incidental consequences. If it is not there, the case is without remedy.

The doctrine of my colleague [Mr. Stevens], that these States are out of the Union, may seem at first blush extreme, but it is none the less palatable to me on that account. War is a radical disease, and radical diseases are to be treated only by radical means. One earnest and decided man is worth, in times like these, a regiment of temporizers. Timid counsels have ruined many a state; they have never saved one, and never will. It may be a paradox, but if conservatism has ever operated to save a nation in such a crisis as ours, it has only been, as here, by acting as the dead-weight upon the plowshare, which has retarded its progress, but made it run so deep into the virgin soil as to make its work a radical one.

If these States are in the Union, with all their rights and privileges unimpaired, they may return to-morrow, even without submission, after being conquered in the field, to conquer their conquerors in the councils of the nation. The most accomplished of the Roman poets remarks that "conquered Greece subdued her barbarian conqueror, and introduced the arts into unpolished Latium." The contrary will be the case here. The barbarian will come back into your halls. The Northern Democrat will rush into his arms. The two elements, like kindred drops, by an attraction a good deal stronger than that of miscegenation, will melt incontinently into one. The old bargain will be renewed—"Give us the spoils, and you may take the honors and the power." The proclamation of freedom will be revoked; your acts of Congress repealed; your debt repudiated unless you will assume theirs; and yourselves, perhaps, ejected from these halls. And the effect will be that, for all your great expenditures and all your bloody sacrifices, you will have won back, not peace, but a master—the "old master," in negro phraseology—who governed you before—as turbulent, as vindictive, and as ferocious as ever.

Bring them back, and you cannot even bind them by gratitude, or purge them by oaths, of which they make no account, as the whole history of the rebellion, which began in perjury, abundantly shows—which are like the ribbons that were insultingly stretched by the Parisian mob in front of the Tuileries to protect the ill-fated king and queen of France—and which grave Senators have so recently denied your power to prescribe. The President has dealt kindly with the neutrals. Has he propitiated any of them? Our predecessors here have followed the example. Look at the facts attending our organization, and say whether even confidence and charity are followed by either gratitude or loyalty. No, you must throw the dissevered fragments, the "disjecta membra" of this great Government, into a caldron, with a hot fire beneath, and you may evaporate the virus, but not otherwise.

Taking them, however, to be out, or that the case has passed from under the municipal into the domain of public law, what is the authority which that law gives us over the rights and property of an enemy?

On this point Bynkershoek says that "if we take for our guide nature, that great teacher of the law of nations, we shall find that anything is lawful against an enemy" (p. 2); and, further, that a nation that has injured another is considered, with everything that belongs to it, as being confiscated to the nation that receives the injury (p. 4); and also that, "if we follow the strict law of war, even immovables may be sold and their proceeds lodged in the public treasury, as is done with movables, though throughout almost all Europe immovables are only registered, that the treasury may receive during the war their rents and profits, and, at the termination of the war, the immovables themselves are by treaty restored to their former owners." The same doctrine is laid down by Wildmon (Vol. 2, p. 9); and in the case of Brown vs. The United States (8 Cranch, 110), the broad principle was assumed that war gave the sovereign full right to take the property of the enemy wherever found, and that the mitigations of this rigid rule, which the wise and humane policy of modern times has brought into practice, may more or less affect the exercise of the right, but cannot impair the right itself. By the law of nature and of nations the treatment of the conquered depends on the particular circumstances of the case; everything is lawful; everything belonging to the offending party is confiscated; the practice of nations has authorized the forfeiture even of the real estate of individuals; the conqueror may lay burdens on the conquered, not only by way of compensation, but of punishment; he may deprive them of their rights, and owes them no more than what humanity and equity require; he may indemnify himself for the expense and damages he has sustained; he may render them incapable of further mischief. Indemnity, security, and punishment are all, therefore, means of self-defence which may be legitimately used.

I think I may safely say that human history presents no parallel to this rebellion. Since the revolt of the rebel angels there has been no example of an insurrection so wanton, so wicked, so utterly causeless, and so indescribably ferocious and demoniac as the present. It was a rebellion against the majority rule for the purpose not of reforming, but of overthrowing the Government, and erecting upon its ruins another of an oligarchic cast, whose corner-stone was property in man. It was the product of a system which threw all the lands of the South into the hands of a few men. It involved an act of aggravated treason against a humane, paternal, and unoffending Government. It has been conducted with a degree of inhumanity that has no example except in barbarian wars. It has involved to us an enormous expenditure of money and of blood. Its suppression has become impossible without removing the cause of strife, and disabling our enemy by liberating his slaves, and arming them against him. It cannot be repaired. There is no reparation possible that would be commensurate with the injury. Can you breathe new life into the bones that ornament the necks and fingers of Southern dames, or bleach unburied, without even the humble privilege of a grave, on Southern battlefields? Can you reclothe them with the comely vesture that has been given to the vultures of the Southern skies? Who shall restore the shattered limb; who fill the vacant chair at the family fireside; who give back the husband and the father, or dry the tears of the widow and the orphan? What trump, but that of the dread archangel, who gathers the tribes of the earth for the last solemn judgment, shall awaken the gallant dead who sleep in bloody garments, in their beds of glory, from their deep repose? Mock not the grief that is unutterable by the suggestion of indemnity or reparation! "Give me back my legions!" was the passionate exclamation of the Roman Augustus, when a swift messenger brought to him the tidings of the slaughter of Varus and his brave companions in the forests of Germany. "Give me back my children!" is the wailing cry that will burst from the bosom of the Northern mother, who weeps like Rachel for her first-born—or mock me not with the idea of reparation. There is no reparation for it, as there can be no punishment, except in the divestiture of the rights and the seizure of the estates of the guilty leaders. There is no security except in the distribution of the latter, and the complete exorcism of the hell-born and hell-deserving spirit that has wrought all this world-wide ruin.

Gentlemen object that to seize the inheritance would be to visit the sins of the guilty upon the innocent. They plead for the wife whose counsels have driven the husband into rebellion. They weep crocodile tears for the offspring who have been taught to spit upon the flag of their country. The widow and the children of those, however, who have fallen in the effort to suppress this unholy rebellion have no share in their sympathies. The chances of war may strip them of their inheritance, but that makes no difference with them. They take no account of the fact that nature and Providence have alike decreed that the sins of the fathers, and even their misfortunes, shall be visited upon their children, and that the law which authorizes the sale of the estate for the debts of the former has everywhere affirmed its justice. The felon-brood may run its plowshare over the bones of the loyal martyr, while his children are perhaps eating the bread of charity in their Northern homes, and it is all right, because the former are the salt of the earth, and a just punishment would only exasperate them into a new rebellion. Let them rebel. A just poverty will render their efforts harmless, and, by teaching them the value and respectability of labor, make them only wiser and better men. With my consent they shall never trample upon the relics of a Northern soldier. I would carve out inheritances for his children upon the soil that his sword has ransomed, and his blood baptized and fertilized. God's justice demands it, and the heart and conscience of the American people will say Amen.

M. Russell Thayer [Pa.] spoke less vindictively than his colleague. He demanded the reconstruction of the seceded States: (1) guaranties of "unconditional and perpetual loyalty to the Government and subordination to its power"; (2) extirpation forever of slavery; and (3) compulsory repudiation of the rebel debt.

I for one am willing to extend to the people of those States, upon their returning to their allegiance, every benefit and of restoring to them every right which is consistent with the permanent reëstablishment of the authority of the United States. It is our duty to make the path to this object as easy as possible. Any such path, containing the necessary conditions for this purpose, will to most of them appear at first rugged and humiliating. This is the necessary result of their failure to overthrow the Government of the United States. It is necessary to guard the elective franchise and the privilege of holding office in those States against the intrusion and treachery of all who have in any sense been leaders in the present rebellion. For this purpose prudence requires that all who have held office under the pretended rebel government should be excluded from these privileges. It does not, however, appear to me to be necessary to exclude all who have held office under the State governments. The chief officers of those governments, such as governors and other high officers, all of whom have been chief actors in the rebellion and have promoted it by every means in their power, should be excluded; but I do not believe that either necessity or sound policy requires the exclusion of the large number of ministerial subordinates who have participated in the administration of local affairs, who have not been leaders of the rebellion, and who are willing to return to their allegiance to the United States.

To all other classes of the free male white population of these States I would confidently surrender the privileges of the elective franchise and the same rights of citizenship which we ourselves enjoy, upon their laying down their arms and returning to their true allegiance. Nothing, I believe, could be further from the wishes of the people of the United States than to deprive the masses of the Southern people, who are willing to return to their allegiance to the Government of their fathers, of one solitary right which they themselves enjoy.

The compulsory repudiation of the rebel debt is a just and merited punishment to be inflicted upon those who have lent substantial aid to the rebellion; and it has the further merit that it reaches with its retributive justice those foreign speculators in our sufferings who, at a safe distance, have wickedly connived at, encouraged, and aided in the attempt to break in pieces our nationality, and to destroy our free institutions. I would not, however, in doing this, unsettle any State debt which may have been contracted for the purpose only of carrying on the civil affairs of the State, and which had not for its object the prosecution of the war or the strengthening of the pretended confederacy.

That slavery must, as a necessary consequence of this war, forever disappear from the American Republic I believe to be a conclusion long since reached by a large majority of the loyal people of the United States. So far as relates to the border States, which have nobly stood by their allegiance to the National Government, I am not in favor of any interference with it, because under our present Constitution we have no such right of interference, and honor and duty alike require that we should refrain from such interference. I am in favor of leaving to the people of those States the entire control and management of this question. I fully believe that they will find it for their interest and welfare at no great distance of time to make their institutions in this respect correspond with those of the free States. The recent action of the people of Maryland upon this subject, by which, on the 6th day of April, they declared themselves by a large majority in favor of immediate emancipation, and thus forever destroyed the political significance of Mason and Dixon's line, gives assurance, I believe, of what will be the ultimate action of the people of all the border States in reference to this matter.

Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] upheld his theory that the seceded States were de facto out of the Union, and replied to those (especially Francis P. Blair, Jr.) who had denounced him as a "secessionist."

Gentlemen deny that the rebel States, so far as they are concerned, are out of the Union. It follows that, being in the Union, they have all the rights of other States. If they have such rights and should come here at the next presidential election and claim them, where does such doctrine lead you to? It leads you into subjection to traitors and their Northern allies. If they are in the Union, where are their representatives on this floor? Every one of the United States is entitled to have members here and Senators in the other branch. Where are these evidences of existing States? They are at Richmond, where the Congress of the Union does not sit.

But it is said that the Constitution does not allow them to go out of the Union. That is true, and in going out they committed a crime for which we are now punishing them with fire and sword. What are we making war upon them for? For seceding, for going out of the Union against law. The law forbids a man to rob or murder, and yet robbery and murder exist de facto but not de jure.

The gentleman from Missouri says that those who declare the States outlawed to the Union preach the doctrine of secession as much as Jeff. Davis. Does the man who declares that murder or larceny exists give countenance to those felonies? The one is as reasonable a deduction as the other. If the fiction sometimes used in courts of equity that whatever ought to be shall be considered as existing be true in fact, then the rebel States are in the Union. If the naked facts palpable to every eye, attested by many a bloody battlefield, and recorded by every day's hostile legislation both in Washington and Richmond, are to prevail, then the rebellious States are no more in the Union, in fact, than the loyal States are in the Confederate States. Nor should they ever be treated so until they repent and are rebaptized into the National Union.

The gentleman from Missouri, fatally bent on mischief, anxious to distract and destroy the Republican party, and to alienate the President from his true friends, that he and his household may reign supreme, speaks of our attempts to sacrifice the whites to the blacks, to introduce amalgamation of the races, and to create negro equality. When the gentleman thus accuses the Republican party he knows that he utters a foul and malignant libel. The Republican party never held such doctrines, never uttered such a wish. I rejoice that in the vote which was taken soon after his speech not a man was found with him who ever belonged to the Republican party. He only was found voting with the hereditary enemies of the Administration. That was right. "He went to his place."

The gentleman speaks of my remarks as an "entanglement of contradiction" and " a catalogue of inconsistencies." As this touches only my capacity for argument, I take no offence at it. The gentleman cannot think more humbly of my abilities than I do myself. When he comes to speak of motives, however, it is a different thing. To show the temper which animated him I will give a few extracts from his carefully prepared speech. He says:

"No gentleman, either North or South, ever asserted the secession cause so boldly in the forum as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It looks like an attempt to play into the hands of some rival candidate for the presidency, who would array a party against the President to drive him to surrender his convictions and break his oath to support the Constitution. I am apprehensive that the gentleman is anxious to saddle the President with the odium of doctrines which are known to be those of rival aspirants for the presidency."

The gentleman says that the Republicans do not agree with the President on the question of colonization; that he is for the segregation of the races, while we are for leaving them on the soil to cultivate it for wages. In that he is probably correct. There is a difference of opinion among the friends of freedom on that question. But that does not imply hostility to each other. It is a question on which men may honestly differ. I have never favored colonization except as a means of introducing civilization into Africa. Its effect upon slavery was injurious. It was a salve to the consciences of slaveholders and their advocates. As a means of removing the Africans from the country it was puerile. All the revenue of the United States would not pay for the transportation of one half their annual increase. The scheme of colonizing them in South America (which, I believe, was the gentleman's plan) was a very shallow vision. They were averse to removing from their native land; their forcible expatriation would be as atrocious a crime as stealing them in Africa and reducing them to bondage. Five hundred were lately seduced to go to an island near St. Domingo. Such as have not died in six months have been brought back at our expense. I hope this will be the last of the unwise and cruel schemes of colonization which were fostered and procured by the gentleman's advice.

As to rival candidates for the presidency I know of none such. I do not believe that the present discreet Executive has made any movement or expressed any wish for reëlection. I think the same of all the members of the Cabinet. I suppose that no man, whether in or out of the Cabinet, would oppose his wish to the will of the people if they should call upon him to serve. But his appetite for office must be morbid who would covet the presidential chair in these troublesome times unless he believed he could render essential service to the nation.

The charge that these principles are invented to serve a presidential candidate is absurd. I held and promulgated precisely the same doctrine in 1861 when there was no thought of the presidential election. I believe now among the people there is entire unanimity. Every man, except the friends of the great Cunctator [Gen. McClellan], believes Mr. Lincoln to be an honest and patriotic man, and, so far as I have observed, looks to him to end this rebellion and extirpate slavery. I do not believe he is in any danger of becoming unpopular through his own acts; nor do I believe that even the constant boast by the gentleman from Missouri and his kindred that they are the especial friends and organs of the President can sink him. If that cannot, certainly nothing else can.

Francis Kernan [Dem.], of New York, spoke against the bill.

By the provisions of the bill, although the one-tenth or one-half or all the citizens of one of these States shall cease all resistance, submit to the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and take the oath of allegiance required, they are not permitted to resume the administration of their State government under its old constitution, or to be represented in the Federal Government, or to frame a new constitution for their State, in accordance with that of the United States, unless they incorporate in that new constitution certain provisions which by this bill we dictate to them, and which relate to matters within the exclusive authority of the people of the State.

James M. Ashley [O.].—I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that so far as the House committee are concerned they have determined to make the same requirements apply to all States alike hereafter to be admitted. Colorado, Nebraska, and Nevada are all required to comply with these same conditions.

MR. KERNAN.—The admission of a State formed out of territory belonging to the United States is not a parallel case. The States to which the bill under consideration is to apply are existing States; the bill recognizes them as such. They are not to be readmitted to the Union; they are now in law a part of the Union. We are carrying on this war to enforce the authority of the Constitution and laws over them. When resistance ceases, when the usurped authority of those in rebellion in these States is overthrown, the constitution and laws of the State which existed when the rebellion arose will be again in force and vigor, and should be administered by those citizens of the State who never joined in the rebellion, and those who by amnesty are relieved from the penalties of treason.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this bill is in violation and subversive of the fundamental principles upon which both our national and State Governments are founded.

The powers granted to the Government of the United States by the Constitution were confined to national purposes and objects. As to these powers it is sovereign and supreme, and rightfully commands and can compel the obedience of every citizen of every State. But it has no right to interfere with the people of any State in the formation or administration of their State government. Congress has no right to dictate to a State what shall be the provisions of its State constitution. When Congress does so, and the Federal Government attempts to compel the people of the States to submit to its decrees in this respect, a revolution is attempted in the Government as it was established under the Constitution. The sole power granted to the national in reference to State governments is contained in the clause by which each State is to be guaranteed a republican form of government. Subject to this provision, or condition, the right of the people of each State to retain the old or form a new State constitution and government is absolute.

If Congress may impose upon the people of a State the conditions prescribed by this bill as conditions precedent to the exercise of their right to maintain, form, or administer a State government, we may require them to ordain as a part of a State constitution almost any other provision. Congress has no such power. The Constitution of the United States is based upon pre-existing State governments which the people of the respective States may maintain or change at pleasure, being only bound to have them republican in character, subject to the Constitution and within the Union. This bill is in direct conflict with and subversive of all these principles and rights. It prohibits the loyal citizens of a State in which the rebellion has existed from administering their State government under and in subordination to the United States Constitution and laws after the rebellion has been suppressed and all disloyal men expelled from the exercise of their usurped power. It prohibits the loyal citizens of the State from reorganizing their State government by the adoption of a new State constitution and electing their State officers, except and unless they will incorporate in such constitution provisions not required by the Federal Constitution, and which are prescribed by a majority of the people of other States acting through their Representatives in Congress. Until they will do this, no matter how loyal to the Union the majority or all of them may have become, they are to be governed and controlled as to all their State affairs by arbitrary military power responsible only to the President of the United States. Nay, until they will comply with the conditions we prescribe they are not to be allowed Representatives in the Congress of the United States. They are as absolutely the subjects of despotic power as were the inhabitants of the Roman provinces who were plundered and tyrannized over by military governors like Verres. And yet this bill is called one "to guarantee to the people of these States a republican form of government!!"

I have supposed we were striving to maintain our old governments, national and State, in all their beautiful harmony, and with all their nicely balanced powers and wisely constructed checks; that this was war prosecuted to preserve these, and secure the blessings they did in the past, and will in the future, confer upon us as a people. But if this bill passes and is put in force, we will have destroyed the system of government transmitted to us, and commenced the construction of a consolidated National Government which will soon extinguish the States and, I fear, the essential liberties of their people. How long, think you, will the people of the Northern States bear patiently the burdens and sacrifices of this destructive war for the accomplishment of such a purpose?

When rebellious citizens have usurped the administration of the State government, turned its powers against the Federal Government and compelled the minority of the people to submit to their usurpation, the duty and the sole authority of the United States is to overthrow the power of the usurpers and restore the loyal people, or the people who, under promise of amnesty, submit to the identical State government the protection and administration of which they were deprived for a time by the insurrection or rebellion. But the United States has no authority or right, when the rebellion is suppressed and all illegal resistance overcome, to say, as we do by this bill, to the loyal people of the State, We will not restore or guarantee to you the republican State government which you had established rightfully, and which existed when the usurpers deprived you of its administration, but we will compel you to form another according to our dictation; and if, as freemen, knowing your rights, you refuse to comply, we will deprive you of all political rights and privileges in national or State affairs, and govern you by military power until you submit.

It seems to me that in pursuing this course, so far from guaranteeing to them the republican government which they had rightfully formed for their State, we aid the usurpers and rebels in overturning the legitimate preëxisting State governments, by effectually completing what they began.

We are bound to secure to the people of each State under such State government as they shall see fit to establish, subject to the Constitution of the United States, the right to administer their own affairs, the right to enact and change their own laws as to all local matters. We have guaranteed that to them, and we must keep our guarantee, at least to the loyal men. For my part, I say that we are bound to do it if there are but a hundred men in the State who have stood by the Union.

It is said that these State governments have been overthrown, and therefore the general Government has a right to assume this power. It seems to me that all that can be justly claimed is that rebellious men, disloyal men, revolutionary men, have seized upon the machinery of the State government.

I wish to see our armies conquer the rebel armies, and drive out the usurpers who have been carrying on this rebellion. The people of these States must be required to submit to all the United States laws. We must insist that they submit to all the laws in relation to the revenue, in relation to the currency, the post office, and all other subjects within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. When they do this there is no necessity that we should, nor in my judgment have we any right to, interfere as to their State governments. They have a right to maintain them as they were when the rebellion commenced, or they may change them.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is sometimes said here that the institution of slavery as it exists in these States is inconsistent with "republican Government," and that therefore under the clause of the Constitution above quoted Congress has a right to compel the people of the States to abolish it.

Sir, I am no admirer or advocate of slavery. I object to it, believing it to be a great moral and political evil—a wrong to the slave, and, in the long run, a curse to the master. I shall rejoice to see it abolished, if it is done without violating the Constitution of the United States or interfering with the reserved rights of the people of the States to regulate their local institutions. We should not violate the Constitution of the United States nor imperil the perpetuity of the Union under it to interfere with it where it exists in the States. We of the non-slave-holding States are not responsible for it, nor are we likely to deal with it wisely for the benefit of the slave or for the peace of the country.

But it is too plain for argument that the institution of slavery as it has existed in the States of the Union is compatible with a republican Government within the meaning of the United States Constitution. The States which adopted it were slave States mainly, and the continuance or abolition of the institution was carefully reserved to the people of each State. But the Government which is prescribed to the people of the States by this bill is, in its origin, in violation of the spirit of republicanism. What is a "republican form of government"?

Madison, in the thirty-ninth number of "The Federalist," asks and answers the question:

> "What, then, are the distinctive characters of the Republican form?" . . . "If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people." . . . "It is essential to such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society." . . . "It is sufficient for such a government that the persons administering it be appointed either directly or indirectly by the people."

Can there be any doubt, therefore, that the governments in existence in these States at the time the rebellion was inaugurated were republican within the meaning of the Constitution? To make them such it is essential that they be derived from the people governed, not imposed upon them by other governments, States, or people. Nevertheless, we propose by this bill, under the pretence of fulfilling our guaranty to them of a republican form of government, to compel them to adopt a constitution and government as to their local State matters, not originating from themselves, or in accordance with their wishes, but dictated to them by us; and we will trample upon all their rights, and rule over them by our appointees, levying upon and collecting taxes from them for our treasury without their having any representation until they do our bidding in reference to the details of their State constitution. This is indeed guaranteeing to them a new kind of republican government! Are we willing to occupy the position before the world, or the American people, in which the passage of this bill will place us? I hope not. Let us suppress the rebellion in these States; drive out those who have usurped the State government, and restore it and the administration of it to those who have been loyal always in their hearts, I trust and believe many such will be found, and to those whom we think it wise and proper to recognize as citizens in each of those States under an amnesty.

Daniel W. Gooch [Mass.] supported the bill, particularly that part of it which established a military government for the seceded States until such time as the civil government was reconstructed.

As the government which has given its adhesion to the rebel confederacy can never be recognized by the United States, a new government must be organized during the military occupation, which can, at the proper time, be recognized by Congress. All these acts by the President, or the military power under him, in thus aiding and assisting the loyal people in these States, impose no obligation upon Congress to recognize them until such time as it shall deem proper to do so, and any recognition the military power may see fit to give to these governments can never fix their status in the Union. Congress alone has the power to determine what government is the legitimate one in a State, and its decision is binding on the other departments of the Government. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Luther vs. Borden et al. is precisely to this point:

"Under this article of the Constitution [article four, section four] it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a Republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can be determined whether it is Republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."

The question of the recognition of a government in one of the revolted States does not differ at all from the question of recognition of the government in any State in which the legitimate government has been interrupted, overthrown, or destroyed, and the Federal power invoked to determine which the established and legitimate government is. The question is a political one, and is to be decided by Congress, not by the Executive or the judiciary, and the most authoritative decision which Congress can give to the question is the admission of Senators and Representatives to seats in the councils of the nation; and, as each House is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, each must determine for itself what government it will recognize as the established one in any State, and when the Senate and the House have by the admission of members to seats decided in favor of the same government in any State the question is settled, and the decision binding on the other departments of this Government.

Nehemiah Perry [Dem.], of New Jersey, opposed the bill. He declared that it was a "political artifice" intended for effect in the coming presidential election.

The operation of this scheme would be, by a political fiction, to bring back the whole State into apparent but unreal relation with the Union, enable it, or the fragment acting in its name, to elect United States Senators, and by pretended elections to send its full complement of Representatives to the House of Representatives. And here the President's design is perfectly evident, to secure a majority of the delegates to the nominating convention of his party, and to provide for his own election by the House of Representatives in the event of there not being an election by the people. By this plan the narrow foothold maintained by our armies in North Carolina, Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Florida, Arkansas, and elsewhere may send the pretended full delegations of those States to this House.

But, Mr. Speaker, this plan to "reëstablish" State governments is based on the assumption that they have been destroyed. This, sir, I deny; nor can they be destroyed unless the rebels are finally victorious, and establish their independence.. We may be utterly destroyed by a superior power, State after State might be overrun, our capital might be captured and destroyed, but in such a case only can our Constitution be torn in fragments or our Union destroyed. When we have absolutely succumbed to the power of an enemy all our institutions will crumble into one fatal ruin, and our glorious democratic Republic be consolidated into the kingdom of a tyrant. But till this happens our Union and Constitution possess a principle of perpetual vitality, no death of a State and no severance of it from the Union. The life-blood may cease to flow for a time between the center and the extremities, but immediately on the removal of those hindrances and obstructions the life-bearing current will again leap through vein and artery, and the whole frame will once more rejoice in renewed health and vigor.

Fernando Wood [Dem.], of New York, opposed the bill.

I contend that, whatever may become of the Federal Union, the States themselves have a positive existence. The Federal Union is the creation of the States, and hence cannot become more powerful than the creator. The States which claim the right to withdraw from the Union do not alter their positions as States; they retain the same attitude toward each other that they held anterior to the American Revolution and to the adoption of the Constitution. In seceding from the Union they are, therefore, still distinct political communities with their own State constitutions and forms of government deriving authority from the people. Whatever doubt as to their relation to the Federal Government, there can be none as to their relation to each other and as to their individual local domestic independence.

William D. Kelley [Pa.] supported the theory of his colleague, Mr. Stevens, that the States in seceding had neither retained nor resumed their individual sovereignty, but had committed suicide in so far as their constitutional rights were concerned, and were in the status of Territories.

Is there a State of South Carolina? Pray who represents it on this floor? Who in the other end of the Capitol? Will you tell me what judge comes from a circuit whereof that State is a part to sit in the councils of our Supreme Court, or what judge holding authority from the President and Senate of the United States administers the laws in its district court? Who or where are the marshals, collectors of its ports, or postmasters, who hold power from our Government and act in its name and behalf? So, too, of the other confederated States. Where or how do you feel the influence of any of them in this Government? How do you enforce the Constitution and laws within the territory once governed by the constitutions of those States? Ah, sir, the sovereign people, or, to speak more precisely, the political people of each of those States, have overthrown the State. Through its corporate power each State destroyed its corporate life, and no one of them exists.

Sir, the destruction of a State by the severance of the constitutional ligaments that bind it to this Government is one thing; but the government of the people upon the territory, the ultimate right to govern, is quite another. The sovereign right of eminent domain is not with the State. Do not, therefore, let me be misunderstood as arguing that the people of a State may oust the jurisdiction and right of the nation, or transfer any territory within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States to a foreign power. They cannot. Nor can they take themselves out of the jurisdiction of the country unless they leave the limits of its territory. To permit this would be to dissolve our Government; and whoever attempts it must be punished as a traitor. The President and Congress of the United States are bound to resist such an attempt, though it require the expenditure of every able-bodied man and the last dollar of treasure. Their oath to support and defend the Constitution binds them to reconquer possession of territory which is attempted to be thus taken from the people and the Government, as it does to defend the country against any other foe who strikes at the nation's life or attempts to divide its territory.

But the people of our once sister States have not merely destroyed their State governments; they have established others, unrecognized by our Constitution, and have confederated in a foreign and hostile government. Thus they are alien enemies, though they occupy territory within the limits of the Union. That territory belongs to the people of the Union and their posterity through all time, and none but a traitor or coward would surrender it.

The States are out of the Union, but the territory belongs to the United States, and the people, if they remain upon it, must be governed by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The State constitutions having been overthrown, it belongs to Congress to provide for the reconquest of the territory and for its government; and it is the duty of the Executive to effect that conquest by any and all means which are known to modern warfare and are within the law of nations. These are the only limitations, not only upon the power, but upon the duty of the Government.

Mr. Kelley then stated that, according to this theory, new States might be constructed out of the seceded territory not necessarily coterminus with the old ones.

I care not whether the States to be instituted be as large as Texas or as small as Delaware. When any given portion of the country shall be peopled by loyal men, who shall meet in convention and adopt a constitution and present it to Congress asking admission into the Union, it will be our duty to consider the constitution and to determine on the question of admission. Neither the Constitution nor the President's amnesty proclamation makes it necessary that the limits or name of a future State shall be determined by what existed prior to the overthrow of the now rebellious States.

On May 4 Samuel S. Cox [O.] spoke against the bill.

These plans of regeneration involve a change in the structure of the Government. They break down the spirit of municipal independence, in destroying which, as De Tocqueville has shown, you destroy the spirit of liberty. No matter what form is left, the despotic tendency will inevitably appear when the local authority is usurped. If you leave any form of government, it is the will of the Executive, it is a despotic centralization: Russian, Asiatic, the rule of military bashaws or provincial kinglets. Whether appointed by Congress or the President they hold their power from Washington, and they must remain at the head of their troops, and at the call of their chief. Our Republic, then, deserves not its name. It is no longer the "United States." It is a united State, a geographical unit, holding together subject provinces by the brute force of petty tyrants.

Believing that the scope and aim of the proclamation will not restore the Union nor propitiate any portion of the South, except demagogues and hirelings, who sell their birthright for the price of power, let us inquire what motive could have induced the President to proclaim it, in a moment of success to our arms and depression to the South. One suggestion will satisfy as to the motive. I am sorry to believe it; but the President desires renomination. He is a man whose mind has every angle but the right angle. In his nature cunning contends with fanaticism. From the time he developed his irrepressible conflict doctrine, so much praised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Arnold], until its latest expression in his last message, his course has been equivocal. But meanwhile how shrewdly he has balanced between the factions of his party. His inaugural recognized his obligations to the Constitution. He would not interfere with slavery. How prodigal were his promises to the border. How quick to plant his foot on Phelps, Hunter, and Frémont, for playing Augustulus. He desired some day to play Augustus. Abolitionism should be hatched under no influences but his own. How he lectured one of his editors for impatience. Conservatives held up his hands while he prevailed against these radicals. He toyed with emigration, colonization, and compensation schemes. He made a gradual emancipation theory with a short fuse which soon exploded. It hurt no one. But the time came for him to play revolutionist; and with seeming reluctance he issued the proclamation of emancipation. He desired the people to pass on it. They did. They condemned it in 1862. He adhered to it. In his Springfield letter, and in his last message, he dedicates all power to its execution. Meanwhile, a contest springs up as to the State suicide doctrine. It divides his party, and even the Cabinet. He has Missouri on his hands. Radicals are rampant. He acts conservative a while until the days of November, 1864, begin to approach, then, lo! this message as the climax of his long series of ambiguities. That I may do the President no injustice, I quote from his own partisan, Senator Samuel C. Pomeroy [Kan.], in his circular, who says:

"The people have lost all confidence in Mr. Lincoln's ability to suppress the rebellion and restore the Union. He has been weak and vacillating, wasteful of national blood and treasure, profligate and corrupt."

There is only one solution for these inconsistencies. He is trying to please both wings of his party to secure his nomination. With dexterous chicanery he has phrased and framed his late plan so that it may admit of two voices. He will not give up his emancipation proclamation or the confiscation and penal laws. "To abandon them now," he says, "would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and an astounding breach of faith." This should suit the radicals. For a lighter shade of his party he promises what is a mere delusion —an adjudication of the questions of their legality by the Supreme Court. True, he has declared all means like these which he now promulgates unconstitutional; yet he would submit them to the court! When, and how? Why, after he has made the slave a freedman by the sword! What a mockery is such a submission. But it will do to make him a candidate, and, more than that, it might elect him President. If his plan of making one tenth rule in the States should succeed, then he will have ready at hand the electoral votes of Florida, Arkansas, Louisiana, Tennessee, North Carolina, and other States. He began this business in Florida the other day, and the blood which flowed at Olustee is the result of this scheme of personal ambition!

Surely a candidate with so fair a chance for a gigantic, almost a continental fraud as this, must commend himself to a party whose use of power has made a debt of $2,000,000,000 and an expenditure equal to the expenditure of all former Administrations. Hence, when this amnesty to rebels was announced, it was regarded as a political movement only, and the excitement did not equal that of a prize fight. No one was affected by it. It was nothing but a bold attempt to perpetuate power, at the hazard of revolutionary war in the North and protracted war in the South.

The pretence of the President is to reconstruct the Union. Where did he get his authority to build anew what we can never agree has been destroyed? Is it a part of the war power or the pardoning power? It is the "best mode the Executive can suggest, with his present impressions." Will any one point out the clause of the Constitution which would even create an "impression" that the Executive has the function either of lawgiver, State constructor, or supreme dictator? His meekness in referring to Congress and the judiciary the legality of his acts after they are accomplished is a piece of effrontery to which Louis Napoleon has not yet arrived. Where did this unfledged Cæsar get his warrant to create sovereignty?

I propose to discuss the President's plan in the following order:

First, the oath; second, the republican form of the government to be reconstructed; third, the question whether the State governments in the rebel States are vital; fourth, some wise and practical plan such as will aid in restoring the Union under the Constitution.

1. The oath.—There is a sort of odium historicum attached to all political test oaths. They are not original with the President. They have been the bane and foil of good government ever since bigotry began and revenge ruled. You cannot make eight million people, nearly all in revolt at what they regard as the detestable usurpations of abolition, forswear their hatred to abolition.

The abolition oath is the basis of the new republican form of government. All who do not agree to that are excluded. All who do not agree to the pestilent theory of State death are also excluded. Hence this plan would allow any recent rebel who takes the oath to make a unit in the one-tenth, and excludes the Union man, who has not forsworn his faith in the vitality of the States, and who will not swear to support policies and laws to which he can never adhere. What becomes of the many thousand loyal men of Tennessee, of Texas, of North Carolina, of Arkansas, of Louisiana? They are set aside for those whose oaths will bind them long enough to vote, and who, to save their lives and property, will swear with facility. Going upon the doctrine that all the rebellious districts are unsound, assuming the ground that the territory South, being belligerent, outlaws all, whether loyal or not, the President applies this bitter cup to the Union men who have never flinched in their love for the flag. These men must quaff the cup of bitter waters before they can stand before the world as the builders of the new temple proposed by the President! If they were worthy of association in this great cohort of States they would scorn reënfranchisement by such a plan. If there were no other reason to reject this juggling scheme, justice to "the faithful found among the faithless" South would demand its rejection.

The truth is, a test oath to require citizens to support his policy as to slaves is not an oath of allegiance to republican government, but to the Republican party. It is an oath of fealty to Abraham Lincoln. He sends out heralds to proclaim: "Ho! ye; all who will prepare to forswear your sentiments and enter into an arrangement to make new States with one-tenth over nine-tenths, and thus form electoral colleges to vote for me, I swear by my army and navy that you, though you are pardoned criminals, shall be the corner-stones in the new States, and shall have the shield of the Executive and the protection of the flag!" In vain we search Spanish-American annals for so shameless a pronunciamento for revolution and anarchy. It is thus, Mr. Speaker, that your party seeks to unhinge the massive portals which lead within the chambers of reserved popular power, those doors which, for so many years on golden hinges turning, opened so readily to the States as they entered within the sacred adytum of our political faith.

There is one answer to these propositions always on the lip of the anti-slavery devotee. He holds that no slave State can be accounted republican. This would be news, indeed, to the Jeffersons, Washingtons, Madisons, and Adamses, who established these States as republican, twelve out of thirteen being slave at the outset. This would be news, indeed, to the pioneers of the Northwest, to the early settlers of Ohio, who remember the deed of cession of Virginia, whereby our sovereignty was forever declared to be equal to and inviolate as that of the slave State of Virginia.

But what sort of republicanism is that which builds a State from a small minority of its people? The majority of a people, expressing its own will, forms a republic. A minority, or even a majority, following the will of a despot, forms a monarchy. One-tenth of the legal voters ruling nine-tenths is an oligarchy. Reconstruction of republican governments on such a basis is as absurd as the structures built by the architects in Gulliver, who began their houses at the roof in the air! The President quotes the guaranty of the Constitution as to republican State governments, and promises under its sanction protection to these pseudo-republics! But he forgets that, if the Southern States are deceased, or out of the Union, there is the third section of article fourth of the Constitution which provides for the admission of States. Does the President in his theory propose to disregard this clause? Unless Congress consent all these scaffoldings, erected by his own will, will tumble to naught. If States can be declared dead, or burned out by the fires of war, perhaps New England may some day find her theory come home, in a reconstruction of her six States into one, and the reduction of her twelve Senators into two! Lines of longitude, as well as of latitude, may sometimes reconstruct States.

The basis of our Federal Government is States, having constitutions and laws—the emanation of the popular will. This will is expressed through suffrage. This suffrage in States is regulated by their own constitution and laws. State voters thus qualified, and they only, can vote for members of Congress. When, therefore, the President undertakes to breathe into a State the breath of life by a new code of suffrage, even if the State were defunct, he usurps a power never granted, and a sovereignty belonging solely to the people. If these States in rebellion are destroyed—if the tabula rasa remains, upon which the President can write new constitutions, with new qualifications for voters—then secession and revolution have done legally what no one but a rebel or traitor ever believed could be done.

This brings me to the radical question of the day. The message of the President and the bill of the gentleman from Maryland assume that the State governments in the rebel States are out of existence or usurped, and that the territory should be governed as such by the United States until new State governments shall be formed. The President does not commit himself to this plan as the only one. Very well. But one thing he has assumed—that the old States are gone. But let us do him justice. He suggests that on "reconstructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, boundary, the subdivisions, etc., may be maintained"; provided always the abolition policy prevail. This is like the prescript of the old Sultan, who, in commanding an obnoxious vizier to be ensacked and thrown into the Bosporus, generously hoped his turban and clothes might remain unmoistened.

I know it is said that he repudiates the policy of reducing the States to Territories. His plan is to select, as nearly as may be, the old building spot; perhaps use some of the old foundations, say one-tenth; but he changes radically the plan and structure of the building, and takes away from its lord the sovereign control of the establishment. He insists that there shall be homogeneity of arrangement in the structure; that for different conditions, classes, systems, climate, and position the same relations shall be instituted. This plan is not only absurd in philosophy, unsound in economy, but revolutionary in practice. He, in fact, says, "I shall fight on to keep the Southern States out until they conform to my views as to negroes. My abolition condition to Union is inexorable! The proclamation shall be on a par with the Constitution. Let no one bleed for one without dying for the other!" God help the nation, plunged in an abyss of blood, for such crudities!

Surely, if the State suicide doctrine be sound, this plan of rebuilding is not. Let me consider that State suicide doctrine. It professes to be based on the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hiawatha case. That decision is perverted to sustain this theory. The court condemned certain property captured, because the property was within the lines of the enemy actually holding those lines by force, though without right, and not because of the moral or political relation of the owner. The court decided nothing as to the legal and political status of the owner, but because the property would help the enemy it was to be taken as prize of war. There is in that decision no recognition of the right of secession, much less of the monstrous and cruel doctrine that rebels in arms can abolish the legal rights of loyal men or the institutions of States.

If war blots out the States insurgent by virtue of its territorial and belligerent character, then war does by its violence what secession would do by its ordinances. The right to expunge a State is coördinate with the right to secede. If a State can be forced out by the vote of its own sovereignty or by combinations of men without a constitutional amendment, then any State can be expelled by Federal action. If the Union becomes disagreeable to a State, then the State may become disagreeable to the Union; and, if a State may retire at pleasure, why cannot a State be repudiated at will? These rights, if they exist, which I deny, correlate. They are inseparable. Suppose it had been proposed to expel South Carolina from the Union for her contumacy, or Massachusetts for her intermeddling, what a burst of indignation we should have had from each! They would have exclaimed: "Show us the power to throttle our State sovereignty by denying us participation in this blessed Union. What! strip us of our American citizenship, place us outside of your navigation and commercial laws and treaties; leave us at the mercy of foreign powers; belittle us to nothing; rob us of our common interests in a common treasure, territory, government, history, and glory. Never!" Yet wherein does this claim of holding these States South as conquered provinces by military force, degrading the equal dignity of the States by the creation of a new sovereign power, differ in principle from secession?

If secession be a nullity, and if the Constitution is not impaired nor the rights of the States destroyed, then I can see how arms, inspired by wise and persuasive measures, may, in time, redeem the States; but, on the other theory, all the tears, miseries, confiscations, and blood are in vain, in vain, in vain. Can we be surprised, therefore, that an analytic mind like that of the Postmaster-General should have at once descried in these fallacies of abolition a conspiracy in aid of the rebellion?

How, then, is it possible to restore local and State sovereignty and thus unite our hapless and lacerated country? History never presented so grand a problem for statesmanship. I approach it with something of that awe which solemnizes the soul when we enter within some vast and consecrated fabric—vistas and aisles of thought opening on every side, pillars and niches and cells within cells, mixing in seeming confusion, but all really in harmony, and rich with a light streaming through the dim forms of the past, and blessed with an effluence from God, though dimmed and half lost in the contaminated reason and passion of man.

Conscious of the magnitude of this rebellion, and oppressed with the feebleness of the policy directed against it, I still believe in the restoration of the old Union. Hence, whatever method I should advocate for the conduct of the war, or the celebration of peace, I am forever concluded against one conclusion—the independence of the South. I believe the principle of unity to be absolutely superior to the right of sectional nationality. The destiny of these United States is to continue united, and, perhaps, to add other States, until the whole continent is in alliance. Our fate is to expand and not to contract our influence or our limits. All other notions are but transitory and evanescent.

I am happy to be in accord with the President, if, indeed, he hold yet to the doctrine announced in his inaugural: "Physically speaking, we cannot separate." I had adopted the same sentiment, that there were Union foundations, by the very political geology of God, upon which the old Union could and would be rebuilt.

The sentiments of the President in his inaugural are founded in principle, and drawn by correct deductions from history. They are the germ of all true politics. Sorry am I that in a moment of pressure and temptation he should have been drawn from them by the weird whisperings of ambition under the baleful eclipse of fanaticism.

Military rule, anarchy, destruction of individual opinion, speech, and liberty will be our experiences, unless we take the straight, short, and right line of the Constitution. We may wander forty years in a political wilderness before we attain the promise of our youthful and exultant nationality.

Before attempting to show how this nationality may be restored, it would be best to define it. What, then, is nationality? Let the definition of the English logician, John Stuart Mill, answer: "We mean a principle of sympathy, not of hostility; of union, not of separation. We mean a feeling of common interest among those who live under the same government, and are contained within the same natural or historical boundaries. We mean that one part of the community shall not consider themselves as foreigners with regard to another part; that they shall cherish the tie which holds them together; shall feel that they are one people; that their lot is cast together; that evil to any of their fellow-countrymen is evil to themselves; and that they cannot selfishly free themselves from their share of any common inconvenience by severing the connection."

Is it not strange to a dispassionate thinker that those who are not hostile in the sense of hate to the South, those who would woo them to the ancient order and Union by reason, old associations, the allurements of peace and patriotism, to make again of the circle of equal States the old Federal sovereignty, should be held to be the least national; while those who have so far forgotten the common interest of all under the same government, who regard themselves as alien to the South, even as the South regard themselves as alien to us, should be held as the most national? I do proclaim it, on the basis of a logic incontestable, that he among us who wishes most evil to any part of the country IS THE MORAL TRAITOR AND SOCIAL ANARCH.

We are powerful in proportion as we are national. If we should follow the advice of passion and treat the Southern States now in civil war as England treated Ireland, we become weak and denationalized. If we pursue the South with a licentious uncivic soldiery, gloating with anticipations of the plunder of private effects, or with the promises already held out of parceling out the lands of the South as the bounty which revenge pays for pillage, thus whetting a tigerish appetite for a great festival of blood and rapine, we may be sure that the special Nemesis which Herodotus traced through the early eras of history will haunt the men who instigate and the men who execute such a fell and imbecile policy. If, as in Rome once and in Spanish-America now, we bribe one part of the nation by the robbery of another portion, then we may be sure that conflicts will be renewed when exhaustion is overcome, and our flag, like that of old Spain, will typify a river of blood between margins of gold. If we would avoid the constant aggregation and disintegration of feeble masses in different provinces, such as the history of South America demonstrates, we must learn to carry out, better than the President has done, his own principle of friendly legislation, instead of repellant alienation. Powerful as are our armies—gradually encroaching amid many mistakes and vicissitudes upon the territory which is insurgent—great as are our Parrott guns, and invulnerable as are our ironclads, one thing we have to learn yet from history, that our best soldiers are not like Charlemagne's paladins, possessed of enchanted weapons. The weapon which wounds the cause of rebellion, and yet which can transmute the rebel into the patriot, is the enchantment of friendship. He who would destroy a part of his own country, as if it were alien, has no more love for it than Saturn had for the children of his own loins whom he destroyed. Such a creature is not a patriot, even if he were a man. Patriotism never desires to weaken or disgrace, but always to strengthen and glorify the country.

Confidence and allegiance have been begotten and renewed in other lands rent with civil feuds; why not in this? To answer this I shall consider, first, the mode by which such results can be attained, and, secondly, the illustrations from history showing such results.

1. States or societies are made up of individuals. To reform society or control masses individuals must be reached. M. Guizot, in his "History of Civilization" (page 25), has demonstrated that two elements are comprised in the great fact we call civilization—the progress of society and the progress of individuals. The one is but the external phenomenon of which the other is the cause. Society is merely the theater for the immortal man. Society is made for man, not man for society. Society dies, changes, rots, regrows, and decays again; man blooms in immortal youth beyond this limited destiny. When, therefore, you adopt a policy to restore States or rebuild the dismantled social order, you must begin by reaching the character of men, influencing their literature, their tastes, their maxims, their laws and institutions, their industries, their wealth and its distribution and means of attainment, their occupations, their divisions into classes, and all their relations to each other. Whenever you have harmonized these so as to give contentment you may be assured that no military compression or civil oppression can long keep the individuals interested from a common consent to the common government.

Habitual discipline and regard for government on the part of rulers and ruled, aided by religion and a common interest, is the power which keeps men from becoming anarchical.

Combined with this civil discipline is the feeling of allegiance. Without this feeling no State can be permanent. When the rulers fail to give that protection which is the consideration and correlative of allegiance, then allegiance fails, and society declines, despotism supervenes, or foreign conquest is imposed. Let statesmen remember that this is the capital defect of our rulers, and the proximate cause of our troubles. Thus remembering, let them study history with a view to the reinstatement of that protection to labor, liberty, property, and life which assures to the State the allegiance of the people. This feeling is sometimes called "loyalty." The French philosopher, M. Comte, has thus described its essence: viz.: that there be in the constitution of the state, whether a monarchy or democracy, something which is settled, something permanent, and not to be called in question."

The sacred something in our political system is the written Federal Constitution and the system of State governments, both having their basis on the sovereign will of the people of the States. Not less sacred, because not less above discussion, are the reserved rights of the States, and the still more important reservation of sovereignty in the people. This is the essential permanency of society in the United States. This was the relation which all parties, whether at Charleston or Chicago, agreed should not be disturbed, which the President declared should not be disturbed by him, and the fear of whose disturbance has convulsed a nation of thirty millions. This mystic union of the Federal and State systems was the sacramental essence, the divine appointment, above the storms and eddies of discussion. In this were comprehended our ancient liberties and ordinances. Even the domestic institutions of the State were imbound with it. Indeed, it was the only fundamental law, pervading our society as gravitation pervaded the stellar spaces.

Those, whether North or South, who failed to keep this essence sacred and sealed are responsible for the consequences. Abolitionism, which lived by the disturbance of this system, was like secession, for both sprang from the same direful agitation and the same disturbance of the Constitution.

But is there no light through the clouds of war? Have we no solution for past wrongs, no immunity for future griefs? Are anger, hatred, scorn, revenge—the brood of wicked passions rankling in the heart—are these to remain? And shall there be no interregnum for the serene dynasty of peace and love, to walk white-handed through this bleeding and bloody land? Shall no one pour the lethean wave over the scenes of death and the sorrows of mourning? Shall there be no recantation of the oaths of fierce men, vowing revenge for homes wasted, property confiscated, brethren destroyed, and cities ruined? O God! Is there no hope that even time may not be allowed to assuage the hates and griefs of this bloody era? Shall the young men of to-day wear the rancor in their hearts till their hairs are whitened for the tomb and teach their children and children's children to perpetuate the hate of the fathers? If this is to be the fate of our Union, then God has mocked His creatures by fixing them in habitations bound together by the same skies, rivers, mountains, and lakes; mocked them by fixing in their hearts the principle of love, and cruelly flouted them by sending to this star a Prince of Peace as an Exemplar and Savior!

Who are the men, or the fiends, who talk of utter extermination? If it were possible it were execrable! To exterminate the Southern people rather than reach them, as Mr. Lincoln himself proposed, by friendly laws, is a crime more heinous than rebellion. Let the pitiless destruction of the Moors of Andalusia by Philip II, the merciless slaughter of the French in La Vendée, Claverhouse's bloody hunts after the Scottish Covenanters, the stained and cadaverous cheek of Ireland, the bloodshot eye of maddened Poland, the grim submission of revengeful Venetia, teach us by their history that powder cannot cement nor bombs bear messages of love. Superadd to your force conciliation, and then your force may not be mere brute violence. Force has welded by its blows, but they were tempered in the fire of old and loving associations. "I do not fight the South because I hate her," said Mr. Crittenden; "I love her still." Conquest by force is only physical; subjugation implies mental acquiescence on the part of the vanquished in the ideas of the victor. Such a war, therefore, will produce only the status quo ante bellum,[1] leaving an absolute reciprocal negation; each party denying the claims of the other, and leaving no common ground for a truce to intellectual conflict.

The fact that war has come and that separation is impossible, makes more urgent the ascendency of a party whose first and only preference is for the Union through compromise, and who shall, at least, be allowed to try the experiment of reconciling the States by guaranties similar to those proposed in 1861. If it be found impossible to restore the old association of States by such negotiation, then, and not till then, can statesmen begin properly to ponder the other problems connected with subjugation and recognition. We may yet change the war from the diabolical purposes of those in power, by changing that power to other hands, and we are not ready to sever our Union while that hope remains. Of the two evils of subjugation or recognition I make my choice of—neither.

2. To restore allegiance and inspire nationality let the individual rebel in arms against us be reached by the arm of our soldier, and when a noncombatant by the moderation and paternal care of the Government. Let the military power of the Confederates be broken. Use those and only those severities of war which civilization warrants and which will make the military power of the South feel the power of the nation; but do not place any longer in their hands the armament of despair. They have had that weapon for over two years. Let our rulers forego their ostracism of the misguided citizen. Let an amnesty be tendered which has hope in its voice. Give forgiveness to the erring, hope to the desponding, protection to the halting, and allay even fancied apprehensions of evil by the measures of moderation. Thus, by confiscating confiscation, abolishing abolition, and canceling proclamations, by respecting private property and State rights, prepare that friendliness which will beget confidence in the individual citizen. Thus will minorities be transferred into majorities South, and the States discarding the rebel authorities betake themselves to their normal and proper sphere under the old order. If this cannot be done by the present rulers, let other rulers be selected.

History teaches in vain if it does not contain lessons of moderation in civil wars. How were the feuds of the Grecian federation accommodated? How were the civil wars of Rome ended? How were the intestine troubles of England assuaged? How was La Vendée pacified by the generous Hoche? How is it ever that unity of empire and consentaneity of thought are induced? How, except by the practice of that mildness which cares for and does not curse the people.

The closest analogy to our condition is to be found in the English civil war beginning in 1640. The English people are our ancestors. They had what we have—a similar code of personal freedom, great municipal independence, and a popular Parliament. The causes of the war were complicated by religious controversy; but the questions involved concerning the royal prerogative and the popular privilege are closely allied to our struggle. We know how the first Charles lost his head; how Cromwell's iron hand rescued, for a time, England from anarchy. At his death, eleven military governments, under major-generals like Monk, held almost absolute sway. Conspirators were punished with death. Confiscations were common. Party vengeance was rampant then as now, but the people's representatives considered that they had to decide between a new civil war and a restoration. Then came the famous declaration of Charles II from Breda. It removed all hesitation and the restoration began. The king in that paper declared that he desired to compose the distraction and confusion of his kingdom, to assume his ancient rights, and accord to them their ancient liberties, without further "blood-letting." He conjured them to a perfect union for the resettlement of all rights, under a free Parliament.

When this declaration was read in Parliament—though it was the false word of a designing tyrant—yet the restoration of the second Charles was voted by acclamation! Nor would the same sort of declaration from Abraham Lincoln be less powerful to restore the sovereign States to their old allegiance, especially if followed by a national convention and the restoration of a party not unfriendly to the entire union of all the States, with their "just rights." No distrust followed this declaration of the English king. He came to England. His journey to London was one perpetual fête—one continued shout of rejoicing! Faction ceased. History records that Cavaliers were reconciled with Roundheads. Exiles showed no resentment in the joy of their return. A violent reaction against revolution began; war ceased; and the foundation was then laid for the permanent stability which 1688 gave to England.[1]

Let us have done with juggling amnesties and ambitious schemes, with philanthropic ferocity and enforced elections. Under no such policy, pitched in the key-note of the President's proclamation, or chanted in the mellifluous tones of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis], can the South ever be held in honorable alliance and harmony. A government inspired thus would be out of all relations to the States of this Union. It would have neither "the nerves of sensation which convey intelligence to the intellect of the body-politic, nor the ligaments and muscle which hold its parts together and move them in harmony." It would be as Russia is to Poland, as England to Ireland, the government of one people by another. It would never succeed with our race. It would never succeed with a territory whose configurations are so peculiar and whose interests are so varied as ours.

No citizenship is worth granting to those who dishonor themselves to receive it. No common bond of allegiance or nationality is possible on such terms. Mean and degrading conditions which unfit the citizen for manly equality are more despicable than rebellion. You cannot expel the poison of sedition by adding to its virulence. You cannot draw men from crime by stimulating the motive which led to it. But the principle of mercy is all-powerful and eternal. It is the very gospel of God; the very love which saves mankind. Inspired thus, what might be done if a wise and sagacious Executive should extend the same beneficent policy to the factions which are bleeding our beloved land!

Like the fugitive prophet upon Mount Horeb, we may approach and interrogate Deity itself in our despondency and for our deliverance. And, though, like him, we may hear the roar of the whirlwind of war, though we may tremble amid the earthquake of its wrath, and, though God may not be in the storm, or the earthquake, yet we may find Him in the still, small voice whose depth and sweetness are not those of tempestuous force or elemental strife, but soft as an angel's lute or a seraph's song, promising redress for wrong and deliverance from calamity. Horeb stands as a monumental lesson to our rulers forever, speaking the still, small voice of divine conciliation amid the thunders of the law. I wait for that voice to be spoken.

[1] The accession of William and Mary under constitutional guaranties.

My soul waiteth for it "more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they that watch for the morning!"

George S. Boutwell [Mass.] supported the measure, saying, however, that it did not go far enough.

There is one feature of the bill which does not receive my approval, and to which I assent only in deference to what I suppose is the present judgment of this House and of the country. I speak of the limitation of the elective franchise to white male citizens. The right of suffrage is not a natural right, but it is the highest thing among political rights. No community which denies the right of suffrage to any considerable number of its adult male inhabitants can ever be safe from intestine commotion, for wherever this right is so denied the people cannot be safe or even free from oppression. And, even if a community in which the right of suffrage is thus limited should be free from actual oppression, still the Government could not escape the suspicions and charges which result from an unjust distribution of political power. In free countries the rights of the people are frequently acquired and they are generally preserved by the ballot. When the ballot fails the resort is to the sword. When you deny the ballot to one-third or one-half of the people of the vast territory covered by the provisions of this bill, what do you leave for them or offer to them but a resort to the sword as the means of removing or redressing the grievances of which they are already the foredoomed victims?

I had indulged the hope, until recently, that this House would recognize the political rights of the colored race by securing the elective franchise to certain classes, or at least to a single class of those who hereafter should enjoy the protection of the Constitution. The vote upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill establishing the Territory of Montana dissipated at once and for the present this hope. The country will speedily revise our proceedings in this particular. Mark the progress of events! It is not yet two years since you were willing to contribute to the cause of the Union by the emancipation of the negro. I do not now speak of gentlemen on the other side of the House. I address myself to the friends of the Administration.

But now the President's proclamation of emancipation is accepted with signal unanimity by the people of the country. It has already received the considerate judgment of mankind; and may we not also reverently believe that it receives the constant favor of Almighty God? I am aware that gentlemen on the other side of the House still utter their accustomed denunciations of the measure; but their words are like the wonderful missile of the South Sea Islander, which cuts the air fiercely and then falls harmlessly at the feet of him from whose hand the weapon sped.

The people accept the freedom of the negro; having recognized his right to freedom, they bid him do service for the country. When he has served the country in the field the justice of the nation will guarantee to him the power to maintain his rights in civil life.

Thus are events our masters; and thus does the country hesitate even in the presence of these events to do those acts of justice which are due to one race and necessary for the salvation of the other. When, and by what means, and for what period of time do you expect to set up and maintain loyal governments in the rebellious districts of the Union unless you confer the elective franchise upon the negro? The military power must at some moment not remote be withdrawn. The remnant of the dominant class will be powerful for a generation. There is a large number of poor whites, unaccustomed to independent thought or to independent action. The colored people are loyal, and in many States they are almost the only people who are trustworthy supporters of the Union. Will you reject them? I ask whether you will reject the civil and political power of the colored people in the State of South Carolina, for example? If I could direct the force of public sentiment and the policy of this Government, South Carolina, as a State and with a name, should never reappear in this Union. Georgia deserves a like fate. When the Constitution was formed she united herself with South Carolina and forced the recognition of the institution of slavery in our Constitution. Florida does not deserve a name in this Union. What then? Let these three States be set apart as the home of the negro. Invite him there by giving to him local political power. Give him the right of suffrage in those States, and the colored population, as rapidly as it can be spared from the industrial pursuits of the North, will aggregate upon the shores of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Give them local self-government and let them defend themselves as a portion of this Republic.

I do not ask that in any one of the loyal States where a negro population exists, the right of suffrage shall be given to them, but in these three districts, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, I would provide for the right of suffrage to colored persons. They have earned it by their services in the field, and there is a degree of injustice in asking a man to peril his life in the cause of the country and in defence of institutions in the creation and conduct of which he has no voice whatever.

I ask for this people justice, in the presence of this exigency when the life of the nation is in peril and when every reflecting person must see that the cause of that peril is in the injustice we have done to the negro race. They are four millions. They will remain on this continent. They cannot be expatriated. It is our duty to elevate them, to provide for their civilization, for their enlightenment, that they may enjoy the fruits of their labor and their capacity.

George H. Pendleton [Dem.], of Ohio, opposed the bill. He said that, carrying out its principle, the supremacy of Congress over State governments, to its logical conclusion would destroy the rights of the loyal States as well as those of the disloyal ones.

This doctrine is monstrous. It has no foundation in the Constitution. It subjects all the States to the will of Congress; it places their institutions at the feet of Congress. It creates in Congress an absolute unqualified despotism. It asserts the power of Congress in changing the State governments to be "plenary, supreme, unlimited"—"subject only to revision by the people of the whole United States." The rights of the people of the State are nothing, their will is nothing. Congress first decides, the people of the whole Union revise. My own State of Ohio is liable at any moment to be called in question for her constitution. She does not permit negroes to vote. If this doctrine be true Congress may decide this exclusion is anti-republican, and, by force of arms, abrogate that constitution and set up another permitting negroes to vote. From that decision of the Congress there is no appeal to the people of Ohio, but only to the people of Massachusetts, and New York, and Wisconsin, at the election of Representatives; and, if a majority cannot be elected to reverse the decision, the people of Ohio must submit. Woe be to the day when that doctrine shall be established, for from its centralized despotism we will appeal to the sword!

Sir, the rights of the States were the foundation corner of the Confederation. The Constitution recognized them, maintained them, provided for their perpetuation. Our fathers thought them the safeguard of our liberties. They have proved so. They have reconciled liberty with empire; they have reconciled the freedom of the individual with the increase of our magnificent domain. They are the test, the touchstone, the security of our liberties. This bill, the avowed doctrine of its supporters, sweeps them all instantly away. It substitutes despotism for self-government; despotism the more severe because vested in a numerous Congress elected by a people who may not feel the exercise of its power. It subverts the Government, destroys the Confederation, and erects a tyranny on the ruins of republican governments. It creates unity—it destroys liberty—it maintains integrity of territory, but destroys the rights of the citizen.

Sir, if this be the alternative of secession, I should prefer that secession should succeed. I should prefer to have the Union dissolved, the Confederate States recognized; nay, more, I should prefer that secession should go on, if need be, until each State resumes its complete independence. I should prefer thirty-four republics to one despotism. From such republics, while I might fear discord and wars, I would enjoy individual liberty, and hope for reunion on the true principles of confederation. From one strong centralized despotism, overriding the rights of the people, overriding the rights of the States, I can see no escape except in apathetic contentment with slavery, or the oft-repeated, often-failing, always bloody struggles of despairing hope. I would rather live a free citizen of a republic no larger than my native county of Hamilton, than be the subject of a more splendid empire than a Cæsar in his proudest triumphs ever ruled, or a Napoleon in his loftiest flights ever conceived.

Sir, I cling to the hope that these evils may yet be averted. While I would prefer separation to the unity which this bill would create, I would fain hope that we may not be compelled to accept either alternative. If, before it is too late, the people will see the designs of those now in power, and will replace them with men who do not wish revolution, but do heartily wish a restoration of the Union, men—who will seek by peace the results which war has rendered well-nigh impossible—who will try to attain by conciliation the ends which never can be reached by subjugation—who will seek in consent the foundation of the right of the Government, in States rights the guaranties of the liberty of the citizen—in the Constitution the measure of the power of the Government and the extent of the surrender of perfect freedom imposed by the citizen upon himself—we may hope that we may again have union and liberty; that interest, which alone binds together nations occupying a territory like our own, will assert its power and heal the wounds of war, and bring us again into the bonds of fraternal peace.

But, if they will not now see these designs and avert them, however long and bloody and desolating this war, it will end—I predict it now while the thunders of battle ring in our ears and the exultant shouts of victory rise upon the air—in recognition of the Confederacy, in final separation, and in a longer, bloodier, and more desolating war on the part of our people—of your constituents, sir, and mine—to throw off the despotism which will ere then have been firmly established over them.

The bill was passed on May 4 by a vote of 73 to 59.

It did not come up for discussion in the Senate until late in the session—July 1. After considerable discussion and some amendment it was passed on that date by a vote of 26 to 3.

The House disagreed with the Senate amendments, and on July 2 the Senate withdrew its amendments by a vote of 18 to 14.

The bill was presented to the President during the last hour of the last day of the session (July 4) and he refused to sign it, preferring that the plan be presented to the people for their consideration. Accordingly, on July 8, he issued the following proclamation:

Proclamation Concerning Reconstruction

By President Lincoln, July 8, 1864

Presenting the bill, and giving the reasons that had led him to submit it to the people, the President said:

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known, that, while I am (as I was in December last, when by proclamation I propounded a plan for restoration) unprepared, by a formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and, while I am also unprepared to declare that the free-State constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort, or to declare a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States, but I am at the same time sincerely hoping and expecting that a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the nation may be adopted, nevertheless I am fully satisfied with the system for restoration contained in the bill as one very proper plan for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it, and that I am, and at all times shall be, prepared to give the executive aid and assistance to any such people, so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, in which cases military governors will be appointed, with directions to proceed according to the bill.

The radical Senators, Henry Winter Davis [Md.] and Benjamin Wade [O.], addressed "to the supporters of the Government" a "Protest" in which they said that they had read the President's proclamation "without surprise, but not without indignation." The implied condemnation of the supporters of the measure in his statement that its passage had been delayed till the very last moment was insincere. The reverse was the case; he had himself intrigued to secure this result, so as to obtain an excuse for refusing it. Indeed, one of the Senators closest to the President (James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin) had written to the heads of the Louisiana government, which, as also the Arkansas government, had been formed according to the President's plan, and which would be reconstructed anew if the plan of Congress were adopted, that the House bill would be held as long as possible in the Senate and finally killed by a pocket veto of the President.

Senators Davis and Wade charged that the President's persistence in his own plan of reconstruction by executive authority was inspired by his desire to use, if necessary, the electoral votes of Louisiana and Arkansas to secure his reëlection. They also pointed to the abortive military expedition against Florida as evidence of the same purpose. They warned the country that trouble would certainly ensue if the votes of Louisiana and Arkansas turned the balance in his favor.

"Is it to be supposed that his competitors, defeated by these means, will acquiesce?"

In conclusion they warned the President that they and other members of the national legislature supported "a cause and not a man," that "the authority of Congress is paramount and must be respected, and, if he wished their support, he must confine himself to his executive duties: to obey and execute, not make the laws; to suppress armed rebellion by arms, and leave political reorganization to Congress."

In his annual message of December 6, 1864, the President announced that 12,000 citizens in each of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana had organized, in accordance with his proclamation, loyal State governments with free constitutions, and that there were movements in the same direction in Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

The last speech of the President was upon reconstruction. It was delivered on April 10, the day following the surrender of Lee at Appomattox.

"At Home Again in the Union"

Speech on Reconstruction by President Lincoln

The subject of reconstruction is fraught with great difficulty. Unlike a case of war between independent nations, there is no authorized organ for us to treat with—no one man has authority to give up the rebellion for any other man. We simply must begin with and mold from disorganized and discordant elements. Nor is it a small additional embarrassment that we, the loyal people, differ among ourselves as to the mode, manner, and measure of reconstruction. As a general rule, I abstain from reading the reports of attacks upon myself, wishing not to be provoked by that to which I cannot properly offer an answer. In spite of this precaution, however, it comes to my knowledge that I am much censured for some supposed agency in setting up and seeking to sustain the new State government of Louisiana.

In this I have done just so much as, and no more than, the public knows. In the annual message of December, 1863, and in the accompanying proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, as the phrase goes, which I promised, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the executive Government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable, and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States. This plan was in advance submitted to the then Cabinet, and distinctly approved by every member of it. . . . The message went to Congress, and I received many commendations of the plan, written and verbal, and not a single objection to it from any professed emancipationist came to my knowledge until after the news reached Washington that the people of Louisiana had begun to move in accordance with it.

I have been shown a letter on this subject, supposed to be an able one, in which the writer expresses regret that my mind has not seemed to be definitely fixed upon the question whether the seceded States, so-called, are in the Union or out of it. It would, perhaps, add astonishment to his regret were he to learn that since I have found professed Union men endeavoring to answer that question, I have purposely forborne any public expression upon it. As appears to me, that question has not been nor yet is a practically material one, and any discussion of it, while it thus remains practically immaterial, could have no effect other than the mischievous one of dividing our friends. As yet, whatever it may become, that question is bad as the basis of a controversy, and good for nothing at all—a merely pernicious abstraction. We all agree that the seceded States, so-called, are out of their proper practical relation with the Union, and that the sole object of the Government, civil and military, in regard to these States, is to again get them into their proper practical relation. I believe that it is not only possible, but in fact easier, to do this without deciding or even considering whether those States have ever been out of the Union than with it. Finding themselves safely at home, it would be utterly immaterial whether they had been abroad. Let us all join in doing the acts necessary to restore the proper practical relations between these States and the Union, and each forever after innocently indulge his own opinion whether, in doing the acts, he brought the States from without into the Union, or only gave them proper assistance, they never having been out of it. The amount of constituency, so to speak, on which the Louisiana government rests, would be more satisfactory to all if it contained fifty thousand, or thirty thousand, or even twenty thousand, instead of twelve thousand, as it does. It is also unsatisfactory to some that the elective franchise is not given to the colored man. I would myself prefer that it were now conferred on the very intelligent, and on those who serve our cause as soldiers. Still, the question is not whether the Louisiana government, as it stands, is quite all that is desirable. The question is: Will it be wiser to take it as it is and help to improve it, or to reject and disperse? Can Louisiana be brought into proper practical relation with the Union sooner by sustaining or by discarding her new State government? Some twelve thousand voters in the heretofore slave States of Louisiana have sworn allegiance to the Union, assumed to be the rightful political power of the State, held elections, organized a State government, adopted a free State constitution, giving the benefit of public school equally to black and white, and empowering the legislature to confer the elective franchise upon the colored man. This legislature has already voted to ratify the constitutional amendment recently passed by Congress, abolishing slavery throughout the nation. These twelve thousand persons are thus fully committed to the Union and to perpetuate freedom in the State—committed to the very things, and nearly all things, the nation wants—and they ask the nation's recognition and its assistance to make good this committal. Now, if we reject and spurn them, we do our utmost to disorganize and disperse them. We, in fact, say to the white man: You are worthless or worse; we will neither help you nor be helped by you. To the blacks we say: This cup of liberty which these, your old masters, held to your lips, we will dash from you, and leave you to the chances of gathering the spilled and scattered contents in some vague and undefined when, where, and how. If this course, discouraging and paralyzing both white and black, has any tendency to bring Louisiana into proper practical relations with the Union, I have so far been unable to perceive it. If, on the contrary, we recognize and sustain the new government of Louisiana, the converse of all this is made true. We encourage the hearts and nerve the arms of twelve thousand to adhere to their work, and argue for it, and proselyte for it, and fight for it, and feed it, and grow it, and ripen it to a complete success. The colored man, too, in seeing all united for him, is inspired with vigilance, and energy, and daring to the same end. Grant that he desires the elective franchise, will he not attain it sooner by saving the already advanced steps toward it than by running backward over them? Concede that the new government of Louisiana is only to what it should be as the egg is to the fowl, we shall sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it. . . .

What has been said of Louisiana will apply generally to other States. And yet so great peculiarities pertain to each State, and such important and sudden changes occur in the same State, and withal so new and unprecedented is the whole case, that no exclusive and inflexible plan can safely be prescribed as to details and collaterals. Such exclusive and inflexible plan would surely become a new entanglement. Important principles may and must be inflexible. In the present situation, as the phrase goes, it may be my duty to make some new announcement to the people of the South. I am considering, and shall not fail to act when satisfied that action will be proper.

THE NATION MOURNING AT LINCOLN'S BIER
By Tenniel in London "Punch"

On the outskirts of the crowd assembled to hear the address was one John Wilkes Booth, an actor, who had come to Washington the previous Saturday and was stopping at the National Hotel. With him was a young man named David E. Herold.

It was when Lincoln made use of this expression: "It is also unsatisfactory to some that the election franchise is not given to the colored man. I would myself prefer that it were now conferred on the very intelligent, and on those who serve our cause as soldiers," that, as Herold related, Booth nudged him and said in a tone of bitter resentment: "That means nigger equality; now, by God! I'll put him through."

Wilson, Charles Sumner [Mass.]; Opposed, Reverdy Johnson [Md.], Sen. Saulsbury, Edgar Cowan [Pa.].

UPON his accession as President (April 15, 1865) Andrew Johnson answered the general and natural inquiry as to what would be his policy by saying:

"I have to say that my policy must be left for development as the Administration progresses. The message of the declaration must be made by the acts as they transpire. The only assurance I can now give of the future is by reference to the past."

Three days later (April 18), while the body of Lincoln still lay in the White House, an Illinois delegation headed by Gov. Richard J. Oglesby paid the new President their respects.

James G. Blaine, in his "Twenty Years of Congress," has given an account of Johnson's speech in reply:

He spoke with profound emotion of the tragical termination of Mr. Lincoln's life: "The beloved of all hearts has been assassinated." Pausing thoughtfully, he added, "And when we trace this crime to its cause, when we remember the source whence the assassin drew his inspiration, and then look at the result, we stand yet more astounded at this most barbarous, most diabolical act. We can trace its cause through successive steps back to that source which is the spring of all our woes. No one can say that, if the perpetrator of this fiendish deed be arrested, he should not undergo the extremest penalty of the law known for crime: none will say that mercy should interpose. But is he alone guilty? Here, gentlemen, you perhaps expect me to present some indication of my future policy. One thing I will say: every era teaches its lesson. The times we live in are not without instruction. The American people must be taught—if they do not already feel—that treason is a crime and must be punished. The Government must be strong not only to protect but to punish. When we turn to the criminal code we find arson laid down as a crime with its appropriate penalty. We find theft and murder denounced as crimes, and their appropriate penalties prescribed; and there, too, we find the last and highest of crimes—treason. The people must understand that treason is the blackest of crimes and will surely be punished. Let it be engraven on every mind that treason is a crime, and traitors shall suffer its penalty. I do not harbor bitter or resentful feelings toward any. When the question of exercising mercy comes before me it will be considered calmly, judicially—remembering that I am the Executive of the nation. I know men love to have their names spoken of in connection with acts of mercy, and how easy it is to yield to that impulse. But we must never forget that what may be mercy to the individual is cruelty to the state."

The President spoke in similar vein to other delegations. To a representative body of Southern loyalists who had been driven to the North he repeated his views with great earnestness and deep feeling:

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

"It is hardly necessary for me on this occasion to declare that my sympathies and impulses in connection with this nefarious rebellion beat in unison with yours. Those who have passed through this bitter ordeal and who participated in it to a great extent are more competent, as I think, to judge and determine the true policy that should be pursued. I know how to appreciate the condition of being driven from one's home. I can sympathize with him whose all has been taken from him: I can sympathize with him who has been driven from the place that gave his children birth.

"I have become satisfied that mercy without justice is a crime. The time has come when the people should be taught to understand the length and breadth, the height and depth of the crime of treason. One who has become distinguished in the rebellion says that 'when traitors become numerous enough treason becomes respectable, and to become a traitor is to constitute a portion of the aristocracy of the country.' God protect the American people against such an aristocracy! When the Government of the United States shall ascertain who are the conscious and intelligent traitors the penalty and the forfeit should be paid."

To a Pennsylvania delegation headed by ex-Secretary Simon Cameron he said:

"There has been an effort since this rebellion began to make the impression that it was a mere political struggle, or, as I see it thrown out in some of the papers, a struggle for the ascendency of certain principles from the dawn of the government to the present time, and now settled by the final triumph of the Federal arms. If this is admitted, the Government is at an end; for no question can arise but they will make it a party issue, and then to whatever length they carry it the party defeated will be only a party defeated, with no crime attaching thereto. But I say treason is a crime, the very highest crime known to the law, and there are men who ought to suffer the penalty of their treason! . . . To the unconscious, the deceived, the conscripted, in short, to the great mass of the misled, I would say mercy, clemency, reconciliation, and the restoration of their government. But to those who have deceived, to the conscious, intelligent, influential traitor who attempted to destroy the life of a nation, I would say, on you be inflicted the severest penalties of your crime."

The President inherited the Cabinet of his predecessor:

William H. Seward [N. Y.], Secretary of State.
Hugh McCulloch [Ind.], Secretary of the Treasury.
Edwin M. Stanton [O.], Secretary of War.
Gideon Welles [Conn.], Secretary of the Navy.
James Harlan [Ia.], Secretary of the Interior.
William Dennison [O.], Postmaster-General.
James Speed [Ky.], Attorney-General.

McCulloch, Welles, and Speed favored a conservative plan of reconstruction; Stanton, Harlan, and Dennison a radical plan.

Seward's position was in doubt. It was not until May 1 that he had recovered sufficiently from the murderous assault upon him by Lewis Payne Powell to be informed of public affairs. By the 10th of the month he was well enough to confer with the President, and by the 20th he returned to his duties in his department.

In his conference with the President, Seward, who, more than any living man with the possible exception of Charles Sumner, had cause to hate the South, inclined to mercy toward that section. Says Mr. Blaine: "He was firmly persuaded that the wisest plan of reconstruction was the one which would be speediest; that for the sake of impressing the world with the strength and the marvelous power of self-government, with its law, its order, its peace, we should at the earliest possible moment have every State restored to its normal relations with the Union. He did not believe that guaranty of any kind beyond an oath of renewed loyalty was needful. He was willing to place implicit faith in the coercive power of self-interest operating upon the men lately in rebellion. He agreed neither with the President's proclaimed policy of blood, nor with that held by the vast majority of his own political associates, which, avoiding the rigor of personal punishment, sought by exclusion from political honor and emolument to administer wholesome discipline to the men who had brought peril to the Government and suffering to the people. He believed, moreover, that the legislation which should affect the South, now that peace had returned, should be shared by representatives of that section, and that, as such participation must at last come if we were to have a restored republic, the wisest policy was to concede it at once, and not nurture by delay a new form of discontent and induce by withholding confidence a new phase of distrust and disobedience among the Southern people."

Secretary Seward's views made a strong impression on the President, indeed, so completely won him from his former views that he was ready to proclaim a policy of reconstruction without attempting the indictment of even one traitor or issuing a warrant for the arrest of a single participant in the Rebellion aside from those suspected of personal crime in connection with the noted conspiracy of assassination.

Leading men of the South, seeing this change of temper in the President, helped to fix it. Dropping their former contemptuous attitude toward him and cultivating his friendship they applauded his consistent adherence to the Democratic theory that the rights of a State were inherent and inalienable.

On May 29 two decisive steps were taken in the work of reconstruction. Both steps proceeded on the theory that every act needful for the rehabilitation of the seceded States could be accomplished by the Executive

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

Department of the Government. This was known to be the favorite doctrine of Mr. Seward, and the President readily acquiesced in its correctness. Mr. Seward had no difficulty in persuading him that he possessed, as President, every power needful to accomplish the complete reconstruction of the rebellious States.

The first of these important acts was a proclamation of amnesty and pardon to "all persons who have directly or indirectly participated in the existing Rebellion" upon the condition that such persons should take an oath declaring that henceforth they would "faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the union of the States thereunder," and that they would also "abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing Rebellion, with reference to the emancipation of slaves."

Certain classes were exempted from the benefits of amnesty: (1) Confederate diplomatists and foreign agents; (2) those who had left offices in the Federal judiciary to engage in the Rebellion; (3) officers in the Confederate army above the rank of colonel; (4) those who had left seats in Congress to join the Rebellion; (5) those who had resigned from the Federal army to join the Rebellion; (6) those who had maltreated prisoners in contravention of the laws of war (this was aimed at those who had abused negro prisoners); (7) absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the Rebellion (this was aimed at certain persons going over the Canadian border and concocting schemes for burning Northern cities, introducing infectious diseases in the loyal States, etc.); (8) Rebel officers who were West Point graduates; (9) Confederate State governors; (10) citizens of loyal States who had left these to aid the Rebellion; (11) those who had been engaged in destroying commerce on the high seas and Great Lakes; (12) prisoners of war still in custody for offences against the Government; (13) rebels owning taxable property over $20,000 in value (discrimination between rich and poor rebels was insisted on by the President and prevailed against the opposition of Seward, who assented to it only on the prospect that few men were left in the Confederacy who possessed the wealth mentioned).

This proclamation was much like that issued by President Lincoln on December 8, 1863, with the saving exception of a proviso which invited individuals of the excluded classes to apply for clemency to the President and virtually assured them of pardon except in cases of aggravated guilt.

Within nine months after the proclamation about 14,000 pardons were sought for and granted.

The second act looking toward the restoration of the South to its national rights was an executive proclamation appointing William W. Holden provisional governor of North Carolina and authorizing him to call a State convention "to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefor and its people against invasion, insurrections, and domestic violence."

It was specially provided in the proclamation that in "choosing delegates to any State convention no person shall be qualified as an elector or eligible as a member unless he shall have previously taken the prescribed oath of allegiance, and unless he shall also possess the qualifications of a voter as defined under the constitution and laws of North Carolina as they existed on the 20th of May, 1861, immediately prior to the so-called ordinance of secession." Says Mr. Blaine: "Mr. Lincoln had in mind, as was shown by his letter to Governor Hahn of Louisiana, to try the experiment of negro suffrage, beginning with those who had served in the Union army and who could read and write; but President Johnson's plan confined the suffrage to white men, by prescribing the same qualifications as were required in North Carolina before the war."

The President directed all the departments of the Federal Government to reëstablish their functions in the State, and this was done.

On June 13 Mississippi was treated in the same manner as North Carolina, William L. Sharkey being appointed Provisional Governor. On June 17 this treatment was accorded to Georgia (James Johnson, Provisional Governor), and to Texas (Andrew J. Hamilton, Provisional Governor); on June 21, Alabama (Lewis E. Parsons); on June 30, South Carolina (Benjamin F. Perry), and on July 13, Florida (William Marvin), completing the list of States in which loyal governments had not been formed during Lincoln's administration.

This plan rendered it possible, and indeed certain, that State officers would be chosen for the permanent organization of the States who had not taken oath of allegiance to the Federal Government. Accordingly it met at once with great opposition among the people and their representatives in Congress. These said that it would hand over all the State governments to the very traitors who had instigated the Rebellion, and that the negroes, being deprived of the elective franchise, would not be able to maintain their freedom. The latter sentiment wrought on the President so powerfully that, against his own wish, he was compelled to address a circular to his provisional governors, suggesting that the elective franchise should be extended to all persons of color "who can read the Constitution of the United States and write their names, and also to those who own real estate valued at not less than two hundred and fifty dollars and pay taxes thereon."

In writing to Governor Sharkey of Mississippi in relation to this subject the President argued that his recommendations touching colored suffrage could be adopted "with perfect safety," and that thereby "the Southern States would be placed, with reference to free persons of color, upon the same basis with the free States." That Mr. Johnson, says Mr. Blaine, made this recommendation simply from policy and not from any proper conception of its inherent justice is indicated by the closing paragraph in his letter to Governor Sharkey. Indeed, by imprudent language the President made an unnecessary exposure of the character of his motives, and deprived himself of much of the credit which might otherwise have belonged to him. "I hope and trust," he wrote to his Mississippi governor, "that your convention will do this, and as a consequence the Radicals, who are wild upon negro franchise, will be completely foiled in their attempt to keep the Southern States from renewing their relations to the Union by not accepting their Senators and Representatives."

The whole scheme of reconstruction, as originated by Mr. Seward and adopted by the President, was in operation by the middle of July. The rapid and thorough change in the President's position was clearly discerned by the people. His course of procedure was dividing the Republican party and already encouraging the hopes of those in the North who had been the steady opponents of Mr. Lincoln's war policy, and of those in the South who had sought for four years to destroy the republic. It soon became evident that the Northern Democrats who had been opposed to the war, and the Southern Democrats who had been defeated in the war, would unite in political action. Public interest was therefore transferred for the time from the acts of the President at the national capital to the acts of the reconstruction conventions about to assemble in the South.

Reconstruction Conventions in the South

Every convention called in the South to reconstruct the State governments assumed that the old State consitutions were in full force, and proceeded to amend these only so far as, in their opinion, it was necessary to secure their recognition by the Federal Government. In not one instance did they submit for ratification these constitutions to the people of the States which were affected, but, assuming their adoption, at once ordered the election of Representatives in Congress. These elections were dominated by former secessionists, with the result that men of this class, with few exceptions, were chosen to enter the halls of the national legislature. Upon this action a joint committee of Congress (William P. Fessenden, of Maine, chairman) subsequently commented as follows:

> "Hardly is the war closed before the people of the insurrectionary States come forward and haughtily claim, as a right, the privilege of participating at once in that Government which they have for four years been fighting to overthrow. Allowed and encouraged by the Executive to organize State governments, they at once placed in power leading rebels, unrepentant and unpardoned, excluding with contempt those who had manifested an attachment to the Union, and preferring in many > instances those who had rendered themselves peculiarly obnoxious. In the face of the law requiring an oath that would necessarily exclude all such men from Federal offices, they have elected, with very few exceptions, as Senators and Representatives in Congress, the very men who have actively participated in the rebellion, insultingly denouncing the law as unconstitutional."

The oath referred to in the committee's report is that popularly known as the "Ironclad oath," prescribed by the Act of July 2, 1862, to be taken by every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, the President alone excepted. The officer before entering upon his duties was compelled to swear that he had "never voluntarily borne arms against the United States"; that he had "voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the National Government"; that he had "neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States"; that he had "never yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto."

Nevertheless former secessionists, such as Alexander H. Stephens, sought election to the Senate and House, boasting that they would prove the unconstitutionality of the Ironclad oath and demand their seats.

Mr. Stephens secured an election to the Senate and was present in Washington at the ensuing session of Congress, asking admission to a seat, says Mr. Blaine, as coolly as if every living man had forgotten that for four years he had been exerting his utmost effort to destroy the Constitution under which he now claimed the full rights of a citizen. Mr. Stephens even went so far as to point out to the loyal men in Congress how they were depriving him of his rights by demanding an oath of loyalty and good faith as the condition on which he should be entitled to take part in legislating for the restored Union.

Accordingly the same committee declared further that:

"Professing no repentance, glorying apparently in the crime they had committed, avowing still, as the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Stephens and many others proves, an adherence to the pernicious doctrine of secession, and declaring that they yielded only to necessity, these men insist with unanimous voice upon their rights as States, and proclaim that they will submit to no conditions whatever as preliminary to their resumption of power under that Constitution which they still claim the right to repudiate."

The report of the Congressional Committee further stated that:

"The Southern press, with few exceptions, abounds with weekly and daily abuse of the institutions and people of the loyal States; defends the men who led, and the principles which incited, the rebellion; denounces and reviles Southern men who adhered to the Union; and strives constantly and unscrupulously, by every means in its power, to keep alive the fire and hate and discord between the sections; calling upon the President to violate his oath of office, overturn the Government by force of arms, and drive the representatives of the people from their seats in Congress. The national banner is openly insulted and the national airs scoffed at, not only by an ignorant populace, but at public meetings. In one State [Virginia] the leading general of the rebel armies [Robert E. Lee] is openly nominated for governor by the House of Delegates, and the nomination is hailed by the people with shouts of satisfaction and openly indorsed by the press."

The committee averred that:

"Witnesses of the highest character testify that, without the protection of United States troops, Union men, whether of Northern or Southern origin, would be obliged to abandon their homes. The feeling in many portions of the country toward the emancipated slaves, especially among the ignorant and uneducated, is one of vindictive and malicious hatred. The deep-seated prejudice against color is assiduously cultivated by the public journals and leads to acts of cruelty, oppression, and murder, which the local authorities are at no pains to prevent or punish."

It was further declared by the committee:

"That the evidence of an intense hostility to the Federal Union, and an equally intense love for the late Confederacy, nurtured by the war, is decisive. While it appears that nearly all are willing to submit, at least for the time being, to the Federal authority, it is equally clear that the ruling motive is a desire to obtain the advantages which will be derived from a representation in Congress."

It was also proved before the committee, on the admissions of witnesses who had been prominent in the Rebellion, that "the generally prevailing opinion in the late Confederacy defends the legal right of secession and upholds the doctrine that the first allegiance of the people is due to the States and not to the United States." It was further admitted by the same class of witnesses that "the taxes levied by the United States will be paid only on compulsion and with great reluctance," and that "the people of the rebellious States would, if they could see a prospect of success, repudiate the national debt." It was stated by witnesses from the South, with evident pride, that "officers of the Union army, on duty in the South, and Northern men who go there to engage in business, are generally detested and proscribed," and that "Southern men who adhered to the Union are bitterly hated and relentlessly persecuted."

When the Southern legislatures assembled they passed laws practically nullifying the Thirteenth Amendment. Says Mr. Blaine: Both in the civil and criminal code the treatment of the negro was different from that to which the white man was subjected. He was compelled to work under a series of labor laws applicable only to his own race. The laws of vagrancy were so changed as, in many of their provisions, to apply only to him, and under their operation all freedom of movement and transit was denied. The liberty to sell his time at a fair market rate was destroyed by the interposition of apprentice laws. Avenues of usefulness and skill in which he might specially excel were closed against him lest he should compete with white men.

The attitude of the South caused a great advance in radical sentiment at the North. Men who had hitherto been unwilling to accord the elective franchise to the negro even in their own States began to believe that the grant of this throughout the Union was the only safeguard that could be given to save him from being practically remanded to slavery. This opinion of the people was reflected in the views of their national representatives, and observers of the signs of the times prophesied that the President's plan of reconstruction, under which the Southern States had perpetrated their acts, would be overturned at the coming session of Congress.

Investigations of Southern Conditions

During the summer of 1865 the President commissioned General Carl Schurz to travel through the South investigating political conditions in order to see if there was warrant to reëstablish governments of the States lately in rebellion. General Schurz started on his mission early in July and was engaged upon it until the middle of autumn, traveling through South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. His conclusions as summarized by Mr. Blaine were as follows:

The loyalty of the masses and of most of the leaders of the South "consists in submission to necessity." Except in individual instances there is "an entire absence of that national spirit which forms the basis of true loyalty and patriotism.

"The emancipation of the slaves is submitted to only in so far as chattel slavery in the old form could not be kept up; and, although the freedman is no longer considered the property of the individual master, he is considered the slave of society, and all independent State legislation will share the tendency to make him such. The ordinances abolishing slavery, passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude. Practical attempts," Mr.

Schurz continued, "on the part of the Southern people to deprive the negro of his rights as a freedman may result in bloody collision, and will certainly plunge Southern society into resistless fluctuations and anarchical confusion."

These evils, in the opinion of Mr. Schurz, "can be prevented only by continuing the control of the National Government in the States lately in rebellion until free labor is fully developed and firmly established. This desirable result will be hastened by a firm declaration on the part of the Government that national control in the South will not cease until such results are secured." It was Mr. Schurz's judgment that "it will hardly be possible to secure the freedman against oppressive legislation and private persecution unless he be endowed with a certain measure of political power." He felt sure of the fact that, the "extension of the franchise to the colored people upon the development of free labor and upon the security of human rights in the South being the principal object in view, the objections raised upon the ground of the ignorance of the freedmen become unimportant."

Mr. Schurz made an intelligent argument in favor of negro suffrage. He was persuaded that the Southern people would never grant suffrage to the negro voluntarily, and that "the only manner in which the Southern people can be induced to grant to the freedmen some measure of self-protecting power, in the form of suffrage, is to make it a condition precedent to readmission." He remarked upon the extraordinary delusion then pervading a portion of the public mind regarding the deportation of the freedmen. "The South," he said, stands in need of an increase and not a diminution of its laboring force to repair the losses and disasters of the last four years. Much is said of importing European laborers and Northern men. This is the favorite idea among planters who want such emigrants to work on their plantations, but they forget that European and Northern men will not come to the South to serve as hired hands on the plantations, but to acquire property for themselves; and even if the whole European emigration, at the rate of two hundred thousand a year, were turned into the South, leaving not a single man for the North and West, it would require between fifteen and twenty years to fill the vacuum caused by the deportation of freedmen."

Mr. Schurz desired not to be understood as saying that "there are no well-meaning men among those who are compromised in the Rebellion. There are many, but neither their number nor their influence is strong enough to control the manifest tendency of the popular spirit." Apprehending that his report might be antagonized by evidence of a contrary spirit shown in the South by the action of their conventions, Mr. Schurz declared that it was "dangerous to be led by such evidence into any delusions. As to the motives," said Mr. Schurz, "upon which the Southern people acted when abolishing slavery (in their conventions) and their understanding of the bearings of such acts, we may safely accept the standard they have set up for themselves." The only argument of justification was that "they found themselves in a situation where they could do no better." A prominent Mississippian (General W. L. Brandon) said in a public card, according to Mr. Schurz, "My honest conviction is that we must accept the situation until we can once more get control of our own State affairs . . . I must submit for the time to evils I cannot remedy." Mr. Schurz expressed his conviction that General Brandon had "only put in print what a majority of the people say in more emphatic language."

By the time General Schurz's report reached him (in November, 1865) the President had gone too far in his reconstruction policy to recede from it. Accordingly he secured a report upon the same points from Lieut.-Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, who had just completed a very brief tour of military inspection through a number of the States covered by General Schurz. General Grant's report was brief but positive; he declared his belief that "the mass of thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith." At the same time he thought that four years of war had left the Southern people in a condition hardly to yield proper obedience to civil authority, and he therefore recommended that small garrisons should be maintained throughout the region "until such time as labor returns to its proper channels and civil authority is fully established."

He advised, however, that no negroes be stationed in the garrisons, as their presence would demoralize labor and cause their camps to be a resort of the freedmen.

The white people, he said, were "anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible," and were willing and anxious to receive protection from the Government during the process of reconstruction. All they desired was not to be humiliated.

"The questions," continued General Grant, "heretofore dividing the people of the two sections—slavery and the right of secession—the Southern men regard as having been settled forever by the tribunal of arms," and some of the leading men regarded it as having been fortunately settled for the whole country.

He advised that the Freedmen's Bureau be placed under the officers of the various Southern military departments, for economy's sake and to secure uniform and responsible action. His general comment on the bureau was adverse—it tended to impress the freedman with the idea that he would not be compelled to work and that the lands of the former masters would be divided among their former slaves.

In the succeeding debates on reconstruction these reports were drawn from the President by Congress; that of General Schurz was quoted largely by the Opposition, and that of General Grant by the Administration, in support of the opposing contentions.

The new Congress (the Thirty-ninth) assembled on December 4, 1865. Each chamber was Republican by a large majority. Schuyler Colfax [Ind.] was elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. In accepting the office he said:

Safeguarding Civil Rights

Speaker Colfax

The duties of Congress are as obvious as the sun's pathway in the heavens. Representing, in its two branches, the States and the people, its first and highest obligation is to guarantee to every State a republican form of government. The rebellion having overthrown constitutional State governments in many States, it is yours to mature and enact legislation which, with the concurrence of the Executive, shall establish them anew on such a basis of enduring justice as will guarantee all necessary safeguards to the people, and afford, what our Magna Charta, the Declaration of Independence, proclaims is the chief object of government—protection to all men in their inalienable rights. [Applause.] The world should witness, in this great work, the most inflexible fidelity, the most earnest devotion, to the principles of liberty and humanity, the truest patriotism, and the wisest statesmanship.

Heroic men, by hundreds of thousands, have died that the Republic might live. The emblems of mourning have darkened White House and cabin alike. But the fires of civil war have melted every fetter in the land, and proved the funeral pyre of slavery. [Applause.] It is for you, Representatives, to do your work as faithfully and as well as did the fearless saviors of the Union on their more dangerous arena of duty. Then we may hope to see the vacant and once abandoned seats around us gradually filling up, until this hall shall contain Representatives from every State and district; their hearts devoted to the Union for which they are to legislate, jealous of its honor, proud of its glory, watchful of its rights, and hostile to its enemies. And the stars on our banner, that paled when the States they represented arrayed themselves in arms against the nation, will shine with a more brilliant light of loyalty than ever before.

No Senators nor Representatives were seated at this time from the formerly rebellious States, though there were several claimants present. The feeling of the House of Representatives in this matter was clearly shown by its refusal to vote on a resolution of William E. Niblack [Ind.] according the claimants the customary privileges of the floor.

Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] moved that a joint committee of fifteen be appointed, nine members from the House and six from the Senate, to investigate the condition of the States formerly in secession and report upon whether or not they were entitled to representation in Congress. The resolution was received by the House, but when presented next day in the Senate it was ordered to lie over one day. Credentials were received in the Senate from William L. Sharkey and James L. Alcorn, elected by the legislature of Mississippi, and were laid on the table.

On the same day Charles Sumner [Mass.] introduced in the Senate resolutions significant of the gathering opposition to the President's reconstruction policy. These defined the duty of Congress in respect to guaranties of the national security and national faith in the rebel States. They declared that, in order to provide proper guaranties for security in the future, "Congress should take care that no one of the rebellious States should be allowed to resume its relations to the Union until after the satisfactory performance of five several conditions, which must be submitted to a popular vote and be sanctioned by a majority of the people in each of those States respectively."

Mr. Sumner demanded first "the complete reëstablishment of loyalty, as shown by an honest recognition of the unity of the republic and the duty of allegiance to it at all times without mental reservation or equivocation of any kind. How Mr. Sumner, says Mr. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress," could determine that "the recognition of the unity of the republic" was honest, how he could know whether there was not, after all, a mental reservation on the part of the rebels now swearing allegiance, he did not attempt to inform the Senate. The second condition demanded "the complete suppression of all oligarchical pretensions and the complete enfranchisement of all citizens, so that there shall be no denial of rights on account of race or color." The third condition was "the rejection of the rebel debt and the adoption in just proportions of the national debt and the national obligations to Union soldiers, with solemn pledges never to join in any measure, directly or indirectly, for their repudiation or in any way tending to impair the national credit." The fourth condition was "the organization of an educational system for the equal benefit of all, without distinction of color or race." The fifth had some of the objectionable features of his first, demanding "the choice of citizens for office, whether State or national, of constant and undoubted loyalty, whose conduct and conversation shall give assurance of peace and reconciliation." The rebel States were not to be, in Mr. Sumner's language, "precipitated back to political power and independence, but must wait until these conditions are, in all respects, fulfilled." In addition he desired a declaration of the Senate that "the Thirteenth Amendment, abolishing slavery, has become and is a part of the Constitution of the United States, having received the approval of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States adhering to the Union." He declared that "the votes of the States in rebellion are not necessary in any way to its adoption, but they must all agree to it through their legislatures as a condition precedent to their restoration to their full rights as members of the Union." With these resolutions Mr. Sumner submitted another long series declaratory of the duty of Congress in respect to loyal citizens in the rebel States. His first series had defined what the lately rebellious States must agree to by popular vote, and now he outlined quite fully what would be the duty of Congress respecting the admission of those States to representation in the Senate and the House. The central fact of the whole series was that the color of the skin must not exclude a loyal man from civil rights.

On the next day (December 5) the two chambers met to hear the first annual message of the President.

Admit the States with Conditional Guaranties

First Annual Message of President Johnson

After deploring the assassination "by an act of parricidal treason" of his predecessor, whom he extolled as the savior of the Union and a statesman to whose memory the whole world was rendering justice, he said that the sad event had cast upon himself a "heavier weight of cares than had ever devolved upon any one of his (Lincoln's) predecessors," and that he therefore asked "the support and confidence" of Congress and the people.

The Union of the United States of America was intended by its authors to last as long as the States themselves shall last. "The Union shall be perpetual," are the words of the Confederation. "To form a more perfect Union," by an ordinance of the people of the United States, is the declared purpose of the Constitution.

The Constitution contains within itself ample resources for its own preservation. It has power to enforce the laws, punish treason, and insure domestic tranquillity. In case of the usurpation of the government of a State by one man, or an oligarchy, it becomes a duty of the United States to make good the guaranty to that State of a republican form of government, and so to maintain the homogeneousness of all. Does the lapse of time reveal defects? A simple mode of amendment is provided in the Constitution itself, so that its conditions can always be made to conform to the requirements of advancing civilization. No room is allowed even for the thought of a possibility of its coming to an end. The Constitution is the work of "the people of the United States," and it should be as indestructible as the people.

It is not strange that the framers of the Constitution, which had no model in the past, should not have fully comprehended the excellence of their own work. Fresh from a struggle against arbitrary power, many patriots suffered from harassing fears of an absorption of the State governments by the general Government, and many from a dread that the States would break away from their orbits. But the very greatness of our country should allay the apprehension of encroachments by the general Government. The subjects that come unquestionably within its jurisdiction are so numerous that it must ever naturally refuse to be embarrassed by questions that lie beyond it. Were it otherwise, the Executive would sink beneath the burden; the channels of justice would be choked; legislation would be obstructed by excess; so that there is a greater temptation to exercise some of the functions of the general Government through the States than to trespass on their rightful sphere. "The absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority" was, at the beginning of the century, enforced by Jefferson "as the vital principle of republics," and the events of the last four years have established, we will hope forever, that there lies no appeal to force.

The maintenance of the Union brings with it "the support of the State governments in all their rights"; but it is not one of the rights of any State government to renounce its own place in the Union, or to nullify the laws of the Union. The largest liberty is to be maintained in the discussion of the acts of the Federal Government; but there is no appeal from its laws, except to the various branches of that Government itself, or to the people, who grant to the members of the legislative and of the executive departments no tenure but a limited one, and in that manner always retain the powers of redress.

"The sovereignty of the States" is the language of the Confederacy, and not the language of the Constitution. The latter contains the emphatic words, "The Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Certainly the Government of the United States is a limited government; and so is every State government a limited government. With us, this idea of limitation spreads through every form of administration, general, State, and municipal, and rests on the great distinguishing principle of the recognition of the rights of man. The ancient republics absorbed the individual in the state, prescribed his religion, and controlled his activity. The American system rests on the assertion of the equal right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; to freedom of conscience, to the culture and exercise of all his faculties. As a consequence, the State government is limited, as to the general Government in the interests of union, as to the individual citizen in the interest of freedom.

States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the Constitution of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by States; so also were the Articles of Confederation; and when "the people of the United States" ordained and established the Constitution, it was the assent of the States, one by one, which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the Constitution, the proposition of Congress needs the confirmation of States. Without States, one great branch of the legislative government would be wanting. And, if we look beyond the letter of the Constitution to the character of our country, its capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire is due to the system of States. The best security for the perpetual existence of the States is the "supreme authority" of the Constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the Constitution brings with it the perpetuity of the States; their mutual relation makes us what we are, and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures the States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other.

I have thus explained my views of the mutual relations of the Constitution and the States, because they unfold the principles on which I have sought to solve the momentous questions and overcome the appalling difficulties that met me at the very commencement of my administration. It has been my steadfast object to escape from the sway of momentary passions, and to derive a healing policy from the fundamental and unchanging principles of the Constitution.

I found the States suffering from the effects of a civil war. Resistance to the general Government appeared to have exhausted itself. The United States had recovered possession of their forts and arsenals; and their armies were in the occupation of every State which had attempted to secede. Whether the territory within the limits of those States should be held as conquered territory, under military authority emanating from the President as the head of the army, was the first question that presented itself for decision.

Now, military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of discontent; would have divided the people into the vanquishers and the vanquished; and would have envenomed hatred, rather than have restored affection. Once established, no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration to and from that portion of the country is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony; and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home, would place himself willingly under military rule? The chief persons who would have followed in the train of the army would have been dependents on the general Government, or men who expected profit from the miseries of their erring fellow citizens. The powers of patronage and rule which would have been exercised, under the President, over a vast and populous and naturally wealthy region are greater than, unless under extreme necessity, I should be willing to intrust to any one man; they are such as, for myself, I could never, unless on occasions of great emergency, consent to exercise. The willful use of such powers, if continued through a period of years, would have endangered the purity of the general administration and the liberties of the States which remained loyal.

Besides, the policy of military rule over a conquered territory would have implied that the States whose inhabitants may have taken part in the rebellion had, by the act of those inhabitants, ceased to exist. But the true theory is that all pretended acts of secession were, from the beginning, null and void. The States cannot commit treason, nor screen the individual citizens who may have committed treason, any more than they can make valid treaties or engage in lawful commerce with any foreign power. The States attempting to secede placed themselves in a condition where their vitality was impaired, but not extinguished—their functions suspended, but not destroyed.

But if any State neglects or refuses to perform its offices there is the more need that the general Government should maintain all its authority, and, as soon as practicable, resume the exercise of all its functions. On this principle I have acted, and have gradually and quietly, and by almost imperceptible steps, sought to restore the rightful energy of the general Government and of the States. To that end, provisional governors have been appointed for the States, conventions called, governors elected, legislatures assembled, and Senators and Representatives chosen to the Congress of the United States. At the same time the courts of the United States, as far as could be done, have been reopened, so that the laws of the United States may be enforced through their agency. The blockade has been removed and the custom houses reëstablished in ports of entry, so that the revenue of the United States may be collected. The Post-Office Department renews its ceaseless activity, and the general Government is thereby enabled to communicate promptly with its officers and agents. The courts bring security to persons and property; the opening of the ports invites the restoration of industry and commerce; the post-office renews the facilities of social intercourse and of business. And is it not happy for us all that the restoration of each one of these functions of the general Government brings with it a blessing to the States over which they are extended? Is it not a sure promise of harmony and renewed attachment to the Union that, after all that has happened, the return of the general Government is known only as a beneficence?

I know very well that this policy is attended with some risk; that for its success it requires at least the acquiescence of the States which it concerns; that it implies an invitation to those States, by renewing their allegiance to the United States, to resume their functions as States of the Union. But it is a risk that must be taken; in the choice of difficulties, it is the smallest risk; and to diminish, and, if possible, to remove, all danger I have felt it incumbent on me to assert one other power of the general Government—the power of pardon. As no State can throw a defence over the crime of treason, the power of pardon is exclusively vested in the executive Government of the United States. In exercising that power I have taken every precaution to connect it with the clearest recognition of the binding force of the laws of the United States, and an unqualified acknowledgment of the great social change of condition in regard to slavery which has grown out of the war.

The next step which I have taken to restore the constitutional relations of the States has been an invitation to them to participate in the high office of amending the Constitution. Every patriot must wish for a general amnesty at the earliest epoch consistent with public safety. For this great end there is need of a concurrence of all opinions, and the spirit of mutual conciliation. All parties in the late terrible conflict must work together in harmony. It is not too much to ask, in the name of the whole people, that, on the one side, the plan of restoration shall proceed in conformity with a willingness to cast the disorders of the past into oblivion; and that, on the other, the evidence of sincerity in the future maintenance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which provides for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of our country. So long as the adoption of this amendment is delayed, so long will doubt and jealousy and uncertainty prevail. This is the measure which will efface the sad memory of the past; this is the measure which will most certainly call population and capital and security to those parts of the Union that need them most. Indeed, it is not too much to ask of the States which are now resuming their places in the family of the Union to give this pledge of perpetual loyalty and peace. Until it is done, the past, however much we may desire it, will not be forgotten. The adoption of the amendment reunites us beyond all power of disruption. It heals the wound that is still imperfectly closed; it removes slavery, the element which has so long perplexed and divided the country; it makes of us once more a united people, renewed and strengthened, bound more than ever to mutual affection and support.

The amendment to the Constitution being adopted, it would remain for the States, whose powers have been so long in abeyance, to resume their places in the two branches of the national legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration. Here it is for you, fellow citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members.

The full assertion of the powers of the general Government requires the holding of circuit courts of the United States within the districts where their authority has been interrupted. In the present posture of our public affairs, strong objections have been urged to holding those courts in any of the States where the rebellion has existed; and it was ascertained by inquiry that the circuit court of the United States would not be held within the district of Virginia during the autumn or early winter, nor until Congress should have "an opportunity to consider and act on the whole subject." To your deliberations the restoration of this branch of the civil authority of the United States is therefore necessarily referred, with the hope that early provision will be made for the resumption of all its functions. It is manifest that treason, most flagrant in its character, has been committed. Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country, in order that the Constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated; the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished, and the offence made infamous; and, at the same time, that the question may be judicially settled, finally and forever, that no State of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union.

The relations of the general Government toward the four million inhabitants whom the war has called into freedom have engaged my most serious consideration. On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors by the proclamation of the Executive, I took for my counsel the Constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise. During the period of the Confederacy there continued to exist a very great diversity in the qualifications of electors in the several States; and even within a State a distinction of qualifications prevailed with regard to the officers who were to be chosen. The Constitution of the United States recognizes these diversities when it enjoins that, in the choice of members of the House of Representatives of the United States, "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." After the formation of the Constitution it remained, as before, the uniform usage for each State to enlarge the body of its electors, according to its own judgment; and, under this system, one State after another has proceeded to increase the number of its electors, until now universal suffrage, or something very near it, is the general rule. So fixed was this reservation of power in the habits of the people, and so unquestioned has been the interpretation of the Constitution, that during the Civil War the late President never harbored the purpose—certainly never avowed the purpose—of disregarding it; and in the acts of Congress during that period nothing can be found which, during the continuance of hostilities, much less after their close, would have sanctioned any departure by the Executive from a policy which has so uniformly obtained. Moreover, a concession of the elective franchise to the freedmen, by act of the President of the United States, must have been extended to all colored men, wherever found, and so much have established a change of suffrage in the Northern, Middle, and Western States, not less than in the Southern and Southwestern. Such an act would have created a new class of voters, and would have been an assumption of power by the President which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted.

On the other hand, every danger of conflict is avoided when the settlement of the question is referred to the several States. They can, each for itself, decide on the measure, and whether it is to be adopted at once and absolutely or introduced gradually and with conditions. In my judgment, the freedmen, if they show patience and manly virtues, will sooner obtain a participation in the elective franchise through the States than through the general Government, even if it had power to intervene. When the tumult of emotions that have been raised by the suddenness of the social change shall have subsided it may prove that they will receive the kindliest usage from some of those on whom they have heretofore most closely depended.

But while I have no doubt that now, after the close of the war, it is not competent for the general Government to extend the elective franchise in the several States, it is equally clear that good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife. We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two races to live side by side, in a state of mutual benefit and good-will. The experiment involves us in no inconsistency. Let us, then, go on and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened. The country is in need of labor, and the freedmen are in need of employment, culture, and protection. While their right of voluntary migration and expatriation is not to be questioned, I would not advise their forced removal and colonization. Let us rather encourage them to honorable and useful industry where it may be beneficial to themselves and to the country; and, instead of hasty anticipations of the certainty of failure, let there be nothing wanting to the fair trial of the experiment. The change in their condition is the substitution of labor by contract for the status of slavery. The freedman cannot fairly be accused of unwillingness to work so long as a doubt remains about his freedom of choice in his pursuits and the certainty of his recovering his stipulated wages. In this the interests of the employer and the employed coincide. The employer desires in his workmen spirit and alacrity, and these can be permanently secured in no other way. And if the one ought to be able to enforce the contract, so ought the other. The public interest will be best promoted if the several States will provide adequate protection and remedies for the freedmen. Until this is in some way accomplished there is no chance for the advantageous use of their labor; and the blame of ill success will not rest on them.

I know that sincere philanthropy is earnest for the immediate realization of its remotest aims; but time is always an element in reform. It is one of the greatest acts on record to have brought four million people into freedom. The career of free industry must be fairly opened to them; and then their future prosperity and condition must, after all, rest mainly on themselves. If they fail, and so perish away, let us be careful that the failure shall not be attributable to any denial of justice. In all that relates to the destiny of the freedman we need not be too anxious to read the future; many incidents which, from a speculative point of view, might raise alarm will quietly settle themselves.

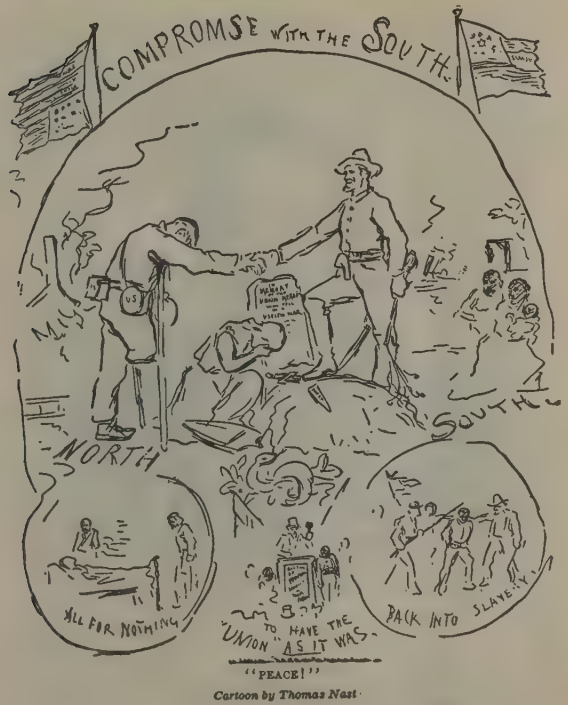
Opposition to the President's plan of reconstruction was at once shown in extreme form by resolutions introduced in the House on December 6, 1865, by John F. Farnsworth [Ill.].

Resolved (as the sense of this House), That, as all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, that cannot be regarded as a just government which denies to a large portion of its citizens [i. e., negroes], who share both its pecuniary and military burdens, the right to express either their consent or dissent to the laws which subject them to taxation and to military duty, and which refuses them full protection in the enjoyment of their inalienable rights.

Resolved, That, . . . while we have rewarded the foreigner, who is ignorant of our language and institutions, and who has but just landed upon our shores, with the right of citizenship for a brief service in the armies of the United States, good faith, as well as impartial justice, demands of this Government that it secure to the colored soldiers of the Union their equal rights and privileges as citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That we agree with the President of the United States that "mercy without justice is a crime"; and the admitting of rebels and traitors, upon whose hands the blood of slain patriots has scarcely dried, and upon whose hearts is the damning crime of starving to death loyal men taken as prisoners in battle, to the rights of citizenship and of suffrage, while we deny those rights to the loyal black man, who fought for the Union, and who fed and protected our starving soldiers, is a fit illustration of that truism.

Mr. Farnsworth demanded the previous question on his resolutions, which was refused by a vote of the House. These resolutions, together with a number of others relating to conditions to be exacted of the States lately in rebellion before they should be recognized as members of the Union, were referred to the joint committee of the House which had been appointed on December 4, 1865.



Cartoon by Thomas Nast

On the Joint Committee

Debate in the Senate, December 12, 1865

In the debate in the Senate on the appointment of this committee the lines of division between the Administration and the Opposition were clearly intimated.

Jacob M. Howard [Mich.] on December 12, wished it to be definitely pledged that, until the committee reported, neither chamber would admit representatives of the rebel States.

Sir, what is the present position and status of the rebel States? In my judgment, they are simply conquered communities; subjugated by the arms of the United States—communities in which the right of self-government does not now exist. We hold them, as we know well, as the world knows today, not by their own free will and consent as members of the Union, but solely by virtue of our superior military power, which is exerted to that effect throughout the length and breadth of the rebel States. There is in those States no rightful authority, according to my view, at this time, but that of the United States, and every political act, every governmental act exercised within their limits, must necessarily be exercised and performed under the sanction and by the will of the conqueror.

In short, sir, they are not to-day loyal States; their population are not willing to-day, if we are rightly informed, to perform peaceably, quietly, and efficiently the duties which pertain to the population of a State in the Union and of the Union; and, for one, I cannot consent to recognize them, even indirectly, as entitled to be represented in either House of Congress at this time.

James R. Doolittle [Wis.] opposed the appointment of a special committee on the subject, which, he said, since it involved constitutional matters, properly and in accordance with the practice of the Senate, should be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Passing by the injustice of an unequal representation on the joint committee, operating as it did against the Senate, he objected on principle to any joint committee acting upon the question.

Mr. President, I believe that under the Constitution, upon all subjects of legislation but one, the two Houses are equal and coördinate branches of Congress. That one relates to their representation in the bodies, to their membership, that which constitutes their existence, which is essential to their life and their independence. That is confided to each House, and to each House alone, to act for itself. One House can no more share it with the other than it can share it with the Supreme Court or with the President. It is a matter over which its jurisdiction is exclusive of every other jurisdiction. It is a matter in which its decisions, right or wrong, are absolute and without appeal. Sir, in my opinion, the Senate of the United States cannot give to a committee beyond its control this question of the representation in this body without a loss of its self-respect, its dignity, its independence; without an abandonment of its constitutional duty and a surrender of its constitutional powers.

Mr. President, there is a still graver objection to this resolution as it stands. The provision that, "until such report shall have been made and finally acted on by Congress, no member shall be received into either House from any of the so-called Confederate States," is a provision which, by law, excludes those eleven States from their representation in the Union. Sir, pass that resolution as it stands, and let it receive the signature of the President, and you have accomplished what the rebellion could not accomplish, what the sacrifice of half a million men could not accomplish in warring against this Government—you have dissolved the Union by act of Congress.

The Senator from Michigan talks about the status of these States. He may very properly raise the question whether they have any legislatures that are capable of electing Senators to this body. That is a question of fact to be considered; but as to whether they are States, and States still within the Union, notwithstanding their civil form of government has been overturned by the rebellion and their legislatures have been disorganized—that they are still States in this Union is the most sacred truth and the dearest truth to every American heart, and it will be maintained by the American people against all opposition, come from what quarter it may. Sir, the flag that now floats on the top of this Capitol bears thirty-six stars. Every star represents a State in this Union. I ask the Senator from Michigan does that flag, as it floats there, speak the nation's truth to our people and to the world or it is a hypocritical, flaunting lie? That flag has been borne at the head of our conquering legions through the whole South, planted at Vicksburg, planted at Columbia, Savannah, Charleston, Sumter; the same old flag which came down before the rebellion at Sumter was raised up again, and it still bore the same glorious stars; "not a star obscured," not one.

WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN.—Were not some of those stars obscured?

MR. DOOLITTLE.—No, sir. These people have been disorganized in their civil governments in consequence of the war; the rebels overturned civil government in the first place, and we entered with our armies and captured the rebellion; but did that destroy the States? Not at all. We entered the States to save them, not to destroy them. Our constitutional duty is to save them. and save every one of them, and not to destroy them. The guaranty in the Constitution is a guaranty to the States, and to every one of the States, and the obligation that rests upon us is to guarantee to South Carolina a republican form of government as a State in this Union, and not as a Territory. The doctrine of the territorial condition of these States, that they are mere conquered, subjugated Territories, as if we had conquered Canada or Mexico, will not stand argument for a moment. It is utterly at war with the ground on which we stand and have stood from the beginning. The ground we occupied was this: that no State nor the people of any State had any power to withdraw from the Union. They could not do it peacefully; they undertook to do it by arms; we crushed the attempt; we trampled their armies under our feet; we captured the rebellion; the States are ours; and we entered them to save and not to destroy.

The Senator then began to discuss the proceedings of the House of Representatives, when he was reminded by the president pro tem. of the Senate that such a discussion was not within the rules of order. Senator Doolittle then attained his object in parliamentary fashion by discussing the proceedings of a recent anti-administration caucus. Referring to its dominant spirit, not in his capacity as a Representative in Congress but as "a man known to history," he said:

I refer to the Hon. Thaddeus Stevens. His history is known to all men; and one thing we know of him certainly, that he is most bitterly, uncompromisingly hostile to the policy of the present Administration on the subject of reconstruction. He goes with him who goes the farthest, holding that even the State of Tennessee is an alien State at war with the United States; and, if I am not misinformed, in the convention at Baltimore which nominated Messrs. Lincoln and Johnson for President and Vice-President, he objected to the nomination of Andrew Johnson because he was an alien enemy! Sir, I have seen nothing in the history of that gentleman to lead me to suppose that he has in any respect changed his opinions, for it is not long since we read a speech of his delivered in the State of Pennsylvania, marked with his usual ability, with his great boldness, with that cool assurance which sometimes almost rises to the sublime, in which he proposed, if I do not mistake, almost the entire and universal confiscation of the whole of the Southern States.

The appointment of the joint committee, said Senator Doolittle, was pressed through the caucus in "hot haste" by Mr. Stevens, with the "cool tact and talent" for which he is distinguished.

Who does not know that the leader of that assemblage did not desire to wait, nor did he dare to wait, until the President had spoken to the country in his annual message?

The Constitution of the United States requires the President from time to time to give to Congress information of the state of the Union. Who has any right to presume that the President will not furnish the information which his constitutional duty requires? He has at his control all the agencies which are necessary. There is the able Cabinet who surround him, with all the officers appointed under them: the postmasters under the Post-Office Department, the treasury agents under the Treasury Department, and almost two hundred thousand men under the control of the War Department in every part of this "disaffected" region, who can bring to the President information from every quarter of all the transactions that exist there.

Sir, we are here claiming to be the friends of the late lamented President, and the friends of him upon whom by his death the responsibilities of power have fallen. We sided in their election. They were nominated at Baltimore after the great experiment of reconstruction had already begun. Mr. Lincoln had already for months, for almost a year, been pursuing substantially the same policy of reconstruction which has since been followed by his successor. Andrew Johnson was himself one of the agencies which had been employed by Mr. Lincoln in the State of Tennessee in the hope of restoring civil government there; and it was under these circumstances, not with the approval of all men at Washington, but with the approval of the great masses of the people of this country, that Abraham Lincoln was renominated as President, and that Andrew Johnson was nominated to be Vice-President of the United States, and they were triumphantly indorsed and sustained by the people; and I tell Senators now, in my opinion—I speak with all respect to other gentlemen—that the President of the United States will be sustained, in the views which he takes in his message, by the people of this country is as certain as the revolutions of the earth; and it is our duty to act harmoniously with him, to sustain him, to hold up his hands, to strengthen his heart, to speak to him words of faith, friendship, and courage.

Mr. President, I know that in all these Southern States there are a thousand things to give us pain, sometimes alarm, but, notwithstanding the bad appearance which from time to time presents itself in the midst of that boiling caldron of passion and excitement which the war has left still raging there, the real progress which we have made has been most wonderful. I say to you, Senators, it is my deliberate opinion that, if, when we adjourned last spring, an angel from the skies could have come down here and told us that at our meeting now our country would be in so hopeful a condition as it is, we would not have believed it; it would have been beyond our credence, beyond our belief. I am one of those who look forward with hope, for I believe God reigns and rules in the affairs of mankind. I look beyond the excitement of the hour and all the outbreaking passion which sometimes shows itself in the South, which leads them to make enactments in their legislatures which are disgraceful to themselves, and can never be sanctioned by the people of this country, and also, in spite of all the excitement of the North, I behold the future full of confidence and hope. We have only to come up like men, and stand as the real friends of the country and the Administration, and give to the policy of the President a fair and substantial trial, and all will be well.

Senator Fessenden indignantly replied:

Talk about the Administration! Sir, we are a part of the Administration, and a very important part of it. I have no idea of abandoning the prerogatives, the rights, and the duties of my position in favor of anybody, however that person or any number of persons may desire it. In questions of such infinite importance as this, involving the integrity and welfare of the Republic in all future time, we are solemnly bound, and our constituents will demand of us, that we examine them with care and fidelity, and act on our own convictions, and not upon the convictions of others.

I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Wisconsin that by passing a simple resolution raising a committee of our own body, and referring to it certain papers, if we conclude to do so, we are infringing upon the rights of anybody or making an intimation with regard to any policy that the President may have seen fit to adopt and recommend to the country. Sir, I trust there are no such things as exclusive friends of the President among us, or gentlemen who desire to be so considered. I am disposed and ready to support him to the best of my ability, as every gentleman around me is, in good faith and with kind feeling in all that he may desire that is consistent with my views of duty to the country, giving him credit for intentions as good as mine, and with ability far greater, I am ready to asseverate.

But, sir, I do not agree with the doctrine that, because a certain line of policy has been adopted by one branch of the Government, or certain views are entertained by one branch of the Government, therefore, for that reason alone and none other, that is to be tried, even if it is against my judgment; and I do not say that it is or is not. That is a question to be considered. I have a great respect, not for myself, perhaps, but for the position which I hold as a Senator of the United States; and no measure of Government, no policy of the President or of the head of a department, shall pass me, while I am a Senator, if I know it, until I have examined it and given my assent to it; not on account of the source from which it emanates, but on account of its own intrinsic merits, and because I believe it will result in the good of my country. We have just gone through a state of war. While we were in it it became necessary all around to do certain things for which perhaps no strict warrant will be found; contrary, at any rate, to previous experience. That I admit most distinctly. Sir, I defended them from the beginning. I laid down the principle that the man who, placed in a position such as the President and other officers occupied, would not, in a time of war, and when his country was in peril, put his own reputation at hazard as readily as he would anything else in order to do his duty was not fit for his place. I upheld many things then that perhaps I would not uphold now because they are not necessary. The time must come when the Senate and House of Representatives, the Congress, must revert to its own original position.

Willard Saulsbury [Del.] opposed forming the joint committee.

Sir, suppose this committee should report that those States are not entitled to representation in this body, are you bound by their action? Is there not a higher law, the supreme law of the land, which says, if they be States, that they shall each be entitled to two Senators on this floor? And shall a report of a joint committee of the two Houses override and overrule the fundamental law of the land? Sir, it is dangerous as a precedent, and I protest against it as a humble member of this body. If they be not States, then the object avowed for which the war was waged was false.

James Guthrie [Ky.] upheld the President's plan of reconstruction.

I know it has been said that the President has no authority to do these things. I read the Constitution and the laws of this country differently. He is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed"; he is to suppress insurrection and rebellion. The power is put in his hands, and I do not see why, when he marches into a rebel State, he has not authority to put down a rebel government and put up a government that is friendly to the United States, and in accordance with it; I do not see why he cannot do that while the war goes on, and I do not see why he may not do it after the war is over. The people in those States lie at the mercy of the nation. I see no usurpation in what he has done, and, if the work is well done, I, for one, am ready to accept it. Are we to send out a commission to see what the men whom he has appointed have done? It is said that they are not to be relied on; that they have been guilty of treason, and we will not trust them. I hope that no such ideas will prevail here. I think this will be a cold shock to the warm feelings of the nation for restoration, for equal privileges and equal rights. They were in insurrection. We have suppressed that insurrection. They are now States of the Union; and, if they come here according to the laws of the States, they are entitled, in my judgment, to representation, and we have no right to refuse it. They are in a minority, and they would be in a minority even if they meant now what they felt when they raised their arms against the Government; but they do not, and, of those whom they will send here to represent them, nineteen out of twenty—even some of those who took up arms against us—will be just as loyal as any of us.

I really hope to see some one move a modification of the test oath, so that those who have repented of their disloyalty may not be excluded, for I really believe that a great many of those who took up arms honestly and wished to carry out the doctrine of secession, and who have succumbed under the force of our arms and the great force of public opinion, can be trusted a great deal more than those who did not fight at all.

The joint committee as proposed by the House was then agreed upon by a vote of 33 to 11.

The members appointed upon the joint committee were: Senate—William P. Fessenden [Me.], chairman; James W. Grimes [Ia.], Ira Harris [N. Y.], Jacob M. Howard [Mich.], George H. Williams [Ore.], Republicans, and Reverdy Johnson [Md.], Democrat. House of Representatives—Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.], Elihu B. Washburne [Ill.], Justin S. Morrill [Vt.], John A. Bingham [O.], Roscoe Conkling [N. Y.], George S. Boutwell [Mass.], Henry T. Blow [Mo.], Republicans, and Andrew J. Rogers [N. J.], and Henry Grider [Ky.], Democrats.

On the following day (December 13) Henry Wilson [Mass.] brought forward in the Senate the bill "to maintain the freedom of the inhabitants in the States lately in rebellion," which he had introduced upon the first day of the session. This declared null and void all those present laws in force in these States which maintained inequality in the rights of citizens, particularly on account of race, and it prohibited the enactment of such laws in the future. Any person violating the act was to be punished by fine and imprisonment.

James G. Blaine, in his "Twenty Years of Congress," has summarized this debate as follows:

Civil Rights

Senate, December 13-20, 1865

Senator Wilson declared that he had "no desire to say harsh things of the South nor of the men who have been engaged in the Rebellion."

"I do not ask their property or their blood; I do not wish to disgrace or degrade them; but I do wish that they shall not be permitted to disgrace, degrade, or oppress anybody else. I offer this bill as a measure of humanity, as a measure that the needs of that section of the country imperatively demand at our hands. I believe that if it should pass it will receive the sanction of nineteen-twentieths of the loyal people of the country. Men may differ about the power or the expediency of giving the right of suffrage to the negro; but how any humane, just, and Christian man can for a moment permit the laws that are on the statute books of the Southern States, and the laws now pending before their legislatures, to be executed upon men whom we have declared to be free I cannot comprehend."

Reverdy Johnson [Md.] replied to Mr. Wilson in a tone of apology for the laws complained of, but took occasion to give his views of the status of the States lately in rebellion.

"I have now, and I have had from the first, a very decided opinion that they are States in the Union and that they never could have been placed out of the Union without the consent of their sister States. The insurrection terminated, the authority of the Government was thereby reinstated; eo instanti[1] they were invested with all the rights belonging to them originally—I mean as States. In my judgment our sole authority for the acts which we have done during the last four years was the authority communicated to Congress by the Constitution to suppress insurrection. If the power can only be referred to that clause, in my opinion, speaking, I repeat, with great deference to the judgment of others, the moment the insurrection was terminated there was no power whatever left in the Congress of the United States over those States; and I am glad to see, if I understand his message, that in the view I have just expressed I have the concurrence of the President of the United States."

Charles Sumner [Mass.] sustained Senator Wilson's bill in an elaborate argument delivered on the 20th of December. He declared that Mr. Wilson's bill was simply to maintain and carry out the Proclamation of Emancipation. The pledge there given was that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, would recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons.

"This pledge is without limitation in space or time. It is as extended and as immortal as the Republic itself; to that pledge we are solemnly bound; wherever our flag floats, as long as time endures, we must see that it is sacredly observed. The performance of that pledge cannot be intrusted to another, least of all to the old slave masters, embittered against their slaves. It must be performed by the National Government. The power that gave freedom must see that freedom is maintained.

"Three of England's greatest orators and statesmen, Burke, Canning, and Brougham, at successive periods unite in declaring, from the experience of the British West Indies, that whatever the slave masters undertook to do for their slaves was always arrant trifling; that, whatever might be its plausible form, it always wanted the executive principle. More recently the Emperor of Russia, in ordering the emancipation of the serfs, declared that all previous efforts had failed because they had been left to the spontaneous initiative of the proprietors. I assume that we shall not leave to the old slave proprietors the maintenance of that freedom to which we are pledged, and thus break our own promise and sacrifice a race."

In concluding his speech Mr. Sumner referred to the enormity of the wrongs against the freedmen as something that made the blood curdle.

"In the name of God, let us protect them; insist upon guaranties; pass the bill under consideration; pass any bill, but do not let this crying injustice rage any longer. An avenging God cannot sleep while such things find countenance. If you are not ready to be the Moses of an oppressed people, do not become their Pharaoh."

Willard Saulsbury [Del.] made a brief reply to Mr. Sumner, not so much to argue the points put forward by the Senator from Massachusetts, not so much to deny the facts related by him or to discuss the principles which he had presented, as to announce that "it can be no longer disguised that there is in the party which elected the President an opposition party to him. Nothing can be more antagonistic than the suggestions contained in his message and the speeches already made in both Houses of Congress." He adjured the President to be true and faithful to the principles he had foreshadowed, and pledged him "the support of two million men in the States which have not been in revolt, and who did not support him for his high office."

Edgar Cowan [Pa.], one of the Republican Senators who had indicated a purpose to sustain the President, was evidently somewhat stunned by Mr. Sumner's speech. He treated the outrages of which Mr. Sumner complained as exceptional instances of bad conduct on the part of the Southern people. "One man out of ten thousand," said Mr. Cowan, "is brutal to a negro, and that is paraded here as a type of the whole people of the South; whereas nothing is said of the other nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine men who treat the negro well." Mr. Cowan's argument was altogether inapposite, for what Mr. Sumner and Mr. Wilson had complained of was not the action of individual men in the South, but of laws solemnly enacted by legislatures whose right to act had been recognized by the Executive Department of the National Government and which had indeed been organized in pursuance of the President's reconstruction policy.

Senator Cowan moved to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, but no action was taken on the motion. It was naturally considered unofficially by the Select Committee of Fifteen.

CHAPTER X

Reconstruction by Congressional Authority

Debate on Reconstruction in the House: in Favor of the Plan of the President, William E. Finck [O.], Henry J. Raymond [N. Y.], George R. Latham [W. Va.], Daniel E. Voorhees [Ind.]; Opposed, Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.], William D. Kelley [Pa.], William E. Niblack [Ind.], John W. Farnsworth [Ill.], Thomas A. Jenckes [R. I.], John A. Bingham [O.], Robert C. Schenck [O.], Rufus P. Spalding [O.], Samuel Shellabarger [O.], Henry C. Deming [Conn.]; House Refuses to Vote Its Confidence in the President's Plan.

WITHOUT waiting for the report of the special committee Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] formally opened the debate upon reconstruction in the House of Representatives on December 18, 1865. His speech is thus summarized by James G. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress":

Mr. Stevens took the most radical and pronounced ground touching the relation to the National Government of the States lately in rebellion. He contended that "there are two provisions in the Constitution, under one of which the case must fall." The Fourth Article says that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." "In my judgment," said Mr. Stevens, "this is the controlling provision in this case. Unless the law of nations is a dead letter, the late war between the two acknowledged belligerents severed their original contracts and broke all the ties that bound them together. The future condition of the conquered power depends on the will of the conqueror. They must come in as new States or remain as conquered provinces." This was the theory which Mr. Stevens had steadily maintained from the beginning of the war, and which he had asserted as frequently as opportunity was given in the discussions of the House. He proceeded to consider the probable alternative. "Suppose," said he, "as some dreaming theorists imagine, that these States have never been out of the Union, but have only destroyed their State governments, so as to be incapable of political action, then the fourth section of the Fourth Article applies, which says, 'The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.' But," added he, "who is the United States? Not the judiciary, not the President; but the sovereign power of the people, exercised through their representatives in Congress, with the concurrence of the Executive. It means political government—the concurrent action of both branches of Congress and the Executive." He intended his line of debate to be an attack, at the very beginning, upon the assumption of the President in his attempt at reconstruction. "The separate action of the President, or the Senate, or the House," added Mr. Stevens, "amounts to nothing, either in admitting new States or guaranteeing republican forms of government to lapsed or outlawed States. Whence springs," asked he, "the preposterous idea that any one of these, acting separately, can determine the right of States to send Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the Union?"

Though many others had foreseen and appreciated the danger, Mr. Stevens was the first to state in detail the effect which might be produced by the manumission of the slaves upon the congressional representation of the Southern States. He pointed out the fact that by counting negroes in the basis of representation the number of Representatives from the South would be eighty-three; excluding negroes from the basis of representation, they would be reduced to forty-six; and so long as negroes were deprived of suffrage he contended that they should be excluded from the basis of representation. "If," said he, "they should grant the right of suffrage to persons of color, I think there would always be white men enough in the South, aided by the blacks, to divide representation and thus continue loyal ascendency. If they should refuse to thus alter their election laws it would reduce the representation of the late slave States and render them powerless for evil." Mr. Stevens' obvious theory at that time was not to touch the question of suffrage by national interposition, but to reach it more effectively perhaps by excluding the entire colored population from the basis of congressional representation, until by the action of the Southern States themselves the elective franchise should be conceded to the colored population. As he proceeded in his speech Mr. Stevens waxed warm with all his ancient fire on the slavery question. "We have," said he, "turned, or are about to turn, loose four million slaves without a hut to shelter them or a cent in their pockets. The diabolical laws of slavery have prevented them from acquiring an education, understanding the commonest laws of contract, or of managing the ordinary business of life. This Congress is bound to look after them until they can take care of themselves. If we do not hedge them around with protecting laws, if we leave them to the legislation of their old masters, we had better have left them in bondage. Their condition will be worse than that of our prisoners at Andersonville. If we fail in this great duty now when we have the power, we shall deserve to receive the execration of history and of all future ages."

In conclusion Mr. Stevens declared that "Two things are of vital importance: first, to establish a principle that none of the rebel States shall be counted in any of the amendments to the Constitution until they are duly admitted into the family of States by the law-making power of their conqueror; second, it should now be solemnly decided what power can revive, recreate, and reinstate these provinces into the family of States and invest them with the rights of American citizens. It is time that Congress should assert its sovereignty and assume something of the dignity of a Roman senate." He denounced with great severity the cry that "This is a white man's government." "If this republic," said he with great earnestness, "is not now made to stand on solid principle it has no honest foundation and the Father of all men will shake it to its center. If we have not yet been sufficiently scourged for our national sin to teach us to do justice to all God's creatures, without distinction of race or color, we must expect the still more heavy vengeance of an offended Father, still increasing his afflictions, as he increased the severity of the plagues of Egypt until the tyrant consented to do justice, and when that tyrant repented of his reluctant consent and attempted to reënslave the people, as our Southern tyrants are attempting to do now, he filled the Red Sea with broken chariots and drowned horses, and strewed the shores with the corpses of men. Sir, this doctrine of a white man's government is as atrocious as the infamous sentiment that damned the late Chief Justice to everlasting fame, and I fear to everlasting fire."

The Administration, says Mr. Blaine, saw that the speech of Mr. Stevens was the first gun fired in a determined war to be waged against its policy and its prestige; it therefore determined upon as forcible a reply as possible, and for this duty detailed a Republican supporter of the President, Henry J. Raymond, who, though he now appeared for the first time in Congress, was one of the most influential men in the country, having founded and conducted the New York Times and taken a prominent part in the anti-slavery agitation and the formation and direction of the Republican party. As an editor and polemical writer he had no peer but Horace Greeley, of the New York Tribune, who was in opposition to the President, and he had acquired force and facility as a debater by distinguished service in the New York legislature.

Mr. Raymond spoke on December 21. Unfortunately for the effect, both moral and argumentative, of his speech the floor was taken before him by a State Rights Democrat of mediocre ability, William E. Finck [O.], who had felt called upon to reply to Mr. Stevens.

Mr. Finck made a number of plausible points, though none were very profound. He said that if Tennessee were not a State within the Union, as Mr. Stevens had insisted was the case, then Andrew Johnson, citizen of Tennessee, was not eligible to hold the office of President. Allegiance and protection being reciprocal duties, by what right did we demand from the South the one and refuse to it the other? What became of the doctrine of equality when the white man was stripped of his political rights in order to have these conferred upon the negro? He wished to restore the Union to its true constitutional character, a confederated and not consolidated government.

Mr. Raymond clearly indicated at the beginning of his speech that the Administration was not over-grateful for the support of Democrats of the Vallandigham sort, whom Mr. Finck represented.

I cannot help wishing, sir, that these indications of an interest in the preservation of our Government had come somewhat sooner. If we could have had from that side of the House such indications of an interest in the preservation of the Union, such heartfelt sympathy with the efforts of the Government for the preservation of that Union, such hearty denunciation of those who were seeking its destruction, while the war was raging, I am sure we might have been spared some years of war, some millions of money, and rivers of blood and tears.

Mr. Raymond's principal aim was to join issue with Mr. Stevens on his theory of dead States.

"The gentleman from Pennsylvania believes that what we have to do is to create new States out of this conquered territory, at the proper time, many years distant, retaining them meanwhile in a territorial condition, and subjecting them to precisely such a state of discipline and tutelage as Congress and the Government of the United States may see fit to prescribe. If I believe in the premises he assumes, possibly, though I do not think probably, I might agree with the conclusion he has reached; but, sir, I cannot believe that these States have ever been out of the Union or that they are now out of the Union. If they were, sir, how and when did they become so? By what specific act, at what precise time, did any one of those States take itself out of the American Union? Was it by the Ordinance of Secession? I think we all agree that an ordinance of secession passed by any State of the Union is simply a nullity because it encounters the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land.

Did the resolutions of these States, the declarations of their officials, the speeches of members of their legislatures, or the utterances of their press accomplish the result? Certainly not. They could not possibly work any change whatever in the relations of these States to the general Government. All their ordinances and all their resolutions were simply declarations of a purpose to secede. Their secession, if it ever took place, certainly could not date from the time when their intention to secede was first announced. After declaring that intention, they proceeded to carry it into effect. How? By war. By sustaining their purpose by arms against the force which the United States brought to bear against it. Did they sustain it? Were their arms victorious? If they were, then their secession was an accomplished fact. If not, it was nothing more than an abortive attempt—a purpose unfulfilled. This, then, is simply a question of fact, and we all know what the fact is. They did not succeed. They failed to maintain their ground by force of arms—in other words, they failed to secede.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] insists that they did secede, and that this fact is not in the least affected by the other fact that the Constitution forbids secession. He says that the law forbids murder, but that murders are nevertheless committed. But there is no analogy between the two cases. If secession had been accomplished, if these States had gone out, and overcome the armies that tried to prevent their going out, then the prohibition of the Constitution could not have altered the fact. In the case of murder the man is killed, the murder is thus committed in spite of the law. The fact of killing is essential to the committal of the crime; and the fact of going out is essential to secession. But in this case there was no such fact.

During all these four years of war Congress has been making laws for the government of those very States, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has voted for them, and voted to raise armies to enforce them. Why was this done if they were a separate nation? Those laws were made for them as States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] spoke of States forfeiting their State existence by the fact of rebellion. Well, I do not see how there can be any such forfeiture involved or implied. The individual citizens of those States went into the rebellion. They thereby incurred certain penalties under the laws and Constitution of the United States. What the States did was to endeavor to interpose their State authority between the individuals in rebellion and the Government of the United States, which assumed, and which would carry out the assumption, to declare those individuals traitors for their acts. The individuals in the States who were in rebellion, it seems to me, were the only parties who under the Constitution and laws of the United States could incur the penalties of treason. I know of no law, I know of nothing in the Constitution of the United States, I know of nothing in any recognized or established code of international law, which can punish a State as a State for any act it may perform. It is certain that our Constitution assumes nothing of the kind. It does not deal with States, except in one or two instances, such as elections of members of Congress, and the election of electors of President and Vice-President.

A State cannot be indicted; a State cannot be tried; a State cannot be hung for treason. The individuals in a State may be so tried and hung, but the State as an organization, as an organic member of the Union, still exists, whether its individual citizens commit treason or not.

William D. Kelley [Pa.].—I desire to ask the gentleman this question: by virtue of what does a State exist? Is it by virtue of a constitution and by virtue of its relations to the Union? That is, does a State of the Union exist, first by virtue of a constitution and secondly by virtue of its practical relations to the Government of the United States? And, further, I would ask whether those States, acting by conventions of the people, have not overthrown the Constitution which made them parts of the Union, and thereby destroyed or suspended—phrase it as you will—the practical relations which made them parts of the Union?

Mr. Raymond.—I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley], that it is not the practical relations of a State at any particular moment which make it a State or a part of the Union. What makes a State a part of the Union is the Constitution of the United States; and the rebel States have not yet destroyed that.

Mr. Kelley.—The question I propound is whether a State does not exist by virtue of a constitution, its constitution, which is a thing which may be modified or overthrown?

Mr. Raymond.—Certainly.

Mr. Kelley.—And whether these rebellious constitutions or States have not been overthrown?

Mr. Raymond.—A State does not exist by virtue of any particular constitution. It always has a constitution, but it need not have a specific constitution at any specific time. A State has certain practical relations to the Government of the United States. But the fact of those relations being practically operative and in actual force at any moment does not constitute its relationship to the Government or its membership of the United States. Its practical operation is one thing. The fact of its existence as an organized community, one of the great national community of States, is quite another thing.

Mr. Kelley.—Let me interrupt the gentleman one moment longer. I will ask him whether, if the Constitution be overthrown or destroyed and its practical relations cease, there be any State left?

Mr. Raymond.—Why, sir, if there be no constitution of any sort in a State, no law, nothing but chaos, then that State would no longer exist as an organization. But that has not been the case, it never is the case in great communities, for they always have constitutions and forms of government. It may not be a constitution or form of government adapted to its relation to the Government of the United States; and that would be an evil to be remedied by the Government of the United States. That is what we have been trying to do for the last four years. The practical relations of the governments of those States with the Government of the United States were all wrong—were hostile to that Government. They denied our jurisdiction, and they denied that they were States of the Union, but their denial did not change the fact; and there was never any time when their organizations as States were destroyed. A dead State is a solecism, a contradiction in terms, an impossibility.

These are, I confess, rather metaphysical distinctions, but I did not raise them. Those who assert that a State is destroyed whenever its constitution is changed, or whenever its practical relations with this Government are changed, must be held responsible for whatever metaphysical niceties may be necessarily involved in the discussion.

I regard these States as just as truly within the jurisdiction of the Constitution, and therefore just as really and truly States of the American Union now, as they were before the war. Their practical relations to the Constitution of the United States have been disturbed, and we have been endeavoring, through four years of war, to restore them and make them what they were before the war. The victory in the field has given us the means of doing this; we can now reëstablish the practical relations of those States to the Government. Our actual jurisdiction over them, which they vainly attempted to throw off, is already restored. The conquest we have achieved is a conquest over the rebellion, not a conquest over the States whose authority the rebellion had for a time subverted.

For these reasons I think the views submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] upon this point are unsound. Let me next cite some of the consequences which, it seems to me, must follow the acceptance of his position. If, as he asserts, we have been waging war with an independent power, with a separate nation, I cannot see how we can talk of treason in connection with our recent conflict or demand the execution of Davis or anybody else as a traitor. Certainly if we were at war with any other foreign power we should not talk of the treason of those who were opposed to us in the field. If we were engaged in a war with France and should take as prisoner the Emperor Napoleon, certainly we could not talk of him as a traitor or as liable to execution. I think that by adopting any such assumption as that of the honorable gentleman we surrender the whole idea of treason and the punishment of traitors. I think, moreover, that we accept, virtually and practically, the doctrine of State sovereignty, the right of a State to withdraw from the Union, and to break up the Union at its own will and pleasure. I do not see how upon those premises we can escape that conclusion. If the States that engaged in the late rebellion constituted themselves, by their ordinances of secession or by any of the acts with which they followed those ordinances, a separate and independent power, I do not see how we can deny the principles on which they professed to act, or refuse assent to their practical results. I have heard no clearer, no stronger statement of the doctrine of State sovereignty as paramount to the sovereignty of the nation than would be involved in such a concession. Whether he intended it or not, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] actually assents to the extreme doctrines of the advocates of secession.

William E. Niblack [Ind.].—I beg leave to inquire of the gentleman whether the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which he is combating, would not also, if carried to its legitimate consequences, make those who resisted the Confederacy in the insurrectionary States guilty of treason to the Confederacy or to those States?

Mr. Raymond.—I was just going to remark that another of the consequences of this doctrine, as it seems to me, would be our inability to talk of loyal men in the South. Loyal to what? Loyal to a foreign, independent power, as the United States would become under those circumstances? Certainly not. Simply disloyal to their own government, and deserters, or whatever you may choose to call them, from that to which they owe allegiance to a foreign and independent state.

Now, there is another consequence of the doctrine which I shall not dwell upon, but simply suggest. If that Confederacy was an independent power, a separate nation, it had the right to contract debts; and we, having overthrown and conquered that independent power, according to the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would become the successors, the inheritors, of its debts and assets, and we must pay them. Sir, that is not simply a theory or a claim thrown out in debate here; it is one advanced on behalf of the Government of Great Britain as against us in the case in which cotton belonging to the Southern Confederacy was claimed in Liverpool.

Our Government has denied from the beginning, and denies now, that the Confederacy was ever such a corporation, such an independent body of men as could contract debts, whether we are liable for them or not. The declaration of our Secretary of State in his recent correspondence on that subject shows that we have always steadily denied that the Confederacy was such a corporation as could contract a valid debt, whether we would be made responsible for it or not. But one thing is very clear, that, if we recognize the doctrine that those lately in rebellion against our Government constituted an independent power, we must concede their ability to contract debts. Whether we as their successors are to pay them or not is another question, but the claim has been made, and denied only on the ground of the incapacity of the rebel Confederacy to contract debts or binding engagements of any sort.

John F. Farnsworth [Ill.].—I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he is entirely sure we have the right to try Jefferson Davis for treason inasmuch as our Government has given to them belligerent rights, has recognized and respected the commissions that he has issued?

Mr. Raymond.—I have no doubt of it. I do not think that the treason of Jefferson Davis has anything to do with the fact that we conceded humane treatment to our prisoners of war. Because we had granted to these States, as a power waging war, rights usually accorded to nations at war, we were not therefore concluded from proceeding against them as traitors.

The decision of the Supreme Court asserts that we have the right to proceed against them as traitors, or, rather, that we have the right to exercise against them both the powers of sovereignty and of belligerents; that the one did not exclude the other. It would be an extraordinary circumstance if, because we treated them humanely as prisoners of war, we have not the right to hold them responsible to the laws they have broken.

Now, if, according to the view I have presented, we are to deal with those States as States within the Union, the next question that recurs is how are we to deal with them? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Finck] who preceded me took the ground that they had only to resume their places and their powers in the National Government—that their Representatives have only to come into this Hall and take their seats without question and without conditions of any sort. I cannot concur, sir, in this view. I do not think these States have any such rights. On the contrary, I think we have a full and perfect right to require certain conditions, in the nature of guaranties for the future, and that right rests, primarily and technically, on the surrender we may and must require at their hands. The rebellion has been defeated. A defeat always implies a surrender, and in a political sense a surrender implies more than the transfer of the arms used on the field of battle. It implies, in the case of civil war, a surrender of the principles and doctrines, of all the weapons and agencies, by which the war has been carried on. The military surrender was made on the field of battle, to our generals as the agents and representatives of the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. But this is not all. They have still to surrender——

Thomas A. Jenckes [R. I.].—Was not the surrender of the rebel arms made to the people of the United States?

Mr. Raymond.—It ought to be, and must be to them through their representatives. The rebels surrendered to the generals of our armies, who were commissioned by the President of the United States, himself the representative of the people.

Mr. Jenckes.—Not to the generals as the agents of the President, but as the representatives of the military authority of the people of the United States.

Mr. Raymond.—Why, certainly all authority belongs to the people. It is a mere distinction of words, and scarcely that.

Mr. Jenckes.—I beg pardon of the gentleman. It seems to me that it is an essential distinction.

Mr. Raymond.—Well, if it seems important to the gentleman from Rhode Island or to anybody else, I am quite willing to make the addition to my remark which he suggests. I will say, then, that in surrendering on the field of battle they surrendered to the generals who were in command of the armies, as agents of the President of the United States, who was and is the representative of the people of the United States. If that explanation is satisfactory to the gentleman I am very happy to make it; and perhaps I am obliged to him for having enabled me to state it a little more specifically and accurately than I did at first.

Now, there must be at the end of the war a similar surrender on the political field of controversy. That surrender is due as an act of justice from the defeated party to the victorious party. It is due also, and we have a right to exact it, as a guaranty for the future. Why do we demand the surrender of their arms by the vanquished in every battle? We do it that they may not renew the contest. Why do we seek in this and all similar cases a surrender of the principles for which they fought? It is that they may never again be made the basis of controversy and rebellion against the Government of the United States.

Now, what are those principles which should be thus surrendered? The principle of State sovereignty is one of them.

It was the cornerstone of the rebellion—at once its animating spirit and its fundamental basis. Deeply ingrained as it was in the Southern heart, it must be surrendered. The ordinances in which it was embodied must not only be repealed, the principle itself must be abandoned, and the ordinances, so far as this war is concerned, be declared null and void, and that declaration must be embodied in their fundamental constitutions. We have a right to insist upon this; and it must be apparent that, so far as that principle is concerned, this war was a permanent success.

JOHN A. BINGHAM [O.].—The gentleman will allow me to make the inquiry whether, if that were done to-day by South Carolina, and the people of that insurgent State restored to all their powers in this Union, they could not blot it out to-morrow by every construction that has ever been given to the operation of the Constitution of the United States upon any State maintaining its relations to this Government? What guaranty would that be?

MR. RAYMOND.—I might as well ask the gentleman whether if this Congress pass a certain law to-day they may not repeal it to-morrow. I do not know anything that any community can do that they cannot undo at some future time.

MR. BINGHAM.—When the gentleman talks of guaranties to the people of the United States I ask him whether there is not some other method that occurs to him by which these guaranties can be obtained than to submit simply to the will of the insurgent States? Is it not to be done by putting the guaranty in the Constitution of the whole people of the United States, and thus placing it beyond the power of South Carolina to repeal it?

MR. RAYMOND.—Well, Mr. Chairman, there have been a good many things put in the Constitution of the United States which South Carolina did not deem beyond her power, and they undertook to prove that fact, but they did not succeed. My own impression is that whatever is now a part of the Constitution and laws of this country is beyond the power of South Carolina to disturb. I might as well ask the gentleman whether, when the enemy surrendered its ordnance in the field, we ought not to refuse to accept it because they might possibly at some future day come and recapture it.

MR. BINGHAM.—The gentleman will excuse me. He talked of new guaranties. The people of the United States undoubtedly demand them. But I wish him to answer intelligibly what new guaranty is given by incorporating in the constitution of South Carolina the mere formula that she by her constitution declares that she has not the right to secede, when she has the power the very next day to strike it out? Is that a new guaranty?

MR. RAYMOND.—Certainly it is. That has never been in the constitution of South Carolina before. If she puts it there now, it is a new guaranty is it not? Whether it is an adequate form of that guaranty or not is another question which I have not discussed. South Carolina has always hitherto asserted the right of secession, and under that assertion she attempted to secede. If she now repudiates or abandons that right, we have certainly that new assurance that she will not renew the attempt. We shall certainly have this tangible admission on her part that, if she does again rebel, it will be in direct repudiation and contempt of her own principles. I will not say that nothing more would be desired or accepted. I am quite willing, if it can be done, to put that acknowledgment into the Constitution of the United States. But I think it is there now, and that it always has been there, and that there is no more doubt about it now than if it were stated in express terms. When I read in the Constitution of the United States that "this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. I deem that to be as plain as any declaration can be against the doctrine of State sovereignty, and I cannot believe that any form of words on our part would be more explicit or more emphatic. But if the gentleman can get any more explicit denial into the Constitution of the United States, he will find me voting for it every time.

Now there is another thing to be surrendered by the defeated rebellion, and that is the obligation to pay the rebel war debt.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK [O.].—Will the gentleman allow me to inquire whether that guaranty in the constitution of South Carolina amounts to anything more than the signature of an indorser on the back of a note, who may at any time thereafter take his name from the paper?

MR. RAYMOND.—Perhaps not; perhaps you can get better security. If you can, I certainly shall not object. But, such as it is, it is at all events something gained, and it is only in that light that I have referred to it. Neither of the distinguished gentlemen from Ohio [Messrs. Bingham and Schenck], able lawyers as they are, will deny that we had the right to demand that guaranty of South Carolina. And, if it was worth while to demand it, it is hardly worth while, having got it, to say that it is of no value at all. We expose ourselves by so doing to the imputation of trifling in having demanded it at all.

MR. BINGHAM.—I have no doubt at all that the people of the United States, those who maintained the integrity of their Constitution, had the right to demand of South Carolina a perpetual guaranty in the future that she should not even claim the color of authority to secede and set up a government against the constitutional authority of the Government of the nation. And when they demand that I take it that the people of the United States are not to be told that South Carolina alone is to have the control and keeping of that guaranty. But the people of the United States are hereafter to be the guardians of their own honor, and the protectors of their own nationality, and they will take into their own keeping those great guaranties that are to secure peace and prosperity to every section of the Union in future, and to secure themselves against this work of secession under the pretence of State sovereignty.

MR. RAYMOND.—Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham] inform me who has ever pretended that the people of the nation are not to take into their own hands the guaranties of their own security and their own honor?

MR. BINGHAM.—Whoever pretends that future guaranties against the pretension of the right of a State to secede are to rest with the State alone, stands simply and solely on the resolutions of Virginia of 1798, out of the pernicious assumptions of which came all our trouble.

MR. RAYMOND.—The gentleman tries to fasten upon me a position that I have never taken. And it required all his ingenuity to reach the point at which he has at last arrived. I said that we have a right to require from the people of South Carolina the abandonment of their doctrine of secession. Now, whether we may not also require that the people of the United States shall reaffirm that and put it into the Constitution of the United States is a thing about which I have said nothing whatever, except that whenever presented in a proper form it will have my assent.

MR. BINGHAM.—I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. For if these guaranties are essential, and the gentleman seems to agree that they are, then it is highly important that the American people should determine them, without being interrupted in the settlement of that question by the intervention of South Carolina under the pretension that she is a State in this Union, with all the reserved rights of a State. What right, I would ask, has she to set up any such pretension?

MR. RAYMOND.—Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must settle that matter with South Carolina.

MR. BINGHAM.—I propose, in coöperation with the loyal people and their Representatives in Congress, to settle it with South Carolina.

MR. RAYMOND.—I can only say on that subject that South Carolina found herself invited by the President of the United States, the representative of the people of the United States, as the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. Jenckes] very properly insists that I shall term him, to coöperate in the restoration of the Union—to resume her functions as a State of the Union, and, as a preliminary step, to repudiate this debt and give this guaranty of her loyalty and good faith.

MR. BINGHAM.—I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think he can find anywhere any authority for the statement that the President of the United States ever invited South Carolina to exercise any voice or vote on that question here in Congress.

MR. RAYMOND.—The President certainly has indicated to the Southern States that he expected them to declare, in their constitutions, that their ordinances of secession were null and void; and in his message he speaks of an invitation to them to renew their functions as States of the Union; and that covers the whole ground that I attempted to speak upon in connection with this point.

MR. BINGHAM.—I only wish to know the gentleman's position—to ascertain whether it is or is not that South Carolina and other seceding States now sustain such relations to this Union that they have the right to-day, under the Constitution, to have representation upon this floor according to the apportionment of 1862.

MR. RAYMOND.—Without any guaranties or conditions at all?

MR. BINGHAM.—I contend that all guaranties are worthless, unless embodied in the Constitution of the United States. Does the gentleman insist that South Carolina has now the right, under the Constitution, to representation in Congress as a State of the Union because her relations to the Government are, under the Constitution, those of a constitutional State in the Union?

MR. RAYMOND.—I have already said, sir, and said it as clearly and emphatically as I can, that we have a right to demand, and that we are in duty bound to demand, certain concessions from all the States lately in rebellion, as parts of their surrender, and as conditions of their resuming their functions in the Government of the nation. As to their representation in Congress, I should, before determining that question, wish to know something more of the character and position of the men they may send, and of what they have done.

MR. BINGHAM.—So do I; and I think that Congress ought to decide the question.

MR. RAYMOND.—I have not assumed to decide that point. I have not said anything about what the Southern States have done. I have simply said what we have a right to require them to do; and the renunciation of the doctrine of State sovereignty is one thing that we have a right to require at their hands. We have a right also to require them to do another thing—to repudiate their obligation for debts incurred in carrying on the war against the Government. Whether they have done this or not is another matter which may come up at another time.

There is another thing which we have the right to require; and that is the prohibition of slavery. We have the right to require them to do this, not only in their State constitutions, but in the Constitution of the United States. And we have required it, and it has been conceded. They have also conceded that Congress may make such laws as may be requisite to carry that prohibition into effect, which includes such legislation as may be required to secure for them protection of their civil and personal rights—their "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This I am sure the gentleman will concede to be a substantial guaranty—one placed beyond the power of any State to recall or repeal.

These things the President of the United States has deemed it his right, as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, to demand at the hands of the States which have been defeated in their attempt to separate themselves from the Union, as the condition of relaxing the bonds of military authority over them and restoring to them again the control of their local State affairs. He made these the conditions upon which they would be allowed, so far as his rightful authority extended, to resume the practical exercise of their functions as members of the Union, which had been suspended by their rebellion. He has done this in the exercise of his lawful authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and was therefore responsible for the complete suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of peace, order, and loyalty in the regions where they have been for a time disturbed and overthrown. He has done it through agents, exercising a delegated and just authority—acting on his behalf and in his name—just as his military generals prescribed the terms and conditions of the rebel surrender in the field; and the fact that these concessions have been granted affords at least a fair presumption that those who make them intend hereafter in good faith to abide by all the obligations and fulfill all the duties imposed by the Constitution and laws of the United States. It may possibly be wise for us to dismiss all these concessions and all these guaranties given by eight million people, and sanctioned by the most solemn forms of legislation, as utterly worthless and insincere. But that is a matter upon which each individual must exercise his own discretion upon his own responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I am here to act with those who seek to complete the restoration of the Union, as I have acted with those through the last four years who have sought to maintain its integrity and prevent its destruction. For myself I shall endeavor to act upon this whole question in the broad and liberal temper which its importance demands. We are not conducting a controversy in a court of law. We are not seeking to enforce a remedy for private wrongs, nor to revenge or retaliate private griefs. We have great communities of men, permanent interests of great States, to deal with, and we are bound to deal with them in a large and liberal spirit. It may be for the welfare of this nation that we shall cherish toward the millions of our people lately in rebellion feelings of hatred and distrust; that we shall nurse the bitterness their infamous treason has naturally and justly engendered, and make that the basis of our future dealings with them. Possibly we may best teach them the lessons of liberty by visiting upon them the worst excesses of despotism. Possibly they may best learn to practice justice toward others, to admire and emulate our republican institutions, by suffering at our hands the absolute rule we denounce in others. It may be best for us and for them that we discard in all our dealings with them all the obligations and requirements of the Constitution, and assert as the only law for them the unrestrained will of conquerors and masters.

I confess I do not sympathize with the sentiments or the opinions which would dictate such a course. I would exact of them all needed and all just guaranties for their future loyalty to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I would exact from them, or impose upon them through the constitutional legislation of Congress and by enlarging and extending, if necessary, the scope and powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, proper care and protection for the helpless and friendless freedmen, so lately their slaves. I would exercise a rigid scrutiny into the character and loyalty of the men whom they may send to Congress, before I allowed them to participate in the high prerogative of legislating for the nation. But I would seek to allay rather than stimulate the animosities and hatred, however just they may be, to which the war has given rise. But for our own sake as well as for theirs I would not visit upon them a policy of confiscation which has been discarded in the policy and practical conduct of every civilized nation on the face of the globe.

I believe it important for us as well as for them that we should cultivate friendly relations with them, that we should seek the promotion of their interests as part and parcel of our own. We have been their enemies in war, in peace let us show ourselves their friends. Now that slavery has been destroyed—that prolific source of all our alienations, all our hatreds, and all our disasters—there is nothing longer to make us foes. They have the same interests, the same hopes, the same aspirations that we have. They are one with us; we must share their sufferings and they will share our advancing prosperity. They have been punished as no community was ever punished before for the treason they have committed. I trust, sir, the day will come ere long when all traces of this great conflict will be effaced, except those which mark the blessings that follow in its train.

I hope and believe that we shall soon see the day when the people of the Southern States will show us, by evidences that we cannot mistake, that they have returned, in all sincerity and good faith, to their allegiance to the Union; that they intend to join henceforth with us in promoting its prosperity, in defending the banner of its glory, and in fighting the battles of democratic freedom, not only here, but wherever the issue may be forced upon our acceptance. I rejoice with heartfelt satisfaction that we have in these seats of power—in the executive department and in these halls of Congress—men who will coöperate for the attainment of these great and beneficent ends. I trust they will act with wisdom; I know they will act from no other motives than those of patriotism and love of their fellowmen.

MR. JENCKES.—When the gentleman from New York says, looking at the question of reconstruction, that there resides in the Executive power to impose conditions upon the resumption of the rights of the States which have been in rebellion, I ask him where he finds that power—in the Constitution of the United States or in the public law, the law of war, the law of nations which overrides when it is once called into existence? Is it the power of carrying on foreign war or suppressing domestic insurrections?

The day's session came to a close with Mr. Jenckes' question unanswered.

On January 5 Rufus P. Spalding [O.], a representative of what was probably the most radical section in the Union, the "Western Reserve," stated what conditions of reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion would be satisfactory to his constituency. These were:

1. Qualified right of suffrage in the District of Columbia;
2. Amendment of the Constitution excluding negroes from being counted in making up the ratio of the representation in Congress except in States granting them the suffrage;
3. Constitutional amendment prohibiting nullification and secession;
4. Constitutional amendment prohibiting repudiation of the national debt and assumption of the rebel debt;
5. Constitutional amendment denying admission to Congress of former rebels.

On January 8 George R. Latham [W. Va.] gave a border State view of the subject.

Who questioned the right of the loyal people of these [border] States to reëstablish their governments in their respective capitals when they recovered the power to do so? And where is the difference in the principle involved in the condition of these States and of those yet unrepresented upon this floor? Those yet unrepresented were a while wholly instead of partially overrun, and were longer under rebel control; but are the rights of loyal citizens destroyed by "the law's delay," or by the inability of the Government to which they bear allegiance to extend to them, for a time, its protection and support? In what, then, consists the difference in principle, except it be in the single fact that in the one class ordinances of secession (so called) were adopted and in the other were not?

Sir, those who accord to those ordinances an importance so essential and vital as this are, in my humble opinion, not one whit less disunionists in theory and principle than those who adopted them. But we are seriously told upon the floor of this House, by those claiming to be par excellence the friends of the Union, that these States are out of the Union! Look, sir, and count the stars and stripes upon that flag. Does this House indorse a flaunting lie in its presence every day, hour, and minute of its sitting? Why floats in the breeze that banner untorn from the top of this hall, attracting the gaze of admiring multitudes for miles around, if eleven of the States represented thereon have ceased to be States and are no longer members of this Union? Is it to deceive foreign nations through their representatives at your Government? Go, sir, and ask the honest tar in your navy yard, or upon the wide ocean, or in a foreign port, if the flag floating from his masthead flaunts a lie—is a deception and a cheat! Ask the returning veteran, scarred and maimed, who risked his life and shed his blood to save and perpetuate the Union, if "the war has been a failure," and if the flag he bears so proudly homeward is all that is saved from the wreck of his dismembered country! Sir, I leave the reply to your imagination; and I would not envy the gentleman who champions this doctrine the pleasure of a tour over this country, charged with the duty of cutting the representatives of eleven States from that flag which has become a household god in every loyal family throughout the land.

To restore these State governments, then, is, in my opinion, to reinstate them as they existed when overthrown by the rebellion, subject only to such changes as are necessary to conform them to the present status of the National Government. During the suspension of the proper practical relations between the people of these States and the National Government the institution of African slavery has been abolished, and upon resuming these relations they are now required to conform their organic law to this very important change, not because their State constitutions are not republican in form without this change, but because the Constitution and laws of the United States are supreme, and those of the several States must conform to them.

Mr. Latham was in favor of admitting representatives to Congress from the States to be reconstructed on two guaranties alone:

1. Taking the oath of allegiance; and
2. Ability of the constituency of these representatives to maintain a loyal civil government without military aid.

Samuel Shellabarger [O.] specifically answered the speech of Mr. Raymond. Says Mr. Blaine, he spoke with care and preparation, as was his habit. He wasted no words, but in clear, crisp sentences subjected the whole question to the rigid test of logic.

I shall inquire whether the Constitution deals with States. I shall discuss the question whether an organized rebellion against a government is an organized State in that government; whether that which cannot become a State until all its officers have sworn to support the Constitution remains a State after they have all sworn to overthrow that Constitution. If I find it does continue to be a State after that, then I shall strive to ascertain whether it will so continue to be a government—a State—after, by means of universal treason, it has ceased to have any constitution, laws, legislatures, courts, or citizens in it.

If, in debating this question, I debate axioms, my apology is that there are no other questions to debate in reconstruction. If, in the discussion, I make self-evident things obscure or incomprehensible, my defence shall be that I am conforming to the usages of Congress. I will not inquire whether any subject of this Government, by reason of the revolt, passed from under its sovereignty or ceased to owe it allegiance; nor shall I inquire whether any territory passed from under that jurisdiction, because I know of no one who thinks that any of these things did occur. I shall not consider whether, by the rebellion, any State lost its territorial character or its defined boundaries or subdivisions, for I know of no one who would obliterate these geographical qualities of the States. These questions, however much discussed, are in no practical sense before Congress.

What is before Congress? I at once define and affirm it in a single sentence. It is, under our Constitution, possible to, and the late rebellion did in fact, so overthrow and usurp, in the insurrectionary States, the loyal State governments as that, during such usurpation, such States and their people ceased to have any of the rights or powers of government as States of this Union, and this loss of the rights and powers of government was such that the United States may, and ought to, assume and exercise local powers of the lost State governments, and may control the readmission of such States to their powers of government in this Union, subject to and in accordance with the obligation to guarantee to each State a republican form of government.

Upon the broad proposition thus laid down Mr. Shellabarger proceeded to submit an argument, which, for closeness, compactness, consistency and strength, says Mr. Blaine, has rarely, if ever, been surpassed in the Congress of the United States. Other speeches have gained greater celebrity, but it may well be doubted whether any speech in the House of Representatives ever made a more enduring impression or exerted greater convincing power upon the minds of those to whom it was addressed. It was a far more valuable exposition of the reconstruction question than that given by Mr. Stevens. It was absolutely without acrimony, it contained no harsh word, it made no personal reflection; but the whole duty of the United States, and the whole power of the United States to do its duty, were set forth with absolute precision of logic. The reconstruction debate continued for a long time and many able speeches were contributed to it. While much of value was added to that which Mr. Shellabarger had stated, no position taken by him was ever shaken.

Mr. Shellabarger first discussed

WHAT, BY THE LAW OF NATIONS, IS A STATE?

Upon this point he said:

At the very foundation of this discussion lies the question, what make up the necessary elements of every State in this Union? What properties are they which, if any one be lost by a State, it ceases to be entitled to exercise the powers and demand the rights of a political and governing member of that Union?

The argument I now derive from "public law" is really identical with the one I shall next adduce, and shall base upon the express terms of the Constitution. In this argument—assuming, as I do, two axioms of our law; first, that the law of nations is part of your Constitution (Const., art. 1, sec. 8, clause 10), and, second, that such Constitution is to its States, at least, as much "supreme law" as the international code is law to the civilized states which are under its sway—I here only show that these law-defying communities in rebellion cannot be "States," unless our Union has lowered and debased the world's "legal idea" of a "state."

What, then, is required to constitute a state by the law of nations?

We answer:

1. "A fixed abode and definite territory belonging to the people who occupy it." (Wheaton, 33.)
2. "A society of men united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by their combined strength." (Ib., 32.)
3. "The legal idea of a State necessarily implies that of habitual obedience of its members to those in whom the superiority is vested." (Ib., 33.)

This third necessary element of a state is the only important one in this discussion. Hence, I add the following high authorities:

Grotius (Book 3, chapter 3, section 2) says:

"The law, especially that of nations, is in the state as the soul is in that of the human body, for that being taken away it ceases to be a state."

Burlamaqui (Volume 2, page 25), in defining a state, says:

"It is a multitude of people united together by a common interest and common laws, to which they submit with one accord."

I might add to these all the writers on public law for centuries, in confirmation of what is self-evident without proof, that there can be no state where the people do not habitually obey the laws. For four hundred years the unanimous conscience and common sense of the civilized world have refused to recognize the existence of a people who were habitually disobedient to their own laws or the law of nations. Such a people is blotted out.

Can it be that for four centuries the united conscience and judgment of the civilized world shall prohibit the existence upon the earth of such a monster as a state whose people are habitually lawless, and then shall it be left for our "more perfect Union" to establish "States" which, although they cannot commence their existence until every officer and minister of that State shall swear to support the Constitution of the United States, as the supreme law of the land, yet shall continue to be States after every officer of such State had discarded such oath, and every inhabitant had, for years, defied and discarded these "supreme laws"?

In the lights of the public law of the world let this Congress answer the startling question whether an organized rebellion has come to be an organized "State"; whether "habitual" treason has come to be "habitual obedience to law"; and whether the legal "idea of a state" has come to be a synonym for chaos, in which are commingled, in unalleviated political ruin, the absolute overthrow of all its "supreme laws," the wreck of all loyal constitutions, laws, and forms of government, and the death or exile of every inhabitant who admitted the existence of such loyal State!

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is not too much to say that even under the settled precepts of public law those eleven districts, called "Confederate States," ceased to be States. In them, during so many dark years, there was no obedience to law except the law which compelled the defiance of all "supreme laws"; there was no government except that one which consisted in enforcing disloyalty to government; there was no observance of the "law of nations," unless that is to be found in indiscriminate and remorseless assassination or murder of every loyal man whom their treason could reach either by means of the dagger, the torpedo, the poisoned food, the bandit, the violations of truce, or the systematized destruction of prisoners of war. Their body-politic was one gigantic treason, made up of eleven organized rebellions, combined into one by the force of a relentless military despotism.

But, sir, the unexampled magnitude of these interests involved impels me on to what are, if possible, more conclusive arguments. I go from the public law to the Constitution.

WHAT IS A STATE OF THIS UNION?

That which is required to be added to the properties which belong to every state, in the sense of the international law, in order to constitute a State of our Union, is—

1. Its citizens must owe, acknowledge, and render supreme and habitual allegiance and obedience to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States in all Federal matters, these being the supreme laws to the States and their citizens. (Constitution, article 6.)

2. All "the members of the State legislatures and its executive and judicial officers shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution" of the United States. (Article 6.)

3. That the United States shall have so "admitted it into this Union" (article 5, section 3) as to have assumed "to guarantee to it a republican form of government, and to protect it against invasion, and," on application, "against domestic violence."

4. And by such recognition and "admission into this Union" to have secured to it, as a body-politic, or "State," certain rights of participation in the control of the Federal Government; which rights I shall name hereafter. (See also 1 Bishop on "Criminal Law," sections 128 to 137, inclusive.)

No one who can read the Constitution will deny that each State in this Union must have every one of these properties before it can commence to exist in the Union; because the Constitution so declares. Now, the question I consider is whether it shall continue to be a State, in the sense that it holds the powers and rights of a State, after it has lost every property which it must have before it could commence to exist in the Union.

DOES THE CONSTITUTION DEAL WITH STATES?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Raymond] says:

> "The Constitution does not deal with States except in one or two instances, as the election of members of Congress and the election of electors of President and Vice-President."

This statement involves an error both of fact and law which, considering its highly intelligent and patriotic source, is amazing. Now, sir, reading English will correct this error. Turn to the Constitution. It deals with States, in the way of imposing restraints and obligations upon them as States, in the following matters: regulating commerce among the States; requiring Representatives, also United States Senators, to reside in their respective States; prohibiting States from entering into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, coining money, emitting bills of credit, making anything but gold and silver coin a tender for debt; passing any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts; from taxing imports or exports without consent of Congress; from laying tonnage duty; from keeping troops or ships of war in time of peace; from entering into any compact with another State or foreign power; from engaging in war unless invaded or in imminent danger thereof; from refusing to give full faith to records, etc., of other States; from refusing to surrender fugitives from justice or labor; in requiring States to be tried in the courts of the United States; requiring all their officers to take an oath to support the Constitution; requiring them to pay State's proportion of direct taxes; in prohibiting "either" State from conferring any other emolument upon the President than his salary; in requiring them to furnish, at command of the President, their militia; and in subordinating their "judges," "constitutions," and "laws" to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States as "the supreme law of the land."

It secures rights and confers powers upon the States as States in each of the following respects. It secures to each the right to elect at least one Representative, to elect two Senators, to cast one vote in ratifying constitutional amendments, and in calling a convention to make such amendments; to cast one vote in electing a President in the House, to appoint in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct electors to elect a President and Vice-President, to fill by appointment vacancies in Congress, to demand that "in the regulation of commerce no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another," in securing equal immunities to their respective citizens, in having guaranteed to them republican governments, in being protected against insurrection and domestic violence, in securing them from being divided, etc., and in enabling them to define the qualification of electors for United States officers by fixing that of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

My object, Mr. Chairman, in reciting these fifty or more supremely important provisions of the Constitution, in every one of which it is evident, both by the nature and express terms of the provisions themselves, and by the innumerable adjudications of the courts, that the Constitution "deals with" the States, as such, was not the frivolous one of showing that there were more than "one or two" of these. My purpose was the higher one of showing how baseless that argument was which was based upon the assertion that the Constitution did not deal with States, but individuals only, and that, therefore, not the States but only individuals could lose their rights under such Constitution. I wanted not only to show the argument baseless, but that its precise opposite is the exact truth. I wanted to show that the very body, soul, life, and essence of the Constitution are penetrated, pervaded, and characterized by and with this recognition of the States, and of their high powers as such. I wanted to bring into view the momentous and controlling fact which disposes of this high constitutional question, that the States are not only "dealt with" by the Constitution, but that their powers as States in our Government are absolutely vital. And I separated the obligations and restraints imposed upon the States and their officers from the conferments of rights and powers upon them, that it might appear to all men and to the very children who can read their Constitution that, in this marvelous great scheme of government, as in every other wise human government, as well as in God's, the enforcements of obligation are coupled with and inseparable from the enjoyment of rights; that prescribed qualifications for the attainment of power must be possessed and proceed, and are inseparable, from the exercise of power. I wanted to show that there could be, under the Constitution, none of the rights or powers of a State where there were recognized none of the obligations or duties of a State.

Sir, how long may this nation survive with a Senate elected by rebel legislatures; or with treaties made by Senators chosen by rebel States; or with a President selected by electors chosen by the legislature of South Carolina; or with a President elected in a House of Representatives where each rebel State casts one vote; or with a House of Representatives elected by electors whom a rebel legislature would authorize to vote; or with officers over United States forces appointed by rebel governors; or with such constitutional amendments as would be ratified by rebel legislatures; or with a traitor for President whom you could remove only by the impeachment of a Senate elected by rebel legislatures; or with such foreign ministers and other officers of the United States as such a Senate would confirm; or with a prohibition upon your closing the ports of the eleven rebel States to a commerce supplying them with all the supplies of war, unless you also closed all the ports of the other States?

Sir, if the recital of these powers which the States, as such, hold in governing this Union does not prove that a State in rebellion, and whose government and people are in actual hostility to the United States, is not a component part of this Union, during the continuance of such rebellion, for the purpose of exercising any power, then such recital does prove other things. It proves that "Independence Hall" was a madhouse from the 14th of May to the 17th of September, 1787; and that the madmen there succeeded in devising a framework of government embodying in it a larger number of separate and fatal instruments of self-slaughter than was ever combined in a government before, or than was ever dreamed of by men who make Utopias, or by them who form governments in Bedlam.

CONGRESS HAS ASSUMED THAT REBEL STATES HAD NO RIGHTS AS STATES

I admit that the action of this Government was not, at all times during the war, harmonious nor consistent upon the matter of according rights to rebel districts. It would have been strange, indeed, if all such action, done, as it was, in the midst of the awful events of such wars, revolutions, and breakings up of the systems of governments, had been consistent upon any subject. Besides, as mere measures of war, there was constant temptation to err, if at all, in the direction of according to loyalty in the insurrectionary districts every possible protection and power, to the end that it might be developed into support of a Government staggering to its fall under the blows of treason.

But still the most solemn and deliberate action of your Government in all its departments, and recently all its actions, proceed upon the assumption that these rebel States had lost all the rights of States.

Among these acts may be mentioned those of July 13, 1861, and 30th of same month. These have been held to be acts "regulating commerce" (11 American Law Register, 419), and they close the ports of the rebel States to all commerce and capture their ships upon the seas. And yet, if these Southern ports were ports of States having the rights of States, you could not only not close them "in regulating commerce," but you could give no port any preference over them. Again, in every revenue and tariff act which you passed in regulating commerce and the revenue since the war began, you have not only "given preferences" against the Southern ports, but you have provided for their being totally shut to all commerce. Could you provide in a tariff bill that the ports of New York shall be open and those of Massachusetts closed?

These are only examples.

POSITION OF THE PRESIDENT

The President has assumed that the rebel States ceased to be States in the sense I am considering when the military power of the rebellion was extinct, and actual war was ended, and the necessity for resort to mere war powers and expedients ceased. It was then, he holds, that the laws and constitutions and powers of State governments of these States sprang into life and force if they were only put into abeyance by the war and could all come back into life and force when the war was gone.

On the 29th of May, 1865, these old State constitutions had either come to be in force or they had not. If they were in force at all, then all their provisions were in force and binding, just as much as New York's constitution was; and could only be changed in the mode prescribed by themselves. Is it competent for the United States to order New York to call a convention and change her constitution? Is it competent for the United States to order it changed in a way in total disregard to the modes of amendment which it prescribes as the only ones by which it can be amended?

Now what has happened in these rebel States? Take one example as a specimen of all. On the 29th of May, 1865, President Johnson issued a proclamation appointing Holden provisional governor of North Carolina, and ordered him, under prescribed rules, to call a convention for "altering or amending the constitution of North Carolina," etc. But then that constitution of North Carolina prescribes how alone it can be altered. The convention ordered by the President is wholly unknown to and in violation of the old constitution; and if it was in force at all on the 29th of May, it could no more be altered in that way than the constitution of England could.

Precisely the same thing, in principle, has occurred in every rebel State except, perhaps, three. By presidential proclamations new governments have been professedly called into existence since the war was ended, and since the old constitutions and laws were revived out of abeyance, if they did revive. In every one the new constitutions and governments have been formed in almost total disregard of the provisions of the constitutions which they profess to amend. Now, it is exactly impossible to comprehend the action of the Executive except upon the assumption that these State constitutions and their governments had not revived so as to control the methods of their own amendment.

No, no, Mr. Chairman, the President himself tells the country, in the notable words of his proclamation, where it is that he deems that he gets this power to order States into existence. His words are, "Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, I, Andrew Johnson, President and Commander-in-chief," etc. Sir, here is an unmistakable avowal of the source of his power and of the cause that called that power forth. If the old government and constitution of North Carolina had in fact come back to her out of the suspended animation which the rebellion had caused, then she on this 29th day of May already had a republican constitution—there was no occasion to alter the constitution to make it republican, nor need to guarantee such a form of government to her.

Sir, let me not be misunderstood. I am not pointing to these acts of the President as wrong, but to show that the President has dealt with this great question precisely in the view I maintain, to wit, that these old State governments were so effectually overthrown that they do not come into force at the end of the war so as to furnish the basis of republican governments to these States; and that it has become the business of the United States to guarantee such governments to hold them. They attack the President who hold that in these acts of the Executive, in creating new constitutions, he did so in violence and disregard of living constitutions and republican governments already there. I do not attack him. If, indeed, these old State constitutions had, on the 29th of May, 1865, resumed their sway over these States, as the new champions of the President in this House allege, then indeed has the man they champion, in disregarding and superseding these constitutions, become usurper. Well may the patriotic executive head of this nation repeat once more the chronic prayer which, in all ages, weak adulation has extorted from men in power, "Deliver me from my friends."

SUPREME COURT'S POSITION

But I go on. I now show that the third or judicial branch of the Government is, by solemn and unanimous judgments, twice repeated, committed, in principle, to the same exact conclusions.

But in presenting these high arguments—the judgments of the Supreme Court—let me make them at once serve the double end of making utterly conclusive and complete the position that a State may cease to have the governing rights of States by reason of rebellion, and of also answering what is urged so much as to the logical and practical consequences of that position.

An able statement of these objections has been laid on our table. Their effect is—

1. That it admits that a State may secede.

2. That, as a consequence of this, Jefferson Davis cannot be punished for treason any more than the Governor of Canada could be.

3. That if we admit the rebels "were to be regarded as belligerents," then when we take them back we become liable for their debts.

4. That individuals and not the States forfeit their rights by treason.

In enforcing these objections my friend from New York [Mr. Raymond] says:

> "If they were out of the Union, when did they become so? They were once states in the Union. If they went out of the Union it was at some specific time and by some specific act."

Before the Supreme Court shall be made to answer, as it will, each one of these objections, permit me, Mr. Chairman, to allude to them; and first to this question about the "specific act," which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Raymond] asks. In respectfully answering his questions let me ask and answer some others of similar legal aspect.

I ask when and by what specific act does "tumult" become "war" in law? I answer, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, when it, in fact, assumes "warlike array and strength." What in a civil war is the specific act and time which changes, in law, an "insurrectionary party" into a "belligerent"? I answer, in the language of the Supreme Court, when in fact "the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the courts of justice cannot be kept open." When, in law, does a revolt become civil war? I answer, in the language of Wheaton, when "the insurrection becomes, in fact, so strong as no longer to obey the sovereign, and to be able by war to make head against him." When, in law, and by what specific act, did the entire population of Virginia, including the loyal men, cease to be "friends," and become "enemies of the United States"? I answer, when, in fact, they became "belligerents."

The destruction and supersedure of all loyal government and law in South Carolina was a fact, not a law. It was this fearful "fact" which made her cease to be a State governing this Union, and not any ordinance of secession.

The distinguished gentleman to whom I have alluded states the fourth objection which I have named in these words:

> "The people of a State may, by treason, forfeit their rights, but in a legal point of view they have no power to affect the condition of a State in the Union."

That is, turned out of metaphysics into English, every inhabitant of a State may, by treason, come to have no political rights or powers whatever as individuals except the right to be hung; but the same individuals, put into a bundle and called a body-politic or State, have all political rights and powers, and can govern this Union! Now, a plain man would have difficulty in being able to see a living, acting, ruling State where there was no constitution, court, or law, and where there were no inhabitants, all these having been hung for treason. Such a man would be dull enough to conclude that if you hung for treason all the people required to make up the body-politic called a State the State would at least be in affliction.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was unfortunate for this distinction between the political State and its people that it has repeatedly encountered the ordeal of the Supreme Court and has been utterly discarded by it.

In 3 Dallas, 93, that court says:

"A distinction is taken at bar between a State and the people of a State. It is a distinction I am not capable of comprehending. By a State forming a republic (speaking of it as a moral person) I do not mean the legislature of the State, the executive of the State, or the judiciary, but all the citizens which compose the State, and are, if I may so express myself, integral parts of it, all together forming a body-politic."

Two years before the objections I have quoted were so ably uttered, they had been pressed, with learning, zeal, and ability equal to his, upon the consideration of the Supreme Court in the "Prize Cases," (2 Black, 635), and had been discarded unanimously by that court, nine judges sitting, including Taney. All the court agree that after the passage of the act of Congress of 13th July, 1861, recognizing the existence of the war, every inhabitant of the rebel States became "enemies" of the United States and "belligerents."

I affirm that the reasoning and judgment of this case settle and establish each one of the following propositions:

1. From the seventh paragraph of the Syllabus (page 636) I quote and affirm that the late "civil war between the United States and the so-called Confederate States," had "such character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and powers which they might exercise in the case of a foreign war."

2. From the ninth paragraph of the same Syllabus I quote and affirm that "all persons residing within the territory occupied by the hostile (rebel) party in this contest were liable to be treated as enemies though not foreigners."

3. I affirm again, quoting from the opinion of the court

(page 673), that "it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights."

4. I affirm that precisely the same objections were urged in this case as those I have quoted; and were stated by the court in these words, "that insurrection is the act of individuals and not of the government or sovereignty," and "that the individuals engaged are the subjects of law," and "that secession ordinances are nullities and ineffectual to release any citizen from his allegiance."

To these objections the Supreme Court replies:

"This argument rests on the assumption of two propositions, each of which is without foundation upon the established law of nations. It assumes that where a civil war exists the party belligerent claiming to be sovereign cannot, for some unknown reason, exercise the rights of belligerents, though the revolutionary party may."

Again the court replies to those objections in the following words, the court italicising the words:

"In organizing this rebellion they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property."

In December, 1865, the ten judges (2 Wallace, 404) unanimously decided the same thing; that all the inhabitants, guilty and innocent, became belligerents and "enemies" of these United States.

The results of these two decisions are that these rebel States:

1. Acted as States, in organizing the rebellion.

2. That all their citizens, innocent and guilty, were thereby made "enemies of the United States."

3. That though they became "enemies" that did not make them "foreign" States so as that when we take them back we must pay their debts.

4. That, as the court decides that the United States may exercise over these people both "belligerent" and "sovereign" rights, therefore we may, as sovereign, try Davis for treason, although we did treat and hold these States as an "enemy's" country.

5. As these States became "enemies'" territory, and all persons residing within it became "enemies of the United States," they cannot at the same time have been a people having any political rights to govern in this Union, unless indeed this Union can be governed by a body of people, every one of whom are held by its law to be the "public enemies of the United States."

HENRY C. DEMING [Ct.].—I would respectfully ask my friend from Ohio if he has any authorities, outside of those quoted in the prize cases, for the purpose of vindicating the position that the sovereign in a civil war may exercise both sovereign and belligerent rights?

MR. SHELLABARGER.—I have looked through the authorities on this subject, and in the modern and respectable authorities of the world I find no dissenting voice. The doctrine will be found not only in the text and notes of Wheaton, but in Vattel, in Ward, in Halleck, and Bello.

MR. DEMING.—I would ask my friend if he has looked over the notes in Lawrence's Wheaton for the purpose of seeing the conflicting authorities which Lawrence there quotes on this specific point; that is to say, in a civil war it is incompetent for the sovereign to exercise both civil and belligerent rights.

MR. SHELLABARGER.—I answer the gentleman that I have looked through those notes carefully and thoroughly, and that while, if my memory is not now at fault, I find some unimportant conflict of authority, I do not find any conflict that at all impairs the force of settled law as established in the prize cases.

Sir, it is a weak and inadequate statement of the truth to say that he mocks the law, offends the loyal sense of the people, and insults their common sense who affirms that that people or those States had any rights of government in this Union, every man, woman, and child of whom have been pronounced by two unanimous judgments of the Supreme Court of the Republic to be, in contemplation of the supreme law of the Republic and of the law of nations, the public enemies of the United States.

Does the gentleman [Mr. Raymond] yet ask for "the specific act" that deprived these States of all the rights of States, and made them "enemies"? I once more answer him in the words of the Supreme Court that the specific acts were, they causelessly waged against their own Government a "war which all the world acknowledge to have been the greatest civil war known in the history of the human race." That war was waged by these people "as States," and it went through long, dreary years. In it they threw off and defied the authority of your Constitution, laws, and Government; they obliterated from their State constitutions and laws every vestige of recognition of your Government; they discarded all official oaths, and took in their places oaths to support your enemy's government. They seized, in their States, all the nation's property; their Senators and Representatives in your Congress insulted, bantered, defied, and then left you; they expelled from their land or assassinated every inhabitant of known loyalty; they betrayed and surrendered your armies; they passed sequestration and other acts in flagitious violation of the law of nations, making every citizen of the United States an alien enemy, and placing in the treasury of their rebellion all money and property due such citizens. They framed iniquity and universal murder into law. They besieged, for years, your capital, and sent your bleeding armies, in rout, back here upon the very sanctuaries of your national power. Their pirates burned your unarmed commerce upon every sea. They carved the bones of your unburied heroes into ornaments, and drank from goblets made out of their skulls. They poisoned your fountains, put mines under your soldiers' prisons; organized bands whose leaders were concealed in your homes, and whose commissions ordered the torch and yellow fever to be carried to your cities, and to your women and children. They planned one universal bonfire of the North from Lake Ontario to the Missouri. They murdered by systems of starvation and exposure sixty thousand of your sons, as brave and heroic as ever martyrs were. They destroyed in the five years of horrid war another army so large that it would reach almost around the globe in marching columns; and then to give to the infernal drama a fitting close, and to concentrate into one crime all that is criminal in crime, and all that is detestable in barbarism, they killed the President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I allude to these horrid events of the recent past not to revive frightful memories, or to bring back the impulses toward the perpetual severance of this people which they provoke. I allude to them to remind us how utter were the overthrow and obliteration of all government, divine and human; how total was the wreck of all constitutions and laws, political, civil, and international. I allude to them to condense their monstrous enormities of guilt into one crime, and to point the gentleman from New York [Mr. Raymond] to it, and to tell him that was "the specific act."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the combined forces of the Constitution and the public law, the obvious dictates of reason, justice, and common sense, and these enforced by the approval of repeated and unanimous judgments of the Supreme Court can settle for our own Government any principle of its law, then it is established that organized rebellions are not "States," and that these eleven distinct political treasons, which they organized into one, and called it "the Confederate States," had no powers or rights as States of this Union, nor had the people thereof.

RESTORATION OF THE STATES

If these States lost their powers and rights as States, by what authority and means are they restored? Is it accomplished by mere cessation of war and the determination of the rebel inhabitants to resume the powers of States; or is this Government entitled to take jurisdiction over the time and manner of their return?

I hold that the latter is the obvious truth.

Let it be admitted that these rebel districts may, without the assent of the United States, and without regard to the state of their loyalty, resume, at pleasure, all the powers of States—this Government having no jurisdiction to determine upon the question of their loyalty or the republican character of the new State governments—then we have this result.

There were, during the first years of the war, twenty-three rebel Senators, including Breckinridge and another. That was more than one-third of the Senate. These twenty-three in the Senate are enough to deprive the United States of all power ever to make a treaty, or to expel a member from the Senate, or to remove from office by impeachment a rebel Secretary of War like Floyd, or a rebel Secretary of the Treasury like Cobb, or a rebel United States judge like Humphreys, or an imbecile President who thought secession unconstitutional, and its prevention equally unconstitutional, like Buchanan. How long, sir, could your Government survive with such a Senate, one-third rebel? How long can you live deprived of these powers vital to every government? Not a week, sir.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is precisely what might have occurred at any day during this rebellion if cessation of war entitles the revolted States to resume the powers of States in defiance of the will of this Government; and it is precisely what may occur to-day if these States be indeed disloyal yet at heart. If, after exhausting "all the resources of war" for the overthrow of the Government, and failing, it is, indeed, competent for them to abandon these resources, and resort to "the resources of statesmanship," and resume at once the high powers of States in the Union, without the assent of such Government, then there has not been an hour since the rebellion began, and the hour is not now, in which this Government has not literally been in the power and at the mercy of the rebellion.

Is it replied to what has been said in regard to the power for mischief of disloyal Senators in the case which I have stated, expel them? the reply is vain, because the same twenty-three who can prevent any impeachment or the formation of any treaty are also enough to prevent any expulsion under the Constitution.

Is it again replied, exclude these rebels from the Senate under the clause making each House the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members? the reply is obviously frivolous.

1. If under this clause you may exclude a Senator duly elected and qualified in every other respect and sense than that he comes from and is elected by disloyal States, then you yield the whole argument, and accord to this Government all the powers of self-preservation which I am insisting upon. The difference is that you find the power of self-protection under a clause by which each House is compelled to judge separately of the election and qualification of its members; and hence you occupy a position where you may have twenty-four States in the Union, in the Senate; thirty-four in the Union, in the House; and Heaven knows how many in the Union for electing a President.

2. If you reply, I will reject these twenty-three rebel Senators, not because their States can elect none, but because they are "rebels," in the case you put; the reply is vain. When Mason, Slidell, Davis, and Breckinridge last took their seats in your Senate, who knew, or could have proved, that they came there to embarrass and destroy your Government? Could either have been excluded from any known or ascertainable personal disqualification?

No, Mr. Chairman, there is no escape. If the United States has no power to decide, as a great and sovereign people acting through their Government, what shall be a "State" in her high Union, and cannot determine when, out of the wreck and ruin of old States, have been formed new republican States, based upon the only foundations upon which a republican State of this Union can be built, that of the general consent and loyalty of its people, then indeed is your Government not so much as "a rope of sand." It is a monster compelled by the organic law of its life to terminate that life by self-slaughter.

But, sir, such is not the law of its life. I have already shown that the President has discarded such conclusions. I now invoke the authority of the highest court of the Republic, and by that I show that it has decided this question also.

I state the effect of this decision in the language of a distinguished law author (see 1 Bishop, Crim. Law; sec. 133). He says:

"It has been settled by adjudication (7 Howard, 42 and 43) that it is for the President and the two Houses of Congress to decide whether a particular government within a State is republican or not; and to recognize it if it is, and to refuse to recognize it if it is not, and the adjudication of the matter by them is conclusive and binds the courts and the nation. It is not therefore for any class of persons in a State which has ceased to have a government to set up a government of their own."

If it is asked me now, granting your position that these States in revolt ceased to have any powers of government in the Union, still have not new ones been reorganized safe and fit to resume these high powers? I answer, sir, the question, "is it safe, and are they fit," are the stupendous facts now on trial by the American Congress. It was the whole end of the feeble argument which I have concluded to vindicate my Government's power to take jurisdiction of this inquest and to hold this trial.

But if I am demanded by what standard of fitness, and what guaranties for safety, Congress shall decide these great facts now on trial, it will serve all the purposes of this argument and this hour to reply that in the true and high sense and spirit of the memorable words of the President of the United States I find a fitting answer. He says:

"No State can be regarded as thoroughly organized, which has not adopted irreversible guaranties for the rights of the freedmen."

Mr. Chairman, let this noble utterance—"irreversible guaranties for the rights" of American citizens of every race and condition—be written with pen of iron and point of diamond in your Constitution. Let it thus be made "irreversible" indeed, by the action of the State, in the only way it can be made irreversible; and then, to establish this and every other guaranty of the Constitution upon the only sure foundation of a free republic—the equality of the people and of the States—make, by the same organic law, every elector in the Union absolutely equal in his right of representation in that renovated Union, and I am content.

Let the revolted States base their republican State governments upon a general and sincere loyalty of the people and come to us under the guaranties of this renewed Union, and we hail their coming and the hour that brings them.

If you ask again, "Suppose such general loyalty should never reappear, shall they be dependencies forever?"

Sir, convince me that the case is supposable, then with deepest sorrow I answer—forever!

On January 9 Daniel E. Voorhees [Ind.], an extreme State Rights Democrat, added to the embarrassment of the Administration in its campaign for Republican support by offering resolutions which praised the President's message as an "able, judicious and patriotic State paper" containing "the safest and most practicable" policy which "can be applied to our disordered domestic affairs," and which are also sound constitutionally, being based on the principle that "no State nor number of States confederated together can in any manner sunder their connection with the Federal Union."

The speaker repudiated the charge that the Democrats were supporting the President in order to secure the spoils of office which were at his disposal.

Our action will be independent, with no desire, like the adroit animal in the fable, to take advantage of the quarrel which now rages among the voters to snatch away the feast over which they are contending. For my part, as in the past, so in the future, I shall pursue what I conceive to be the right, indifferent alike to the allurements of reward or the terrors of reproach.

Mr. Voorhees charged that there was an organized conspiracy in the Republican party to play the part of Joab toward the President, saluting him with a kiss and the kindly salutation, "How is it with thee, my brother?" when their poniard's point was seeking a vital spot under the fifth rib.

He further stated that Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] was the master spirit of this conspiracy, as shown by his instigation of the Special Committee of Fifteen, at whose head had been placed a man (Senator William P. Fessenden) "who asserts that the Union was destroyed by the war and that it remains so to this day."

By this movement, he said, we were asked to ravel to pieces all that the President had done to restore the Union.

The healing principles of the Constitution are, in my judgment, rapidly doing the needed work of restoration, and yet we are at this stage of the process asked to break again the once fractured limbs, to tear agape the half-closed wounds, and to cause the whole land to bleed afresh. Sir, I shall stand by the physician who is working the cure, as against that blind and fatal empiricism which first pronounces the patient dead and then commences giving medicine.

Mr. Voorhees then attacked the Stevens theory that the States lately in rebellion were "dead States." He charged that the theory had the sinister and ulterior purpose of vengeance and revolutionary destruction.

Certain beasts of prey, we are told, prefer to find their quarry ready slain, in order to feast upon it in comfort and repose. And so the radical party of the country would find it easier far to make its unnatural banquet on the rights, privileges, laws, liberties, and property of the South by declaring at once that there is no living political community in all that wide region to exclaim against the enormity. Its reasoning on this point is that it is safer and less troublesome to rob a corpse than it is to pick the pockets of the living. This is the highwayman's doctrine of convenience, introduced here now as a party platform. It is more and worse. It is an assertion that the American Union itself is dead. While it claims that the Southern States have destroyed themselves, yet it admits that, like blind Samson of old, in their dying agonies they seized hold of the pillars and tore the temple in ruins to its very foundations, and that they in their desolation to-day are only a portion of the general wreck. It is notice to the world that the war to restore the Union was an utter failure—that the war is over and yet the Union is rent in twain.

In what attitude before the civilized nations does this pernicious heresy place the Federal Government? If we were waging war on an independent power, a separate existing nation, how was it that we refused all negotiations for peace except upon the basis of its utter annihilation? Wars between different civilized powers are made to repair injuries, to resent insults, or to reclaim rights which have been denied; but there is no law of nations which justifies one government, because of its superior strength, in inflicting obliteration and murder upon its inferior neighbor. This doctrine is one of barbarism, in which the law of force is the law of right. Much pathetic eloquence and many bitter tears have attested the world's sympathy with Poland, with Hungary, and with poor, poor Ireland, and maledictions attend upon their destroyers; but with what curses of indignation would an enlightened posterity and an impartial history assail us for blotting out by sheer force of arms a nation of our own kindred, who simply desired to possess their own in peace and leave us to do the same!

Sir, in every aspect the theory which now controls the majority of this House is fraught with death and disgrace to the Republic. I turn from its contemplation to a more cheerful theme. I will contrast against it the conduct and principles of the Executive, for which, I think, he deserves well at the hands of his countrymen.

What was the wish, the hope, the prayer of every heart not fatally bent on mischief, not an enemy to the human race, when the last of the Southern forces laid down their arms? Was it that this bitter period of strife should be prolonged and the fires of hate and malice kept alive forever? Was it that at the close of such a hurricane, with the billows yet swelling in angry commotion around us, we were to start afresh upon the long voyage of political discovery and legislative piracy which the bold mariner from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] and his radical followers now, like Viking robbers of the ancient seas, point out to us? Was it not rather that the vessel should be brought back and quietly and firmly anchored as nearly as possible at her old moorings? Was it not rather that the corner-stones, boundary lines, and landmarks of the fathers of the Republic should be traced out and restored? I here assert that when the President closed the temple of Janus, refused to go in search of new principles by which to administer the Government, and extended the hand of friendship and assistance to the crippled and bleeding, though living, yes, living States of the South, he met the demands of the popular will, and laid claims to the gratitude of the present and the future.

Mr. Voorhees denied that the President's appointment of the provisional State governors was an usurpation.

By his oath he must enforce the laws. He found States without legal officers and unable to move forward in the channel of their duties. A State of this Union when the Federal laws are no longer obstructed cannot be in passive abeyance. It is an integral part of the Federal body, and if the body be sound there can be no paralysis among its members—they must have vitality; and in the performance of his duty the President used the best means in his power to revive and restore their lawful functions.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] saw fit to announce that the position of the President in regard to the Southern States was "not an argument, but a mockery." I partly dissent. I think it is both. It is an unanswerable argument in behalf of the early and true principles of the Government, and it is also an overwhelming and consuming mockery of the bloody designs, avaricious hopes, and greedy expectations of all those who desired when the war was over to rule the people of the South without the restraint of law; to humiliate them with an iron rod; to confiscate their lands and buy them in at nominal prices; to change the proprietorship of the soil and drive into exile and destitution its present owners until a new population should take control and, by the aid of the enfranchised negro, plant a Puritan ascendency all over the South; who here now unfurl the banner of "territorial condition," because all these consequences follow its triumph. Sir, this class has been mocked, and God and angels and all good men rejoice in their confusion. Their ascendency in this land would create a pandemonium of discord and a carnival of all the dark and cruel spirits of hate and revenge for generations to come.

But, Mr. Speaker, allow me to inquire whether this opposition to the Executive is not a new discovery, an afterthought, manufactured for a special purpose on the part of those who adhered to and upheld the late administration of Mr. Lincoln in regard to the continued existence and vitality of the Southern States during the late rebellion. Are they not estopped from this assault? In more than a hundred ways and forms, by military orders, in his annual messages, instructions to our foreign ministers, in letters and speeches to his own countrymen, and especially by his numerous proclamations, the late Executive always and at all times recognized the enduring existence of all the States over which the American flag had ever floated.

The late chief of the great party of the North dealt with American States, the people whereof were in rebellion, and not with a foreign power subject to conquest; and if his memory is sacred to his followers, they should not insult it by pronouncing his policy a delusion and a mockery ere his untimely tomb is fairly closed.

Sir, I am aware that many on the opposite side of the chamber do not indorse the destructive theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but who are nevertheless assisting to carry its results into practice. They deny his premises that the States are dead, but concur in his conclusion that they shall not be represented on this floor. To my mind their position is the worst of all. They embrace a consequence without a cause. They have reached an end which has no beginning. They are standing on a structure which has no foundation. While the premises of the gentleman from Pennsylvania are unsound, yet his logic is true. But those who refuse to follow him and yet deny representation have neither premises nor logic. If the States are out of the Union of course their Representatives are strangers to us, but if they are in the Union what power can close these doors against them except the power of lawless, revolutionary force?

What madness is this which proposes to govern the people of eleven American States, States "included within this Union," without representation? Where on this side of the ocean has been found such a monstrous principle of government? Its adoption would carry us back to the days of King George, and as fatally subvert liberty as if Cornwallis had triumphed on the plains of Yorktown.

But the advocates of this doctrine say that this phase of absolute despotism is only to last for a season; that these States are to go unrepresented only for a few years until guaranties for the future are obtained. Guaranties for the future! This vague term is another political convenience like that of "dead States." Under it each innovator, dreamer, and revolutionist throughout the land can demand and require the fulfillment of all his fantastic desires against the South before he is willing to admit her Representatives. It is the cloak for every higher-law purpose now abroad in the public mind. It is a well-filled arsenal from which to shower confiscation, negro suffrage, reapportionment, proscription of persons, and every other missile of torture that was ever leveled at an unfortunate people.

Sir, I deny that to a State can be refused her representation for a single moment on such grounds. Peace and obedience to law are the only guaranties for the future which any government can justly require of its citizens. Where is the power in the Constitution whereby anything more can be demanded? It may be said that the President himself has required guaranties in his policy of restoration. Even if he did so, I do not understand that he proposed to make their refusal a pretext for violating the Constitution himself. But I have not regarded his advice to the South in the nature of this movement in Congress. On the great question of slavery I hold that the action of the Southern States in adopting the constitutional amendment has been wise and beneficent. The system was destroyed already by the force of arms and the operations of war, but it is better for the future dignity and history of the nation that a fact accomplished of the utmost magnitude should have the sanction of fundamental law. It was a vast step, too, toward a speedy restoration, and that alone is a powerful appeal in favor of the counsel of the Executive and the action of the South.

One other subject has been much canvassed under this new-coined phrase of guaranties for the future. The war debt incurred by the Southern States in their attempt to establish a confederacy has been shaken in the face of the Northern people to incite them to a policy of distrust and severity. Everybody well knows, of course, that it will never be paid. All history tells us that the debt of a defeated revolution is always lost. The government that contracted it is no more, and the ruined and exhausted people gladly turn their backs on the dead and melancholy past and look forward to the future with new hopes, new ties, and a new destiny. As to the victor in arms ever assuming such a debt, no instance is known in the annals of mankind, and such an idea is not respectable outside of an asylum for the insane. I regard, therefore, the war debt of the South as fit only for one use—the declamation of demagogues and the malign purposes of political agitators.

But again, as to the right of representation, immediate and without any other guaranty than obedience to the Constitution. In the reconstruction proclamation of the late Chief Magistrate, he clearly and explicitly asserts the right of any State, whose people were then in hostility to the general Government, to be represented in the Federal Congress, and announces that he will consider such fact as an evidence that neither the State nor its people are any longer in rebellion. Where then was the guaranty doctrine? It had not yet been born. We were then wooing and courting representation because it suited our purposes to do so. We are now repelling it for the same reason.

But it may be said that it is not within the province of the executive department of the Government to determine the question of representation in the legislative department. But has not Congress itself made a record on this subject which it cannot ignore and which the majority dare not face? Has it not officially, over and over again, in both branches, assumed the very position which it now seeks with such flagrant assurance to repudiate? The cry is now that we must look to Congress for our policy of restoration. This place has suddenly become a citadel of wisdom, power, and dominion. It is a city of refuge, where all the disappointed spoliators, insane anarchists, bloody Jacobins, promoters of vengeance, disturbers of the peace, self-constituted saints who imagine themselves in partnership with the Almighty to assist Him in punishing the sins of the world, where law-breakers and revolutionists of every shade and color now flee to escape from the wise, successful, and constitutional policy of the President. "To your tents, O Israel!" was the ancient and legitimate cry of alarm. "Look to Congress, look to Congress!" now rings out on the air as a call to battle in behalf of chaos, disorder, and interminable woes. The populace of France, tossed in a tumultuous delirium of hate, drunken with blood, dethroning Deity and reverencing a harlot, shouted, "Look to the Assembly, look to the Assembly!" where the Mountain murdered the Girondists, and where Robespierre, Marat, and Saint Just planned, in the name of public virtue, the destruction of human life and of human society. But, sir, if we must "look to Congress," let me show the wistful gazers a picture of congressional action which will fill their hearts with dismay, and which Congress itself cannot to-day behold without feelings of humiliation and shame over its present position.

Was Tennessee destroyed or were her people entitled to no voice here because of her ordinance of secession? Sir, her name was called here during more than half the period of the war, and the representatives of her people answered to their names in both ends of the Capitol. The gentleman who in vain sought even a recognition of his own existence in this body when the present Congress was organized [Horace Maynard] was then here with the full sanction of the same political majority which now spurns him from the door of its caucus room, and drives him from the protection which the escutcheon of his glorious State, under the administration of law, affords its Representatives in Congress. Shall we now assert that at that time Tennessee was a portion of a foreign government? Shall we then as the next step of supreme absurdity declare the President of the United States himself an unnaturalized foreigner, a captive to our lance and spear, entitled doubtless to kind treatment, but in no sense a citizen of the United States, inasmuch as he never expatriated himself from the alien and hostile province of Tennessee, and never acknowledged himself subdued to the embraces of the Federal flag as the symbol of a separate nationality? I am prepared to hear even this miserable libel on American institutions asserted. Nothing is allowed to stand in the way of fanaticism. Its purposes are inexorable, and its devotees often deem themselves in truth and honesty the philosophers of their age; but Frederick the Great made a wise observation when he said, "If I wanted to ruin one of my provinces I would make over its government to the philosophers." Their theories are always in advance of their times; and in practical sense and actual utility they meet neither the requirements of the past, present, or future. The philosophers of Congress at least contradict themselves at very short stages of progress, and give no evidence of either ability or consistency.

HENRY C. DEMING [Ct.].—Will my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] inform this House when he thinks the right to representation here from these States commenced? Did it commence at Antietam, at Gettysburg, or when did it commence?

MR. VOORHEES.—My answer is, "Peace and obedience to law are the only guaranties for the future which any government can require of its people." And when peace and obedience to law reign among any portion of the American people, I hold that they are entitled to representation here.

MR. DEMING.—Then I suppose it will be necessary for the gentleman to show that obedience to law exists at this time in the reclaimed territories?

MR. VOORHEES.—Undoubtedly. I think the President and General Grant have shown that fact.

But one step further in this congressional record. As if to settle forever the construction which should be placed upon the condition of the Southern States, and their right to representation, Congress enacted and the President approved a law on the 4th of March, 1862, which fixed the number of the House of Representatives from and after that date.

In order to obtain the number of two hundred and forty-one Representatives as contemplated by this law, every Southern State whose citizens were in revolt must have been represented according to her population. What more can I do than to make this statement? What argument could add to its binding force? If men will repudiate to-day what they did yesterday, if they refuse to be bound by their own principles declared in the solemn form of a law, if the highest precedents of their own official action fall without force upon their ears, then, indeed, they are beyond the power of reason and callous to the reproach and derision of the world.

John A. Bingham [O.] replied to Mr. Voorhees. He said that the theory of Mr. Voorhees was the one upon which the secessionists had proceeded in their unsuccessful attempt to destroy the Union, and the one which the "Peace Democrats" of the North had maintained during the war, thereby aiding the secessionists. He denied the assertion of Mr. Voorhees that Andrew Johnson, then as Vice-President or now as President, upheld this theory.

In the very passage which the gentleman has read from the message the President has said that "the functions of the rebel States were suspended." Of course if the functions of a State are suspended the powers of the State cannot be exercised. That is the President's position; the very converse of it is the position of the gentleman who comes here to introduce general resolutions of commendation of the President's message!

Will the gentleman undertake by his mere platitudes to assert here that if by chance five thousand men in South Carolina, lately in insurrection, choose to be represented in convention, and in all things manifest a willingness to return to their allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States in good faith, it follows of necessity that the residue of unrepentant insurgents in that State, whose hands are red with the blood of their countrymen, have a right to representation on this floor, and that, too, as provided by the act of 1862, to which the gentleman referred, giving them six Representatives and two Senators? I want an answer. Who undertakes to assert any such thing, and who is to judge in this matter—the Congress or the President?

MR. VOORHEES.—Mr. Speaker, the easiest, and at the same time most absurd, mode of argument is to suppose absurd things. I just step back on the fact that General Grant has been down there, and did not find any such state of things. That is sufficient for my argument at this time. Now, when you find a case of only five thousand in the community willing to discharge their duties, we will consider that.

MR. BINGHAM.—Well, the gentleman has given us about the stoutest reason for his argument, I suppose, that he could find. He stands behind the shadow of a mighty name. General Grant, I believe, was one day in the State of South Carolina, if at all, on that journey; I am not certain if he touched the borders of the State at all. The gentleman thereupon concludes that it is all right in South Carolina; General Grant did not undertake to say so. But the gentleman by his explanation concedes—and that is enough for my purpose—that the representatives of the people of the United States have some right to inquire.

The gentleman admits that he voted for the proposed amendment to the Constitution making it hereafter unconstitutional to assume any part of the debt contracted in aid of the late rebellion, or of any debt which may hereafter be contracted in aid of any rebellion against the United States.

Well, sir, if the people of the United States are justified in taking that one security for the future, are they not also justified in taking such additional security for the future as will bring in all the hereafter peace and prosperity to the South as well as to the North, to the East as well as to the West?

Oh, sir, it ought to have occurred to the gentleman, when he was meditating his carefully prepared speech in commendation of the President, that there appeared in that same message of his an utterance which ought to attract the attention of this House, and the attention of the whole country, and that was when he reproduced the words which express the true intent and meaning of the Constitution of the United States. "Equal and exact justice to all men." That is the utterance of the President in his message, an utterance which the gentleman found it convenient to be quite oblivious of when he came to make up his words of commendation. According to the political creed of that party which proposes to take the President into its most holy and jealous keeping, there is only to be equal and exact justice secured to white men. [Laughter.] Yes, his party were for equal and exact justice to white men, uttering the horrid blasphemy all the while that this is a Government of white men.

I propose, with the help of this Congress and of the American people, that hereafter there shall not be any disregard of that essential guaranty of your Constitution in any State of the Union. And how? By simply adding an amendment to the Constitution to operate on all the States of this Union alike, giving to Congress the power to pass all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons—which includes every citizen of every State—their equal personal rights; and if the tribunals of South Carolina will not respect the rights of the citizens of Massachusetts under the Constitution of their common country, I desire to see the Federal judiciary clothed with the power to take cognizance of the question, and assert those rights by solemn judgment, inflicting upon the offenders such penalties as will compel a decent respect for this guaranty to all the citizens of every State.

I undertake to say that the President of the United States will be found coöperating with the representatives of the people in their endeavor to introduce into the Constitution not that which will mar it, but that which will perfect it and enable the people hereafter to secure and reap for themselves and for their posterity forever the great ends for which that Constitution was ordained.

I repel every insinuation or intimation, come from what quarter it may, that the representatives of the people have manifested thus far the slightest disposition to interfere with the prerogatives, if gentlemen please so to term the powers, of the Executive. I deny that the representatives of the people have taken any step indicating any such purpose, or any purpose to raise an issue or create a conflict between the President and Congress. But I may say, further, that if the day ever comes when the President of the United States finds in this House no other supporters than those who combined together at Chicago in 1864 to bury him where they hoped that even the hand of resurrection itself could never again find him, then God help the President and save him from his friends. [Applause.]

There are two parties to the reorganization of these rebel States. The President cannot constitute a State; Congress alone cannot constitute a State; nobody upon earth can constitute an organized, constitutional State of the Union but the people of the United States, and the people of the proposed State cooperating. If the people of South Carolina do their part rightly and well, to which end no enabling act is needed, as it is but the exercise of the right of petition, which is guaranteed by the Constitution, and which you can neither confer nor take away by law, it will only then remain for Congress, upon her presenting a complete organization, to admit her to her equal position as a State within the Union, with full power to exercise her restored functions and with full right to her equal representation in the Senate and House. The speedy restoration of every State to its equal position, as soon as it can be done safely for the Republic, is, I am sure, the purpose of this House and of the President.

Mr. Stevens.—I want to know whether at the time the so-called Confederate Government was a government in fact, was organized and performed all the functions of government, the laws then passed and the decrees then made are not binding upon the people of the rebellious States?

Mr. Bingham.—They may be if not in conflict with the laws of the United States, and that people choose to submit to them now that peace is restored. They are void under the Constitution of the United States, as against the rights of any citizen who did not assent to them. I doubt whether there can be found upon this floor a single man who will deliberately say, if the insurgent State of North Carolina, through her corrupt and treasonable judiciary, had decreed for the use of the Southern Confederacy the confiscation of the property of that venerable man, Pettigrew, who clung to the Constitution and cherished the hope of restoration as he cherished the hope of a better life, that the United States had not the power to reverse that decree and restore that property.

If South Carolina all this while was a State, with all the powers of a State, within the Union, how can we reach any such case? My learned colleague [Gen. Rutherford B. Hayes] knows that the State of Ohio, when she legislates touching the transfer of real estate within her limits and among her citizens, and without impairing the obligation of contracts, is beyond the power of the Federal judiciary, and cannot be restrained therein by the Federal Government.

With the explanation I have given his words I see no occasion to take issue with the President upon the status of the States in rebellion, but admit that these States remained States through the conflict for Federal purposes; that means that the State lines remained, that the judicial districts remained intact, so that when the war ceased in those States the Government of the United States could administer justice in every one of those States, and try therein all persons for crimes against the United States therein committed. I do not feel disposed to admit, if a citizen of South Carolina were to-day to commit treason against the United States at Charleston, that he could not be there tried for his crime; nor if he committed his crime there last year that he could escape trial when arraigned, on the plea that the district of South Carolina, previously prescribed by the law of the United States, had ceased, either by his treason or by the treason of others, to be a judicial district within a State.

I never was of that class of persons who believed or assented to the position for a moment, and I do not know if there is anyone here who does, that all the people within the limits of that confederacy were alien enemies. According to the Constitution and laws of the United States Government, every man is responsible for his own crime, and not for the crimes of others. So that when the sovereignty of the country comes to be restored —in Virginia and the Carolinas—the judiciary of the United States are bound by their oaths to discriminate between those who contributed by the compulsion of the bayonet to the support of the rebellion and those who originated it and are the guilty perpetrators of the great wrong. There is a wide difference between Jefferson Davis, the leader of the revolt against the Union, who, to enter upon it, voluntarily broke his oath to support the Constitution of his country, and that poor, poverty-stricken conscript who served the confederacy of traitors only because of compulsion, or to secure thereby his daily bread.

I have said enough, I think, on this subject to satisfy gentlemen that the President stands by the great body of this House touching the status of the States. They need reconstruction. Their functions are suspended. Something must be done to give them an equal place in the Union. That is what the President says and what the House says. Who shall judge whether that which it was essential to do has been done at all, and, if done, whether it has been done rightly? Who is to decide it? I say it, without waiting to quote authorities, that the loyal people of the loyal States, who saved the Union, and are represented on this floor, are the final judges upon that question, and from their decision there lies no appeal.

I propose to bring this whole question to an issue before the House by offering the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentlemen from Indiana:

Resolved, That this House has an abiding confidence in the President, and that in the future, as in the past, he will coöperate with Congress in restoring to equal position and rights with the other States in the Union all the States lately in insurrection.

And on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. Stevens.—I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham] to consent that this whole subject be referred to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. Bingham.—Very well, I will withdraw the call for the previous question, and will move that the resolution with my substitute be referred to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. And upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 32.

Henry J. Raymond [N. Y.] and William A. Darling [N. Y.] were the only Republicans who voted with the Democrats in the negative. This vote was extremely significant. The Republican party as represented in the popular Chamber of Congress had refused almost unanimously to express their confidence in the President, who but little more than a year before had received their votes as Vice-President. The Administration, in its plan to receive Republican indorsement of its policy of reconstruction, had been utterly defeated. Henceforth the Republican party was to be the Opposition.

Mr. Raymond in particular was bitterly disappointed. Says Mr. Blaine:

Few members had ever entered the House with greater personal prestige or with stronger assurance of success. He had come with a high ambition—an ambition justified by his talent and training. He had come with the expectation of a congressional career as successful as that already achieved in his editorial life. But he met a defeat which hardly fell short of a disaster. He had made a good reply to Mr. Stevens, had indeed gained much credit by it, and when he returned home for the holidays he had reason to believe that he had made a brilliant beginning in the parliamentary field. But the speech of Mr. Shellabarger had destroyed his argument, and had given a rallying point for the Republicans, so incontestably strong as to hold the entire party in allegiance to principle rather than in allegiance to the Administration. If anything had been needed to complete Mr. Raymond's discomfiture after the speech of Mr. Shellabarger, it was supplied in the speech of Mr. Voorhees. He had been ranked among the most virulent opponents of Mr. Lincoln's Administration, had been bitterly denunciatory of the war policy of the Government, and was regarded as a leader of that section of the Democratic party to which the most odious epithets of disloyalty had been popularly applied. Mr. Raymond, in speaking of the defeat, always said that the Democrats had destroyed Johnson by their support, and that he could have effected a serious division in the ranks of Republican members if he could have had the benefit of the hostility of Mr. Voorhees and other anti-war Democrats.

Three weeks after Mr. Shellabarger's reply Mr. Raymond made a rejoinder. He struggled hard to recover the ground which he had obviously lost, but he did not succeed in changing his status in the House, or in securing recruits for the Administration from the ranks of his fellow Republicans. To fail in that was to fail in every thing. That he made a clever speech was not denied, for every intellectual effort of Mr. Raymond exhibited cleverness. That he made the most of a weak cause, and to some extent influenced public opinion, must also be freely conceded. But his most partial friends were compelled to admit that he had absolutely failed to influence Republican action in Congress and had only succeeded in making himself an apparent ally of the Democratic party—a position in every way unwelcome and distasteful to Mr. Raymond. His closing speech was marked by many pointed interruptions from Mr. Shellabarger and was answered at some length by Mr. Stevens. But nothing beyond a few keen thrusts and parries and some sharp wit at Mr. Raymond's expense was added to the debate.

CHAPTER XI

The First Civil Rights Bill

Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] Introduces in the Senate Bill to Protect All Persons in the United States in Their Civil Rights—Debate in the Senate: Varying Views, by Sen. Trumbull, Peter G. Van Winkle [W. Va.], Willard Saulsbury [Del.], James Guthrie [Ky.], Edgar Cowan [Pa.], James H. Lane [Kan.], Jacob M. Howard [Mich.], Reverdy Johnson [Md.], Charles Sumner [Mass.], Thomas A. Hendricks [Ind.], Garrett Davis [Ky.], Daniel Clark [N. H.], William M. Stewart [Nev.], Lot M. Morrill [Me.], John B. Henderson [Mo.], James R. Doolittle [Wis.), Henry S. Lane [Ind.]; Bill Is Passed—Debate in the House: Varying Views by James F. Wilson [Ia.], Andrew J. Rogers [N. J.], M. Russell Thayer [Pa.], Charles A. Eldridge [Wis.], John A. Bingham [O.], Henry J. Raymond [N. Y.]; Bill Is Passed—The President's Veto—Debate in the Senate: Sen. Trumbull; Congress Passes Bill Over Veto.

ON the same day (January 5, 1866) that he introduced in the Senate the bill for the extension of the Freedmen's Bureau [see page 183] Lyman Trumbull [Ill.] introduced a bill "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication."

As summarized by James G. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress" the provisions of the bill were as follows:

It declared that "there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; but the inhabitants of every race and color shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefits of all laws and provisions for the security of personal property; and shall be subject to like punishment, fines and penalties, and none other—any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

Any person who under any law, statute, or regulation of any kind should attempt to violate the provisions of the act would be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding one year. Very stringent provisions were made, and a whole framework of administration devised, by which the rights conferred under this enactment could be enforced through "the judicial power of the United States." The district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals of the United States, the commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and every other officer who was sufficiently empowered by the President of the United States were, by the act, specially authorized and required, at the expense of the United States, to institute proceedings against every person who should violate its provisions, and "cause him or them to be arrested and imprisoned for trial at such court of the United States or territorial court as, by the act, has cognizance of the case."

Civil Rights Bill

Senate, January 12-February 2, 1866

Senator Trumbull brought forward his bill on January 12, giving a clear exposition of its provisions.

It did not come up again until January 29, when Senator Trumbull proposed (lest the term "inhabitant" should be judicially construed to mean "citizen" in the narrow political sense and thus nullify the purpose of the bill) that the bill be amended so as to declare persons native to the United States, excluding Indians not taxed, "citizens." He said that the bill was next in importance to the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery, of which measure, indeed, it was an essential complement, securing the freedom there declared.

There is very little importance in the general declaration of abstract truths and principles unless they can be carried into effect, unless the persons who are to be affected by them have some means of availing themselves of their benefits. Of what avail was the immortal declaration "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and "that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men," to the millions of the African race in this country who were ground down and degraded and subjected to a slavery more intolerable and cruel than the world ever before knew? Of what avail was it to the citizen of Massachusetts [Samuel Hoar], who, a few years ago, went to South Carolina to enforce a constitutional right in court, that the Constitution of the United States declared that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? And of what avail will it now be that the Constitution of the United States has declared that slavery shall not exist, if in the late slave-holding States laws are to be enacted and enforced depriving persons of African descent of privileges which are essential to freemen?

It is the intention of this bill to secure those rights. The laws in the ex-slave States have made a distinction against persons of African descent on account of their color, whether free or slave.

Here the speaker discussed the "black codes" of several Southern States [see page 190 ss].

The purpose of the bill under consideration is to destroy all these discriminations, and to carry into effect the constitutional amendment.

Has Congress authority to give practical effect to the great declaration that slavery shall not exist in the United States? If it has not, then nothing has been accomplished by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. In my judgment, Congress has this authority. It is difficult, perhaps, to define accurately what slavery is and what liberty is. Liberty and slavery are opposite terms; one is opposed to the other. We know that in a civil government, in organized society, no such thing can exist as natural or absolute liberty.

Civil liberty, or the liberty which a person enjoys in society, is thus defined by Blackstone:

"Civil liberty is no other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws, and no further, as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public."

That is the liberty to which every citizen is entitled; that is the liberty which was intended to be secured by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States originally, and more especially by the amendment which has recently been adopted; and in a note to Blackstone's Commentaries it is stated that—

"In this definition of civil liberty it ought to be understood, or rather expressed, that the restraints introduced by the law should be equal to all or as much so as the nature of things will admit."

Then, sir, I take it that any statute which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited. We may, perhaps, arrive at a more correct definition of the term "citizen of the United States" by referring to that clause of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." What rights are secured to the citizens of each State under that provision? Such fundamental rights as belong to every free person.

Here the speaker referred, in support of his contention, to Joseph Story's "Commentaries on the Constitution" and the decisions of the General Court of Maryland in the case of Campbell vs. Morris (3 Harris and McHenry, 535), of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts (Abbott vs. Bayley, 6 Pickering 92), and of the case of Corfield vs. Coryell (4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 380).

The judge in the latter case, he said, went so far as to declare that a person who is a citizen in one State, if he goes to another, is entitled there to the elective franchise.

In my judgment, persons of African descent, born in the United States, are as much citizens as white persons who are born in the country, but it is competent for Congress to declare who are citizens.

Peter G. Van Winkle [W. Va.].—Where is the authority by law of Congress to make them citizens?

Senator Trumbull.—The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the right to provide uniform rules of naturalization.

Senator Van Winkle.—For the admission of foreigners.

Senator Trumbull.—Nothing is said about foreigners. More than once that Congress by general act has naturalized a whole people. There was an act of that kind in reference to the Stockbridge Indians, an act of that character making citizens of the United States of the people of Texas and the people of Florida.

Willard Saulsbury [Del.] considered the bill as one of the most dangerous ever introduced in Congress. If slavery could not be abolished without a constitutional amendment, how could anything less than another such amendment affect civil rights, over which the States had just as exclusive control as they had over slavery until the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment? The bill did not fall under the provisions of that amendment, since it referred to persons (free negroes) who were not affected by it. The bill, therefore, was wholly unconstitutional. The Republicans seemed to assume that any legislation was constitutional which would help the former slave.

I think the time for shedding tears over the poor slave has well-nigh passed in this country. The tears which the honest white people of this country have been made to shed from the oppressive acts of this Government in its various departments during the last four years call more loudly for my sympathies than those tears which have been shedding and dropping and dropping for the last twenty years in reference to the poor, oppressed slave—dropping from the eyes of strong-minded women and weak-minded men, until, becoming a mighty flood, they have swept away, in their resistless force, every trace of constitutional liberty in this country.

Senator Saulsbury denied the assertion of Senator Trumbull that the bill would have no political effect.

What are civil rights? What are the rights which you, I, or any citizen of this country enjoys? What is the basis, the foundation of them all? They are divisible into but two classes; one, those rights which we derive from nature, and the other those rights which we derive from government.

Here you use a generic term which in its most comprehensive signification includes every species of right that man can enjoy other than those the foundation of which rests exclusively in nature and in the law of nature.

The right to vote is not a natural right; I do not possess it by nature, I only possess it by virtue of law. It pertains to me as a citizen of my State; and pertaining to me as a citizen of my State, it is a civil right, and is a right of no other class or character.

But the bill also provides that the persons affected shall have "full and equal benefit of all laws and procedings for the security of person and property."

What is property? It has been judicially decided that the elective franchise is property. Leaving out the question of voting, however, as a question of property, is it not true that under our republican form and system of government the ballot is one of the modes of securing property, one of the means by which property is secured? Your bill gives to these persons every security for the protection of person and property which a white man has. One of the authorities which the Senator read decides that the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which says that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," entitles a citizen of one State removing into another to a right to vote after acquiring a legal residence in such State. Was it for this reason and to secure this right to negroes that the Senator amended his bill this morning by declaring that all persons of African descent born in the United States shall be citizens of the United States?

Mr. President, this bill not only proposes to assume control over the laws which shall govern title to estates, but also to determine the persons who shall be entitled to enjoy estates and property within the States, and if you can do this as to a portion of that property, any particular species of it, you can do so as to the whole; if you can regulate and govern in one particular, you can govern in reference to all the property and all the interests of the States. If you can determine who shall hold property in a State then you can enact laws for the protection of the owner in its possession. Then also you can determine who shall not hold property within a State. If you can say who shall sue or give evidence in the courts of a State, then you can determine who shall not sue or give evidence in such courts. Such an assumption of power on the part of Congress ought to arouse the people of the whole country to a sense of impending danger. Let them take warning in time. But, sir, this bill positively deprives the State of its police power of government. In my State for many years, and I presume there are similar laws in most of the Southern States, there has existed a law of the State based upon and founded in its police power, which declares that free negroes shall not have the possession of firearms or ammunition. This bill proposes to take away from the States this police power, so that if in any State of this Union at any time hereafter there shall be such a numerous body of dangerous persons belonging to any distinct race as to endanger the peace of the State, and to cause the lives of its citizens to be subject to their violence, the State shall not have the power to disarm them without disarming the whole population. Is this within your constitutional power and authority? Where did you get it? Are the utterances which come to us from the highest judicial tribunal, which sits but a few feet off, of no account here? Are the declarations of those who assisted in framing this Constitution to be of no avail here? I suppose not, for I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that this measure, as one of a series of measures, is to be passed through this Congress regardless of all consequences. But the day that the President of the United States places his approval and signature to that Freedmen's Bureau bill and to this bill, he will have signed two acts more dangerous to the liberty of his countrymen, more disastrous to the citizens of this country, than all acts which have been passed from the foundation of the Government to this present hour; and, if we upon this side of the chamber manifest anxiety and interest in reference to these bills and the questions involved in them, it is because having known this population all our lives, knowing them in one hour of our infancy better than you gentlemen have known them all your lives, we feel compelled by a sense of duty, earnestly and importunately it may be, to appeal to the judgment of the American Senate, and to reach, if possible, the judgment of the great mass of the American people, and invoke their attention to the awful consequences involved in measures of this character. Sir, stop, stop; the mangled, bleeding body of the Constitution of your country lies in your path; you are treading upon its bleeding body when you pass these laws.

But, sir, let me call your attention for a moment to what are the powers of the States under the Federal Constitution, and what it is they do not and never did intend to surrender to the Federal Government.

"The Federalist" speaking on this subject says:

> "The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

I cite that to show that in the judgment of the men who made the Constitution all these powers embraced in your bill are reserved to the States and to the States exclusively, because certainly they concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203, the court say, speaking of the police powers of a State:

> "They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the general Government, all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State."

The speaker also declared the judicial powers conferred on the Federal Government by the bill to exceed those granted in the Constitution, which extended only

> "to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority."

Suppose that an action of ejectment is instituted in any State where free negroes are denied the right to testify, and suppose that action of ejectment is against a free negro. He wishes to prove that he has not been guilty of the trespass in ejectment, and he proposes to prove it by a negro, and the court say, "No; under the law of this State that negro is not a competent witness." In such a case as that, this bill authorizes the circuit or district court of the United States to take cognizance of that action of ejectment, and the State courts are excluded from its consideration. I ask, did that cause of action, the right of A, a citizen of the State of Maryland, to sue another person in an action of ejectment, arise under the Constitution of the United States? Did it arise under any law of Congress? Did it arise under any treaty? Certainly not. Yet you propose to take a case arising under one of these from the control of the State courts and give it to the district court of the United States. On what ground? Simply because the judge, in saying what evidence should go before the jury, says that the negro cannot testify.

Sir, there cannot be a case of chicken stealing in any State of this Union where freed negroes are not allowed to testify that can, if this bill is to be operative and in force, be determined in the State courts. All such cases will be subject to be removed into the Federal courts.

If such consequences as these are to result from such enactments as this—and I honestly believe they are, if it is to be operative—what becomes of the States of this Union? What becomes of the powers of the States? What becomes of the rights of the States? Sir, they have not even the privilege of administering their criminal laws; they have not the privilege of saying who shall give evidence and who shall not in their own courts; they have not the privilege of saying who shall hold property and who shall not; they have not the power to protect their own citizens against murder, rape, arson, any crime that can be committed against them.

A Federal court hearing and determining a case of ejectment between persons of the same State, brought to recover possession of land in the State in which both parties reside and awarding a writ of possession! A Federal court hearing and determining a case of larceny, the larceny being committed by a free negro, and administering the criminal law of the State! Surely

> "Judgment has fled to brutish beasts
> And men have lost their reason."

How you gentlemen will like the infliction of this punishment when you come to my State, and one of these pet lambs with a black skin shall be indicted for larceny, and you deprive the State of the jurisdiction of trying it, and it is removed to the circuit court of the United States or the district court of the United States; how your Federal judge, if he be of the same opinions with you, will like to carry that law into execution! Do you know what our law does with them? It provides for whipping his bare back. We have a whipping post in our State, and I think it is the most efficient means I ever knew for the prevention of thieving. How the humane feelings of all New England would be shocked!

The sixth section provides very heavy penalties against any marshal or officer who shall disobey or refuse to perform any of the duties imposed by this act; and what is the power that it gives to these marshals? They may call in the posse comitatus or the bystanders, and they are all to be punished if they refuse to aid in making arrests. What did the honorable Senator say, and what did other honorable Senators say, when the Fugitive Slave Law gave the power to the marshals to summon persons to make an arrest? They were horrified. What was their language? "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" Verily, not only the negro is as good in law as the white man in your opinion of him, but he is much more favored and better protected.

The bill gives the power to commissioners of deputizing in writing whomsoever they please to make these arrests. And what does it do besides? It gives that fellow so deputized five dollars for doing his dirty work. What will be the consequence? Arrests of innocent parties to pocket the fee. And when they come to sue for assault and false imprisonment you will not let the State hear the cause, but you remove it far from our residences and our homes into the district or circuit court of the United States!

But this is not all. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is still fearful that his free American fellow citizens of African descent may suffer some deprivation of right or infliction of wrong that may not be summarily and adequately redressed. He is fearfully apprehensive that there is some white man that ought to be arrested who may escape, and hence he provides in his bill that the President shall be authorized to employ the land and naval forces the more efficiently to execute its provisions. Poor fugitive white man. If you shall escape the pursuing and avenging army commanded by the lieutenant-general of the armies of the United States and attempt to cross the briny deep, the navy, the entire navy, shall chase you from the sea. Sir, your whole army and navy will be inadequate to execute this unconstitutional law, if law this bill shall become.

Senator Van Winkle thought that the scope of the bill was wider than its framers realized.

It involves not only the negro race, but other inferior races that are now settling on our Pacific coast, and perhaps involves a future immigration to this country of which we have no conception, for a bill has been introduced at the other end of the Capitol to strike out the word "white" from the naturalization laws, so that we may expect to have an influx here of all sorts of people from all countries. I need not pause to say that this would be detrimental to the best interests of our country. I am willing to receive among us, and always have been, those from other countries who are calculated to make good citizens. I am not and never have been willing to receive, if the discrimination could be made, those whose mixture with our race, whether they are white or black, could only tend to the deterioration of the mass; and I avow myself now as opposed to the amendment which is now before the Senate.

I believe there are certain fundamental and eternal principles that lie at the foundation of society; and, if you make these people citizens of the United States, I should feel that they were entitled to the right of suffrage, and to granting them this I am opposed.

I entertain what perhaps may be deemed peculiar ideas in reference to the condition of society. I do not believe one word of what the chairman of the Judiciary Committee read from Blackstone yesterday. I think it is mere twaddle. I cannot conceive of a state of nature such as is spoken of there. I know not of people entering into society. It is never done and never has been done. What I do think is this: I believe the constitution of society was given to man by the Creator at the time it was instituted, and that whatever conditions were imposed at that time are those to which men should endeavor to live up.

We hear a great deal about the sentence from the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal." I am willing to admit that all men are created equal, but how are they equal? Can a citizen of France, for instance, by coming into this country acquire all the rights of an American, unless he is naturalized? I believe that the division of men into separate communities and their living in society and association with their fellows, as they do, are both divine institutions, and that, consequently, the authors of the Declaration of Independence could have meant nothing more than that the rights of citizens of any community are equal to the rights of all other citizens of that community. Whenever all communities are conducted in accordance with these principles, these very conditions of their prosperous existence, then all mankind will be equal, each enjoying his equality in his own community, and not till then. Therefore, I assert that there is no right that could be exercised by any community of society more perfect than that of excluding from citizenship or membership those who were objectionable. I do not believe that a superior race is bound to receive among it those of an inferior race if the mingling of them can only tend to the detriment of the mass.

The mode in which it is proposed to effect the object of the bill is neither constitutional nor legal. I was mistaken yesterday in saying that the language of the Constitution expressly applied to the naturalization of foreigners; but I was not wrong in the conclusion that that clause was intended to apply to foreigners only. I would remind the chairman of the committee that the case he cited of the Stockbridge Indians was also the naturalization of foreigners; for we hold the Indian tribes to be quasi-foreign nations; we, at least, make treaties with them, which are confirmed by this body. The laws of naturalization as they stand require a notice to be given and a renunciation of the allegiance to all foreign powers, and require that notice to be given two years before the application is made; but there is no provision of that sort in this proposition. Yet the Constitution requires that the laws of naturalization be uniform.

I should be very willing to have the question submitted in some form to the people of the United States, whether they desire to admit to citizenship this class of persons; and I do not confine it to the African race alone, but I include the races on the Pacific coast that I have already mentioned, and others to whom it is proposed to open the doors. I would like to see it tested by a fair vote of the people of the United States whether they are willing that these piebald races from every quarter shall come in and be citizens with them in this country, and enjoy the privileges which they are now enjoying as such citizens.

I refused to join the American party at the time of its first formation because I thought it discriminated between naturalized citizens and native citizens. However much I might disapprove of the naturalization law previously to that time, I felt that, while these people were admitted under the law, they were entitled to all the rights and privileges and the same treatment as other citizens; and if these dusky people shall also be admitted to the rights of citizenship in such a way as I believe contains a fair expression of the people, and is according to the Constitution, I pledge myself to treat them in the same way that I was disposed to treat our naturalized citizens.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—No action having been taken upon that amendment, I desire to withdraw it and to offer another in lieu of it to the same purport, changing the phraseology. I move to insert these words:

All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color.

SENATOR JAMES GUTHRIE [Ky.].—I will ask the Senator if he intends by that amendment to naturalize all the Indians of the United States?

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Our dealings with the Indians not taxed are with them as foreigners, as separate nations. I think that it would be desirable that the bill should apply to the Indians who are domesticated and pay taxes and live in civilized society.

EDGAR COWAN [Pa.].—I will ask whether it will not have the effect of naturalizing the children of Chinese and gypsies born in this country?

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Undoubtedly.

SENATOR COWAN.—Then I think it would be proper to hear the Senators from California on that question, because that population is now becoming very heavy upon the Pacific coast; and when we consider that it is in proximity to an empire containing four hundred million people, very much given to emigrating, very rapacious in their character, and very astute in their dealings, if they are to be made citizens and to enjoy political power in California, then, sir, the day may not be very far distant when California, instead of belonging to the Indo-European race, may belong to the Mongolian, may belong to the Chinese; because it certainly would not be difficult for that empire, with her resources, and with the means she has, to throw a population upon California and the mining districts of that country that would overwhelm our race and wrest from them the dominion of that country.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—I should like to inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania if the children of Chinese now born in this country are not citizens?

SENATOR COWAN.—I think not.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—I understand that under the naturalization laws the children who are born here of parents who have not been naturalized are citizens. Is not the child born in this country of German parents a citizen?

SENATOR COWAN.—The honorable Senator assumes that which is not the fact. The children of German parents are citizens; but Germans are not Chinese.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—The law makes no such distinction; and the child of an Asiatic is just as much a citizen as the child of a European.

JAMES H. LANE [Kan.].—Most of the Indians of our State have taken an allotment of lands, and our Supreme Court have decided that, by the act of accepting the allotments, they have separated themselves from their tribal relations; yet we do not extend to them the right of citizenship.

SENATOR COWAN.—Mr. President, I am asked, with quite an air of certainty on the part of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whether the children of persons of barbarian races, born in this country, are not from that very fact citizens of this country. I am not prepared upon the moment to furnish authorities upon this point; but I am certainly very clear that in Pennsylvania that is not the law, and never has been the law; and to assert that it is the law, in my judgment, is to betray an utter want of comprehension, an utter inappreciation of the fundamental principles which underlie the whole of our system. Who was it that established this Government? They were people who brought here the charter of their liberties with them; they were the freemen who emigrated to this country and established these governments, and they established them under charters legally granted them by the Crown of Great Britain originally. By the terms of the charters they were the actual possessors of the political power of the colonies, and they alone had the right to say whom they would admit to a coënjoyment of that power with them. It is true that the colonists of this country, when they came here and established their governments, did open the door of these privileges wide to men of their own race from Europe. They opened it to the Irishman, they opened it to the German, they opened it to the Scandinavian races of the North. But where did they open it to the barbarian races of Asia or of Africa? Nowhere. There may be no positive prohibition; but the courts always administered the law upon the basis that it was only the freemen who established this Government and those whom the freemen admitted with them to an enjoyment of political power that were entitled to it.

The identical question came up in my State—the question whether the negro was a citizen, and whether he possessed political power in that State—and it was there decided that he was not one of the original corporators, that he was not one of the freemen who originally possessed political power, and that they had never, by any enactment or by any act of theirs, admitted him into a participation of that power, except so far as to tax him for the support of Government. And, Mr. President, I think it a most important question, and particularly a most important question for the Pacific coast, and those States which lie upon it, as to whether this door shall now be thrown open to the Asiatic population. If it be, there is an end to republican government there, because it is very well ascertained that those people have no appreciation of that form of government; it seems to be obnoxious to their very nature; they seem to be incapable either of understanding it or of carrying it out; and I cannot consent to say that California, or Oregon, or Colorado, or Nevada, or any of those States shall be given over to an irruption of Chinese. I, for my part, protest against it.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Does the Senator deny that the Federal Government has authority to naturalize any person; that it may provide by uniform laws of naturalization to naturalize any foreigner?

SENATOR COWAN.—Yes. But I would ask the honorable Senator whether there is not every distinction in the world between the right of a man after naturalization and before. These statutes do not provide that a naturalized citizen shall not have all the rights of every other citizen, but provide what his rights shall be before naturalization, so that the power which the United States originally had has nothing to do with the question.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—I was looking at it as a question of power. Whether it would be politic to do it is another question.

SENATOR COWAN.—Mr. President, that is neither here nor there; this is not an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; this is an attempt to do without any power that which it might be very questionable whether we ought to do even if we had the power.

I may state that I have another objection to this bill at the present time; and that is that the people of several States in the Union are not represented here, and yet this law is mainly to operate upon those people. I think it would be at least decent, respectful, if we desire to maintain and support this Government on the broad foundation upon which it was laid, namely, the consent of the governed, that we should wait, at any rate, until the people upon whom it is to operate have a voice in these halls.

I know it is said that those people are not in condition to be allowed representation here. Mr. President, he who says the people are not in condition asserts that this Government is a failure. It rests entirely upon the people, and if the people cannot be intrusted anywhere and everywhere throughout it, then it is not the Government we supposed it was, and not the Government it was intended to be. I admit that the American people, like other peoples, are subject to periodical disturbances. They may be led away by the arts of the demagogues, they may be forced away by the power of de facto governments asserted over them; but if they are the punishment they receive is war. When the question is put, it is put to the arbitrament of the sword. That enters judgment and issues execution at the same stroke; and when the war is over the people are purged. When the war is over it is too late to say that the people are guilty. They have suffered the penalty of their folly, or their crime, or what you may be pleased to call it, and it is time then to talk about individuals, not people.

During the rebellion, it was questioned whether after the war was over and after we had suppressed the rebellion the people would come back again to their allegiance and be part and parcel of the Union as before. Have they not done it? The result is a thing of which every American who loves his country and who prides himself in this great Republic should be proud of. If the Southern people, after their armies were beaten, after they had lost everything in this game of war, had refused to organize republican governments in unison with the Constitution and the laws, if they had still stubbornly refused to submit, if they had refused to send Representatives to Congress and Senators here, then you might have said that the people were in default and that the people had failed; but in my judgment those people have not failed; they have done, so far as I can observe, everything that the most hopeful or sanguine man could have expected them to do. I am afraid that we confound with the people of the South another and entirely different class. Unquestionably there are individual traitors there, and I would a great deal rather see them indicted and punished than hear so much about the "people."

Who are rebels and traitors? Who are guilty men according to the theory of our law? The presumption is that all men are innocent until they are shown to be guilty. Every line of our law is blazing with the light of that humane sentiment. The words "traitor" and "rebel" are exceedingly glib upon the tongues of certain gentlemen. A few minutes ago, it was alleged here that every man who cannot take the present test oath must necessarily be a rebel or a traitor. Mr. President, if that delusion is persisted in, if that belief is to govern in the councils of this Government, there is an end of the Republic. It is not true in fact, and it is not true in law.

Do gentlemen pretend that single men, without an organization, without any governmental means, without any of the insignia of power, can stand up and resist the government of a State with all these means in its hands of enforcing its power? Surely not; and there was no other power in this Government except the United States to which the loyal men in the South could look, and the United States went out of possession and left those people to the mercy of secession.

Mr. President, for two hundred years at least the doctrine has been established, and established beyond question, that protection and allegiance are reciprocal. I owe allegiance to this Government, and it owes to me protection. If it refuses to protect me, I am not to be punished because I do not yield it allegiance. Let me suppose a delegation of Georgians, of Alabamians, or Mississippians, if you please, Union men, coming here to this capital in the winter of 1860-61, and calling upon Congress, and saying, "South Carolina has actually seceded; other States are about doing the same thing; you should appropriate money and provide means, you should authorize the President to put down that attempted rebellion." What did Congress say? Read the record. They would not trust the President. Then the delegation go to President Buchanan, and what does he say? "I cannot coerce a State; I might suppress an insurrection, but I have no means; I have no authority to call out the militia."

What were these people to do? Just exactly what they did do. They went back and told their people. "There is no help from the United States; they are out of possession; the President is recalcitrant, and Congress is wrangling and refusing to trust him; we cannot have help; we must submit."

I refer to a chapter in Mr. Greeley's book, "The American Conflict," as proof that there were more than one-half of the men of the South who were opposed to secession. What I object to is that half should now be branded as criminals when the only thing criminal they did was to get into difficulty and into war, desolation, and destruction, because we, the Government of the United States, did not do our duty in their behalf.

Now, I come to the law: if the general Government allows itself to be put out of possession, so that it cannot protect a citizen, and a de facto government is over him, whatever he does in obedience to that de facto government, and under its authority, is not treason.

A word as to the proper mode of treating these people. I asked a Southern gentleman the other day, "Suppose we get into difficulty with England or France, which side would they take?" "Why," said he, "nine out of every ten of them will stand by the flag." Now, Mr. President, that is either true or it is not true. If it is true that nine men out of every ten will stand by the flag, then I say to assail them as rebels and traitors, and to treat them as criminals, and to try to deprive them of the rights they ought to have as inhabitants of free States, as we are, is a gross outrage and one which will recoil upon our heads. If they are not; if they are in the condition which some gentlemen like to represent them as occupying, then, sir, I want to know whether you will bring them to reason, whether you will bring them back to that affection which they ought to have for this Government and its flag by such bills as this, which invade rights that they of all other people have been taught to consider as peculiarly belonging to the States and not within the province of the Government to invade. Can you bring them back by making laws which operate upon them when they are not here? Can you bring them back by giving them the same cause to rebel against you which Great Britain gave to your ancestors? Can you bring them back here by legislating for them and yet refusing them the right of representation? Can you bring them back by amending the Constitution time and again over their heads when you refuse to listen to their arguments here in the common councils of the country?

Mr. President, I know apprehensions are expressed. Apprehensions of what? What can the people of those States do if we treat them fairly and give them all their rights under the laws? What is the worst they can do? Can they rebel again? If they are going to rebel again, you are putting them now exactly in such a condition that they will before the world have good cause. You are putting them precisely in that situation when they can appeal to your enemies for assistance, and when they will get it. When they ask England to protect them the next time, and then when they seek an alliance with France the next time, they will succeed. England will not pay fifty millions more to keep her Lancashire poor from starving when she can control the cotton fields of the Southern portion of these United States. France will not much longer be bullied about the Monroe Doctrine, when she, by joining with the South, may help to tear this Republic in two and shear it of its greatness.

Then, I say, if the people would stand by the flag, give them their rights; and, I say, if they will not stand by it, let us give them their rights and let them do their worst, because they will do it anyway. It is far safer to treat them according to the laws that exist and do now exist without new ones to operate upon them, made while they are not here, far safer than the course we are pursuing. Are there no courts, are there no juries, is there no machinery in the land by which individuals can be punished, and only machinery by which the innocent, the people, can be tortured and worried, and perhaps driven into another rebellion?

Mr. President, I hope we shall take better counsel. I think it cannot be disguised that just at this moment there is a growing apprehension in the country that something is not right. The soldier is beginning to ask why the country is not restored. He says, "I fought the battles of the country long days and dreary nights through a terrible war for the Union for the purpose of saving the Republic one and indivisible. Why is it not restored?'' Is there any resistance to this Government, any refusal on the part of the people to put all the machinery in motion? I tell you, Mr. President, when he asks this Congress why it is that all the bands are not tied, and all the means of cementing it are not made use of, there will be a terrible answer from him if he finds that we by our factious course prevent this restoration.

What is it that binds now, I ask, the eleven States lately in rebellion to this Union but the President? He is the only piece of property they have in common with us. He stands like a Colossus across this chasm which it is our business to fill up and close forever. The bondholder, the man who loaned us the money to carry on this war, the man who came up with Fortunatus' purse, almost without stint, to furnish the sinews of it, will begin to ask, why is the Union not restored; where is the obstacle, and what is the obstacle? Will it do to tell him that the hearts of that people are not right? He will tell you that you had better leave that to the means of Christian grace; it will be enough for him if they obey the laws, if they are willing to submit themselves to the laws as other good citizens do. It will not do to assert to him that they are not to be trusted as the people, because he will tell you it was as the people and upon the faith that they as the people would restore the Government that he gave his money. It will not do either to tell him and the soldier, too, that we are going to hold these people as conquered provinces. The soldier will tell you that that will do him no good; he did not fight for conquered provinces; he did not fight to make his fellowmen vassals and serfs; he fought to bring them back to brotherhood and freedom. He wanted to make them to strengthen him and to aid him rather than to be his enemies hereafter.

Jacob M. Howard [Mich.] insisted that the Civil Rights bill was a necessary and constitutional corollary of the Thirteenth Amendment. Without it the freedman would possess nothing but his ''naked person,'' and even the liberty of this might be coerced by hunger on the one hand and legislative limitation, both as to kind of employment and wages, on the other.

There is no invasion of the legitimate rights of the States. The bill contemplates nothing of the kind; but it simply gives to persons who are of different races or colors the same civil rights. I sincerely trust that this nation, having by an expenditure of blood and treasure unexampled in the history of the human race, set the slaves in the United States forever free, having employed this class of persons to the number of nearly two hundred thousand in the prosecution of our just and righteous war, will not now be found so recreant to duty, so wanting in simple justice, as to turn our backs upon the race and say to them, ''We set you free, but beyond this we give you no protection; we allow you again to be reduced to slavery by your old masters, because it is the right of the State which has enslaved you for two hundred years thus to do.'' Sir, let me tell you and the Senators who have advocated the opposite side of this question that, if we fail in this high duty, if we fail to redeem this solemn pledge which we have given to the slave, to the world, and in the presence of Almighty God, the time is not far distant when we shall reap the fruits of our treachery and imbecility in woes which we have not yet witnessed, in terrors of which even the Civil War that has just passed has furnished no example.

Reverdy Johnson [Md.] thought that the purpose of the bill could be attained legally only by a constitutional amendment, since the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case had held that negroes were not citizens under the Constitution, although it did not so discriminate against any other race. The bill, therefore, was in derogation of State powers which were perfectly constitutional, such as the discrimination in civic rights between aliens and citizens, the police power, marriage laws, etc.

He asserted that Indians were citizens of the United States; therefore, he said, they would come under the provisions of the act.

The Indian tribes upon that portion of the American continent that belonged to Great Britain were always subject to the dominion of England. England could have done what she thought proper to do with them, but all she did in the execution of that, her sovereign right, was to prohibit them from entering into any contracts in relation to their lands with any other nation than England or the dependencies of England. When we obtained our independence the whole authority that England had over the tribes became vested in the United States; and since then the uniform view that has been taken of the relation in which these Indians stand to the United States is that they are but the wards of the United States. They have no sovereign power whatever; they are not a nation in the general acceptation of that term; they cannot sell their lands without the authority of the United States; they are not at liberty to sell their lands to anybody but to citizens of the United States, and under such regulations as the United States may impose.

If the honorable member will refresh his memory by consulting the case of Worcester vs. The State of Georgia, reported in 6 Peters, I think he will find that Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, who gave the opinion of the court, deciding that the legislation of Georgia or the acts of Georgia were unconstitutional, admits that the Government of the United States could do with the Indians, as far as the question of power was concerned, just what it thought proper; that the absolute dominion was in the United States; the possessory title, with a quasi-dominion, was with the Indians, but that quasi-dominion was only that they could sell their lands and were not subject to be taxed by the United States, but only because the United States themselves had agreed that they should have those rights; but it was not pretended in that case that they were not citizens of the United States. The result, therefore, would be that an Indian child, born within the territorial limits of these tribes, would be a citizen of the United States because the territory is part of the United States. Nobody ever doubted that the whole of the Indians who are subject to our control are now located upon territory belonging to the United States, and the result would necessarily follow, so far as citizenship depends upon birth, that, if you make it depend upon birth, the child who is born within the territorial limits of the United States, whether that portion be or be not within the temporary or partial control of the Indians, would be a citizen of the United States.

CHARLES SUMNER [Mass.].—Allow me to ask the Senator whether we do not always deal with the Indians through the treaty-making power?

SENATOR JOHNSON.—We have done so, but not necessarily.

SENATOR SUMNER.—Is it not the habit?

SENATOR JOHNSON.—Certainly it is; but I am dealing with it now as a question of power. We have dealt with them as a treaty-making power, but it is not because there ever was a doubt that Congress could deal with them by legislation; and, in point of fact, although we have dealt with them as a treaty-making power, we have done so by making them make the treaty. It is no treaty-making power in the ordinary acceptation of the term; that is to say, the parties are not equal.

SENATOR SUMNER.—With the Senator's permission, I will remind him that we act upon our treaties with the Indians in this Chamber with precisely the same forms than we do upon our treaties with the European powers, and they must be ratified by a vote of two-thirds of this body.

SENATOR JOHNSON.—I understand that; but what I mean to say is, and I do not think the honorable member will contradict me, that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States defining the treaty-making power, or in any other branch of it, which says that Congress cannot legislate in regard to them.

On June 31 Thomas A. Hendricks [Ind.] opposed the bill. He said that the inclusion of Indians who were taxed, and the exclusion of those who were not, was an invidious distinction. He did not want to see property introduced into the law as a requisite for citizenship.

Senator Trumbull replied that the Constitution had already drawn the line in its provision for apportioning representation in Congress and direct taxes.

Garrett Davis [Ky.] opposed the bill. It and the Freedmen's Bureau bill were, like the Siamese twins, connected with the same umbilical cord, the recognition of negroes as citizens, which, if severed, would cause their dissolution. This cord he proposed to cut. Repeating many previous arguments against this vital principle he introduced a new one. If emancipation gave citizenship, then the slaves emancipated by the Northern States after the Revolution were citizens. Were they or their posterity so recognized? No. Would the Southern States have agreed to the Constitution if they thought that under it negroes would be recognized as citizens? No. If negroes are now citizens, why pass a law declaring them such?

Senator Trumbull denied the facts as stated by Senator Davis and quoted to the contrary the fourth article of the Confederation and its ratification by all the Southern States but two. Indeed, North Carolina at one time permitted free negroes who were taxpayers to vote.

The Senator from Kentucky says, if they are already citizens by the Constitution, why do you declare it in a law? We often pass laws to remove doubts, and I should like to remove the doubt even from the mind of the Senator from Kentucky, if that were possible.

Senator Davis replied:

The mere right to vote does not amount to citizenship. Citizenship, under the Constitution, is something different from what it was before the Constitution was formed. Before the Constitution was formed every State made its own citizens; every State coined its own money. Since the formation of the Constitution there is but one power to coin money, there is but one power to make citizens, and that is the Government of the United States. The State of Illinois admitted unnaturalized foreigners who had been resident in that State six months to vote. Did the fact that Illinois permitted an unnaturalized foreigner who had been resident there six months to take part in her government make him a citizen of the United States? Not at all.

My position is that this is a white man's Government. It was made so at the beginning. The charters that were granted by the different sovereigns of England to the various colonies were granted to white men and included nobody but white men. They did not include Indians. They did not include negroes. When the troubles with the mother country commenced in 1764, and culminated in revolution and a declaration of independence in 1776, all of that protracted and important transaction was by white men, and by white men alone. The negro had nothing to do with it, no more than the Indian; he was no party to it. It was not for his grievances that that struggle was made; it was not to reform his wrongs that that bloody war was waged; it was not to establish a government in which he was to be a party or a power that the Declaration of Independence was enunciated to the world and the old Articles of Confederation formed; it was not to make him a party to our present Government that the Constitution was formed. He was no party in the convention; he was not represented in the convention which framed the present Constitution. It is a white man's government. I say that the negro is not a citizen. He may be made a citizen by power, but it will be in disregard of principle.

Daniel Clark [N. H.] took issue with Senator Davis.

Before the Constitution was adopted the free black man in my State was just as much a citizen as the white man; and when delegates were chosen to the convention which adopted the Constitution he had a right to vote, and undoubtedly did vote, as well as the white man.[1] They formed that Constitution. In that Constitution there is nothing declaring that a negro shall be a citizen of the United States, and there is nothing declaring that a white man shall be. They stand on the same foundation. There is nothing declaring that the black man shall not be a citizen, nothing declaring any distinction between him and a white man.

And I may say, by the way, that slavery was never recognized by law in New Hampshire.

Senator Davis.—Have slaves not been bought and sold there?

Senator Clark.—Yes; in one instance, at least, that I know of; but I have looked and can find no law that ever recognized a slave, nor any that set one free.

Senator Davis.—There is no law in Kentucky declaring horses property, yet they are so recognized. How did you people sell negroes?

Senator Clark.—Very much as a man steals a horse.

Senator Davis.—Your people stole a negro and sold him?

Senator Clark.—I believe my people are like other people, and, if they did steal and sell a negro, they did a great wrong to the negro. No matter where slavery exists, be it in New Hampshire or Kentucky, it is a violence and a wrong. [Applause in the galleries.] I want to find why a negro is not a citizen, if the gentleman will tell me. If he will lay down his definition, I want to see whether the negro did not comply with it and conform to it so as to be a citizen.

Senator Davis.—Government is a political partnership. No persons but the partners who formed the partnership are parties to the government. Here is a government formed by the white man alone. The negro was excluded from the formation of our political co-partnership; he had nothing to do with it; he had nothing to do in its formation.

William M. Stewart [Nev.].—Allow me to ask a question. Is it a close corporation, so that new partners cannot be added?

Senator Davis.—Yes, sir; it is a close white corporation. You may bring all of Europe, but none of Asia and none of Africa, into our partnership.

Senator Clark.—Let us see, Mr. President, how that may be. Take the gentleman's own ground that government is a partnership, and those who did not enter into it and take an active part in it cannot be citizens. Is a woman a citizen under our Constitution?

[1] As a matter of fact they did so vote not only in New Hampshire but in other States.

Senator Davis.—Not to vote.

Senator Clark.—I did not ask about voting. The gentleman said a while ago that voting did not constitute citizenship. I want to know if she is a citizen. Can she not sue and be sued, contract and exercise the rights of a citizen?

Senator Davis.—So can a free negro.

Senator Clark.—Then if a free negro can do all that, why is he not a citizen except that the Dred Scott decision says that——

Senator Davis.—Because he is no part of the governing power.

Senator Clark.—I deny that, because in some of the States he is a part of the governing power. The Senator only begs the question; it only comes back to this, that a nigger is a nigger. [Laughter.]

Senator Davis.—That is the whole of it. [Laughter.]

Senator Clark.—That is the whole of the gentleman's logic. [Laughter.]

Senator Johnson.—Mr. President, but for the decision in the Dred Scott case, to which allusion has been made, perhaps the question would be free from all difficulty; but, as the Senate are already informed, the decision in that case was that, because of the particular condition of the African, neither he nor any of his descendants were citizens. The Senate will find, by referring to that decision, that the court put it entirely upon the ground that the Africans were imported into the United States as slaves, and bought and sold as property, and, according to the view that the court took, all their descendants partook of that condition; that is to say, they inherited the disqualification of the ancestor. The sins of the ancestor, if they could be called sins, were visited upon the children. They applied that principle by saying that the disqualification of the ancestor because of his condition was to be visited upon the children. It is very obvious, upon the reading of that opinion, that the court would have come to a different conclusion, provided the Africans had immigrated to the United States as immigrants, instead of coming here as property. If they had come as men and had not been brought in as chattels, then they would have been citizens of the United States. It is also evident that, if the Supreme Court had taken the view taken by the honorable member who has just addressed the Senate [Mr. Clark], that there were in the States Africans or descendants of Africans at the time of the adoption of the Constitution who were citizens of the States in which they might be, they would have been citizens of the United States. That is obvious, as I think, from a paragraph in the opinion to which I invite the attention of the Senate, which will be found in 19 Howard, page 406.

The court say

"It is true that every person——"

Without reference to color, black or white——

"It is true that every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States became also citizens of this new political body, but none other; it was formed by them, and for them and their posterity, but for no one else."

The error, therefore, that the court have committed, if they have committed an error at all, a question that I do not propose now to discuss, is not in the principle maintained by the honorable member from New Hampshire, but in the historical fact—were or were not negroes in the States of the United States citizens of such States, all or any one, at the time the Constitution was adopted?

But the Supreme Court have decided that negroes are not citizens, and the decision stands before us. Whether it will be recognized hereafter when the question arises in that tribunal at any subsequent time is a matter that I do not propose now to inquire into: there it is, and we have a right to suppose that it may control subsequent decisions; and, if it does control subsequent decisions, the result will be that this law will not be operative.

But does it follow that these negroes cannot be made citizens? That would be an extraordinary condition for the country to be in. Here are four million negroes. They are not foreigners, because they were born in the United States. They have no foreign allegiance to renounce, because they owed no foreign allegiance. Their allegiance, whatever it was, was an allegiance to the Government of the United States alone. They cannot come, therefore, under the naturalizing clause; they cannot come, of course, under the statutes passed in pursuance of the power conferred upon Congress by that clause; but does it follow from that that you cannot make them citizens; that the Congress of the United States, vested with the whole legislative power belonging to the Government, having within the limits of the United States four million people anxious to become citizens, and when you are anxious to make them citizens, have no power to make them citizens? It seems to me that to state the question is to answer it.

SENATOR DAVIS.—Has the Government of the United States any power that is not conferred upon it by the Constitution?

SENATOR JOHNSON.—Certainly not.

SENATOR DAVIS.—Where is the power in the Constitution, or the provision in the Constitution, that gives the right to the Government of the United States to make a citizen of a native-born negro?

SENATOR JOHNSON.—I do not know that there is any particular clause that says the child of a native-born negro is to be a citizen, but it would be an extraordinary thing if under the judiciary clause it were not in the power of Congress to authorize a native-born negro, to use the language of my friend from Kentucky, to sue.

SENATOR DAVIS.—I reckon the language is good.

SENATOR JOHNSON.—I am not saying it is not good. I used it because I was sure it was good, as you used it. I would not have used it except upon your authority. [Laughter.]

SENATOR DAVIS.—You are getting modest.

SENATOR JOHNSON.—Now, Mr. President, if we can, by legislation, authorize the negro to sue, we are authorized to go one step at least toward making him a citizen. If we can authorize him to contract we take another step. If we authorize him to testify we take another step; and so to go on by assuming that we authorize him to do every other act that a white man can do, short of the right of voting, what is there in the Constitution which denies us the power to stop when we come to the exercise of that right? I can find nothing in the Constitution which leads to that result. It is a necessary, incidental function of a government that it should have authority to provide that the rights of everybody within its limits shall be protected, and protected alike. It would have been a disgrace to the members of the convention, in my judgment, if they had looked to the condition of things which now exists; or, without looking to that condition of things, if they had looked to the contingency sure to happen, and which was rapidly occurring at the time when the question became a matter of political agitation, that slavery would sooner or later be abolished by State legislation or State action, and had denied to the Congress of the United States the authority to pass laws for the protection of all the rights incident to the condition of a free man.

SENATOR DAVIS.—I differ toto cælo from the honorable Senator from Maryland upon this proposition. My opinion is that the Constitution of the United States never intended to place free negroes or slave negroes under the jurisdiction of the general Government at all; that the whole subject of free negroes and of slave negroes is left by the Federal Constitution, and was intended to be left by the Constitution, under the jurisdiction and exclusive control of the several States.

SENATOR STEWART.—Have we not a provision which is now a part of the Constitution which expressly provides that we may legislate on this subject?

SENATOR DAVIS.—That provision is revolutionary. Have Congress and the legislatures of the States the right to change our form of Government? Have they a right to establish a monarchy? Have they a right to establish a presidency for life? Have they a right to establish a Senate for lifetime, or a Senate that would transmit its honors and its offices to their posterity? Sir, the power to change the Constitution is a power simply to amend; it is not a power to revolutionize; it is not a power to subvert; it is not a power to change our form of government.

On Friday Lot M. Morrill [Me.] replied to the charge that the declaration of citizenship was revolutionary legislation.

If there is anything with which the American people are troubled, and if there is anything with which the American statesman is perplexed and vexed, it is what to do with the negro, how to define him, what he is in American law, and to what rights he is entitled. Hitherto we have said that he was a nondescript in our statutes; he had no status; he was ubiquitous; he was both man and thing; he was three-fifths of a person for representation and he was a thing for commerce and for use. In the highest sense, then, in which any definition can ever be held, this bill is important as a definition. It defines him to be a man and only a man in American politics and in American law; it puts him on the plane of manhood; it brings him within the pale of the Constitution. That is all it does as a definition, and there it leaves him.

It is not an enactment in the sense of the law. Everywhere where the principles of law have been recognized at all, birth by its inherent energy and force gives citizenship. Therefore the founders of this Government made no provision—of course they made none—for the naturalization of natural-born citizens. Therefore, sir, this amendment, although it is a grand enunciation, although it is a lofty and sublime declaration, has no force or efficiency as an enactment. I hail it and accept it simply as a declaration.

But, sir, this amendment is important in another aspect. It marks an epoch in the history of this country, and from this time forward the legislation takes a fresh and a new departure. Sir, to-day is the only hour since this Government began when it was possible to have enacted it. Such has been the situation of politics in this country—nay, sir, such have been the provisions of the fundamental law of this country—that such legislation hitherto has never been possible. Although I have said that by the fundamental principles of American law all persons were entitled to be citizens by birth, we all know that there was an exceptional condition in the government of the country which provided for an exception to this general rule. So long as that provision in the Constitution which recognized this exceptional condition remained the fundamental law of the country, such a declaration as this would not have been legal, could not have been enacted by Congress. But the Thirteenth Amendment has destroyed slavery, this exceptional condition, and therefore the present declaration of the result of that destruction is in order.

The Senator from Kentucky denounces as a usurpation this measure, and particularly this amendment, this declaration. He says it is not within the principles of the Constitution. That it is extraordinary, I admit. There is no parallel, I have already said, for it in the history of this country; there is no parallel for it in the history of any country. The ancient republics were all exceptional in their liberty; they all had excepted classes, subjected classes, which were not the subject of government; and therefore they could not so legislate. But that it is extraordinary and without a parallel in the history of this Government or of any other does not affect the character of the declaration itself.

The Senator from Kentucky tells us that the proposition is revolutionary, and he thinks that is an objection. I admit that this species of legislation is absolutely revolutionary. But are we not in the midst of a civil and political revolution which has changed the fundamental principles of our Government in some respects? Sir, is it no revolution that you have changed the entire system of servitude in this country? Is it no revolution that now you can no longer talk of two systems of civilization in this country? Four short years back I remember to have listened to eloquent speeches in this Chamber, in which we were told that there was a grand antagonism in our institutions; that there were two civilizations; that there was a civilization based on servitude, and that it was antagonistic to the free institutions of the country. Where is that? Gone forever. That result is a revolution grander and sublimer in its consequences than the world has witnessed hitherto.

But, sir, the Constitution even provides for revolutionizing itself. Nay, more, it contemplates it; contemplates that in the changing phases of life, civil and political, changes in the fundamental law will become necessary, and is it needful for me to advert to the events of the last four or five years to justify the declaration that revolution here is not only radical and thorough, but the result of the events of the last four years? Of course I mean to contend in all I say that the revolution of which I speak should be peaceful, as on the part of the Government here it has been peaceful. It grows out, to be sure, of an assault upon our institutions by those whose purpose it was to overthrow the Government; but on the part of the Government it has been peaceful, it has been within the forms of the Constitution; but it is a revolution nevertheless.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky insists that it is a usurpation. Not so, sir. Although it is a revolution, radical, as I contend, it was not a usurpation, because it took place within the provisions contemplated in the Constitution. More than that, it was a change precisely in harmony with the general principles of the Government. The change which has been made has destroyed that which was exceptional in our institutions; and the action of the Government in regard to it was provoked by the enemies of the Government.

But, Mr. President, it is said that this amendment raises the general question of the antagonism of the races, which we are told is a well-established fact. It is said that no rational man, no intelligent legislator or statesman, should ever act without reference to that grand historical fact; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Cowan] on a former occasion asserted that this Government, that American society, had been established here upon the principle of the exclusion, as he termed it, of the inferior and the barbarian races. Mr. President, I deny that proposition as a historical fact. There is nothing more inaccurate. No proposition could possibly be made here or anywhere else more inaccurate than to say that American society, either civil or political, was formed in the interest of any race or class. Sir, the history of the country does not bear out the statement of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. Was not America said to be the land of refuge? Has it not been since the earliest period held up as an asylum for the oppressed of all nations? Hither, allow me to ask, have not all the people of the nations of the earth come for an asylum and for refuge? All the nations of the earth and all the varieties of the races of the nations of the earth have gathered her. In the early settlements of the country the Irish, the French, the Swede, the Turk, the Italian, the Moor and so I might enumerate all the races and all the variety of races, came here, and it is a fundamental mistake to suppose that settlement was begun here in the interests of any class or condition or race or interest. This Western continent was looked to as an asylum for the oppressed of all nations and of all races. Hither all nations and all races have come. Here, sir, upon the grand plane of republican democratic liberty, they have undertaken to work out the great problem of man's capacity for self-government without stint or limit.

Then the honorable Senator advances one step further, and contends that not only was society formed in the interests of a race—the superior race, as he is pleased to call it—but that government here was organized in the interests of a race. I deny it utterly. I deny that government was organized in the interest of any race or color, and there is neither "race" nor "color" in our history politically or civilly—not a bit of it. Is there any "color" or "race" in the Declaration of Independence, allow me to ask? "All men are created equal" excludes the idea of race or color or caste. There never was in the history of this country any other distinction than that of condition, and it was all founded on condition.

We have been told, Mr. President, that this question of race was clearly recognized and settled in a case that was before the Supreme Court some years ago—the Dred Scott case, so called. But, as has already been pointed out by Senator Johnson, that decision expressly recognized that exclusion from citizenship was based on a former condition, namely servitude, and not on race.

JOHN B. HENDERSON [Mo.].—An individual of the Caucasian race, whether he pays a tax in a State or not, is undoubtedly regarded as a citizen of the United States. Why make it obligatory upon the Indian, owing no allegiance to any tribal authority, to pay a tax before he can be regarded as a citizen of the United States? As the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks] very properly remarked, the United States citizenship in that case is dependent upon nothing except the possession of property upon which a tax is actually paid. I suppose that, according to the rule adopted in the amendment, a State ought to be permitted to exclude any white man from taxation, and by so doing to deny him the rights of citizenship. Why not?

My point is that the Indian, if he is connected with no tribe, whether he is taxed or not, ought to be a citizen of the United States. What harm can there be in declaring that fact? What injury can it do? The State need not admit him to the franchise. He may be a citizen of the United States, and yet not have all the privileges and all the immunities of a citizen of the State in which he may be. The State may deny him any of them that it chooses to deny. But why not declare him a citizen of the United States? What harm can there be in that? It will enable him to sue in the courts of the United States to enforce his rights there, and I cannot see for my part what else it will do. As the Constitution now stands, of course the State cannot be injured in any of its reserved powers.

It can certainly do none of the States any harm to declare that the Indian himself, owing no allegiance to any tribe, and thereby not falling within the exception of the amendment as owing allegiance quasi to a foreign power (regarding the Indian tribes as foreign powers), shall be regarded as a citizen of the United States. Now that we are fixing the law on the subject, why not declare every man born in the United States to be a citizen of the United States, irrespective of race or previous condition?

Ought Georgia, or Florida, or Virginia, or any other State have the power to say, "We will not tax the negroes, and thereby nullify the declaration of the United States Congress that they are citizens of the United States"? If the mere fact of paying a tax in the respective States shall confer citizenship, why not make that applicable to the negro as well as the Indian? Why discriminate when laying down a great and broad principle?

JAMES R. DOOLITTLE [Wis.].—If you make the Indians citizens, they will not only have the privileges of citizens, but they will be subjected to the duties of citizens. They will not only have the right to sue, but they will be liable to be sued. They will not only have the right to make contracts, but they will be bound by their contracts; and that is a policy which the Government has resisted from the beginning in its dealings with the Indians, except with those Indians who have become citizens and liable to be taxed. Then they are regarded as citizens of the United States. Without going into the argument at length, I am decidedly of the opinion that, if by declaring the Indians to be citizens you are going to bind them by their contracts and permit them to be sued as other citizens are in the courts of the United States, the Indians are not yet prepared for citizenship.

So far as relates to the Indian population, they can be provided for specially by other acts of Congress when the question shall arise.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—What does that phrase "excluding Indians not taxed" mean? The Senator from Missouri understands it to be a property qualification to become a citizen. Not at all. It is a constitutional term used by the men who made the Constitution itself to designate, what? To designate a class of persons who were not a part of our population. That is what it means. They are not counted in the census. They are not regarded as a part of our people. The term "Indians not taxed" means Indians not counted in our enumeration of the people of the United States.

SENATOR JOHNSON.—Considered virtually as foreigners.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Considered virtually as foreigners, as a description of persons connected with those tribes with whom we make treaties. That is what the phrase means. Whenever they are separated from those tribes, and come within the jurisdiction of the United States so as to be counted, they are citizens of the United States. The Senator wants to know why, if an Indian cannot be a citizen without being taxed, should a white man or a negro be a citizen without being taxed? If the negro or white man belonged to a foreign government he would not be a citizen; we do not propose that he should be; and that is all that the words "Indians not taxed," in that connection, mean.

Senator Trumbull's amendment to the bill, declaring natives of the United States, excluding Indians not taxed, to be citizens, was passed by a vote of 31 to 10.

On Friday, the 2nd, Senator Davis returned to his fundamental proposition: that the negro, per se, without regard to his present or previous condition of servitude, was excluded by the Constitution from citizenship and therefore that a declaration that a free negro was a citizen was void and if made a part of the Constitution would be revolutionary. He asked Senator Johnson to point out the constitutional rule that made a distinction between a free negro and a slave negro in this respect. Senator Johnson again referred him to the statement concerning the matter in the Dred Scott discussion. Senator Davis replied that this was an obiter dictum, an expression of an opinion which was not a part of the decision.

The honorable Senator is the ablest living lawyer in the land. I have seen gentlemen sometimes so much the lawyer that they had to abate some of the statesman. [Laughter.] My honorable friend knows that, when an opinion is rendered by a court, the opinion is authority only upon the question before the court. It has often been assumed that Lord Mansfield, in the celebrated case of Sommersett, decided that slavery did not and could not exist in England. He decided no such principle. Indeed, if his obiter dicta had the force of a decision, which they had not, he decided diametrically the reverse. He said expressly that slavery existed in every English colony in America, that property in slaves was then recognized in England, and that the sale of slaves was a good and sufficient consideration to uphold a contract and a suit and a recovery upon that contract in Westminster Hall. But his sole valid decision was that there were laws in England passed by Parliament that were incompatible with the owner of Sommersett taking him forcibly from England back to a slave colony in the West Indies; that these laws required him to issue a writ of habeas corpus discharging Sommersett. He said, furthermore, that, but for those laws, he would not have granted the writ of habeas corpus, and it would have been impossible to do so.

But I go on; I beg pardon for this digression. I maintain that a negro cannot be made a citizen by Congress; he cannot be made a citizen by any naturalization laws because the naturalization laws apply to foreigners alone. No man can shake the legal truth of that position. They apply to foreigners alone; and a negro, an Indian, or any other person born within the United States, not being a foreigner, cannot be naturalized; therefore they cannot be made citizens by the uniform rule established by Congress under the Constitution, and there is no other rule. They could not be made citizens by treaty. If they are made so at all, it is by their birth, and the locality of their birth, and the general operation and effect of our Constitution. If they are so made citizens, that question is a judicial question, not a legislative question. Congress has no power to enlarge or extend any of the provisions of the Constitution which bear upon the birth or citizenship of negroes or Indians born in the United States. All the provisions, all the principles, all the rights which the Constitution established in relation to those matters are fixed, immutable as the Constitution itself, and Congress by no ancillary legislation can enlarge the effect or the operation of any of those provisions or principles of the Constitution, or of any rights that could be claimed under them. Then, if a negro is a citizen of the United States at all, he is a citizen by birth and by operation of the Constitution, and his rights are not to be increased or fortified, nor can they be weakened or restricted or diminished by congressional legislation. He holds them by a higher warrant than any law of Congress. He holds them by the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution cannot be interpreted, even, much less can it be expanded or restricted by a law of Congress.

But, admitting that Congress could declare negroes citizens against State laws and regulations to the contrary, the Senator said that thereby the bill became unconstitutional on another point, namely, that it discriminated in favor of one class of citizens (negroes), against another (whites) in that special provisions were made to enforce the rights of the former class, and that, too, by military instead of civil power.

When, sir, was such partiality ever shown for the white man, the sovereign, citizen, and lord of this land—him who made the Government, who won its independence, who established, as he thought, the deep and firm foundations of a free Government in a written Constitution, and whose mission it is to uphold and to defend that Government for himself and for his latest posterity? When was such partial, unjust, and iniquitous legislation devised for the white man who achieved all this good for his country and for the world? Never, never. But the negro and his insane friends bring up now for the first time such monstrous legislation.

If these are to be the results of the war, better that not a single man had been marshaled in the field nor a single star worn by one of our officers. These military gentlemen think they have a right to command and control everywhere. They do it. They think they have a right to do it here, and we are sheep in the hands of our shearers. We are dumb.

Mr. President, I do not know how soon, for my action on the present occasion, I shall be compelled to silence by the military power of my country, by the men who ought to be subordinate to the civil power. When the Father of his Country surrendered his military commission, his proudest and most glorious boast was that he had always kept the military subordinate to the civil power. Times have changed. The military power is now rampant and triumphant, and all we have to do is to bow our heads. But I live in the hope that a better day is coming, when the proudest military man in the land, with all his bloody laurels, will find that he is but an instrument in the hands of the law, and that he has to yield the same submission to the law that the humblest citizen of the land does.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—If the Senator from Kentucky has satisfied the Senate that he is dumb, I presume he has satisfied the Senate of all the other positions he has taken; and the others are just about as absurd as that declaration. He denounces this bill as "outrageous," "most monstrous," "abominable," "oppressive," "iniquitious," "unconstitutional," "void."

Now, what is this bill that is obnoxious to such terrible epithets? It is a bill providing that all people shall have equal rights. Is not that abominable? Is not that iniquitous? Is not that most monstrous? Is not that terrible on white men? [Laughter.]

Sir, this bill applies to white men as well as black men. It declares that all persons in the United States shall be entitled to the same civil rights, the right to the fruit of their own labor, the right to make contracts, the right to buy and sell, and enjoy liberty and happiness; and that is abominable and iniquitous and unconstitutional! With what consistency and with what face can a Senator in his place here say to the Senate and the country that this is a bill for the benefit of black men exclusively when there is no such distinction in it, and when the very object of the bill is to break down all discrimination between black men and white men?

Now, sir, what becomes of all the Senator's denunciation? The bill is applicable exclusively to civil rights. It does not propose to regulate the political rights of individuals; it has nothing to do with the right of suffrage, or any other political right; but is simply intended to carry out a constitutional provision and guarantee to every person of every color the same civil rights.

But, says the Senator, it breaks down the local legislation of all the States; it consolidates the power of the States in the Federal Government. Why, sir, if the State of Kentucky makes no discrimination in civil rights between its citizens, this bill has no operation whatever in the State of Kentucky. Are all the rights of the people of Kentucky gone because they cannot discriminate and punish one man for doing a thing that they do not punish another for doing? The bill draws to the Federal Government no power whatever if the States will perform their constitutional obligations.

The Senator goes on to say that there is no authority in the Congress of the United States to declare a person a citizen except it be by way of naturalizing a foreigner, and this in face of precedents I had shown him to the contrary.

SENATOR DAVIS.—I did not say there was no precedent for it. In my opinion, the precedents were inadvertently passed, and, at any rate, they were outside of the power of Congress.

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—The Senator chooses to regard everything to be outside of the power of Congress by denouncing it as such. As I said, his speech is made up of these denunciations. He is troubled about amalgamation, and becomes excited and vehement in talking about it. I should have supposed that at his time of life he would feel protected against it without any law to put him in the penitentiary if he should commit it. [Laughter.] Sir, we need no law of the kind where there is no disposition for this amalgamation. I apprehend that if the States prefer to pass laws on that subject——

SENATOR DAVIS.—Why did your own State pass such a law?

SENATOR TRUMBULL.—Does not the Senator from Kentucky know that we have a great many Kentuckians in Illinois? [Laughter.] A great many of his people settled nearly the whole of the lower part of my State, and, as they came over from under such a law and had to be restrained at home, we were afraid to risk them when they got into Illinois. [Laughter.] But, sir, now that Egypt[1] is redeemed, I do not think there will be any necessity for continuing that act in my State. [Laughter.]

SENATOR GUTHRIE.—If this bill passes, all the Southern States must remodel their laws upon the subject of offences. I would advise that there should be but one code for all persons, black as well as white; that there shall be one general rule for the punishment of crime in the different States. But, sir, the States must have time to act on the subject; and yet we are here preparing laws and penalties, and proposing to carry them into execution by military authority, before the States have had time to legislate, and even before some of their legislatures have had time to convene. I think the States of this Union are entitled to some little consideration before you inflict military government upon them.

I tell you, gentlemen, it is my firm conviction that the bill can lead to nothing but strife and ill feeling, which will grow and continue to grow. Where it will end God only knows. The time will not always be that the citizens will be content that the State governments should be interfered with, and that there should be in each State two sets of police officers, one to punish those who commit what they presume to be offences against the Africans, and another to punish the African for his crimes under the State laws, and that punishment should be made the pretence of prosecuting the white man in your courts. The thing will not work; it ought not to work; and it never should have been introduced here. It is not necessary to secure the freedom of the African. Slavery does not exist. The ordinary process and proceeding of law is ample for his protection. But when you overturn the State governments, interfere by your legislation with their laws, supersede their courts, keep up a constant contention between the individuals and the tribunals, you are destroying the unity of this Government and the purposes for which the States were formed.

The gentleman from Illinois says that this is simply a bill providing that all persons shall have their rights. I might return the compliment by saying that it is simply a bill declaring that we have established a military despotism and the laws are to be enforced at the point of the bayonet.

Senator Hendricks dwelt upon the coercive features of the bill, which he said were those of the Fugitive Slave law that the Republican defenders of the present bill had in times past so vehemently opposed and finally repealed.

Now you reënact these provisions, and you claim them as a merit and as an ornament to the legislation of the country; and you add an army of officers and clothe them with the power to call upon anybody and everybody to pursue the running white man. That is not enough, but you must have the military to be called in, at the pleasure of whom? Such a person as the President may authorize to call out the military forces. Where it shall be, and to whom this power shall be given, we do not know.

Henry S. Lane [Ind.] replied:

My distinguished colleague, if I understand him aright, places his objection to this bill, first, upon the ground that we have pressed into the service the machinery of the Fugitive Slave law; and, secondly, that we authorize this bill to be enforced by the military authority of the United States. It is true that many of the provisions of this bill, changed in their purpose and object, are almost identical with the provisions of the Fugitive Slave law, and they are denounced by my colleague in their present application; but I have not heard any denunciation from my colleague, or from any of those associated with him, of the provisions of that Fugitive Slave law which was enacted in the interest of slavery, and for purposes of oppression, and which was an unworthy, cowardly, disgraceful concession to Southern opinion by Northern politicians. I have suffered no suitable opportunity to escape me to denounce the monstrous character of that Fugitive Slave act of 1850. All these provisions were odious and disgraceful, in my opinion, when applied in the interest of slavery, when the object was to strike down the rights of man. But here the purpose is changed. These provisions are in the interest of free men and of freedom, and what was odious in the one case becomes highly meritorious in the other. It is an instance of poetic justice and of apt retribution that God has caused the wrath of man to praise Him. I stand by every provision of this bill, drawn, as it is, from that most iniquitous fountain, the Fugitive Slave law of 1850.

Then, if the military had been called upon to execute an infamous law like the Fugitive Slave act, where the sheriff and the posse comitatus were ineffectual to do so, owing to local opposition, why should they not be used now, under similar conditions, to execute a good law?

Senator Cowan said that the supreme objection to the bill was that in case of a conflict between the State courts and the military power the latter could decide and there could be no appeal to the Supreme Court. The Fugitive Slave law was unconstitutional in this respect, he held, and he could not see how this feature could be justified merely because it was applied for a good purpose rather than a bad. Even the Confederate States in their Constitution had enacted that State courts should be supreme in the restoration of fugitive slaves. Certainly in time of peace no military power should intervene between State courts and the Supreme Court.

I ask you where is this to end? If this is to be a consolidated Government, if all power is to be concentrated at Washington, if all the powers heretofore reserved to the States are to be given to this Government, let us know it. I am not very certain that, personally, I should have any very great objection to it. One great government for this great empire might be perhaps cheaper, might perhaps induce a greater homogeneousness among the people than the several State governments which exist now; but that is not the question for determination. We sit here by virtue of authority derived from the American people, hedged, limited, circumscribed, and bounded by the terms of the great organic law, the Constitution, and it is not for us to transcend that until the will of our principals in that behalf is known and signified according to the forms in that Constitution laid down for the purpose of making amendments to it. Then, I say, if we are to preserve this form, if this is to be a Union of States, and a Union of States which shall have all the rights reserved that have not been delegated to the general Government, and if that is the theory on which we are to proceed, if the people of the several States, in their domestic and civil and political relations, are to be regulated by the States, then, certainly, upon no known principle of the law can this bill be justified, and particularly by no known principle of any constitutional law or of any sound reason can the principle of substituting military power for a writ of error be sustained or maintained.

Senator Trumbull replied that the military were to be called in merely to aid the courts in executing the law —an office specifically provided for in the Constitution.

Senator Hendricks said the bill also conferred upon the military the authority to prevent a violation of the law before there was such violation, and therefore before a case could come before a court. Is that in aid of a court?

Senator Trumbull replied that this provision was based on the general constitutional authority for Congress to call out the militia "to execute laws of the Union." It did not take the place of a writ of error, for the courts still exist. He cited acts similar to the present one which had been passed under this authority, notably that passed in 1838, during Van Buren's administration, to enforce the collection of revenue.

The bill was passed by a vote of 33 to 12. Senator Cowan voted in the negative; Senator Doolittle was present but did not vote; Senator Johnson was absent; he would have voted against the bill.

The action of the House on the bill is thus summarized by Mr. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress":

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE

The bill immediately went to the House, and on the 1st of March that body proceeded to consider it without its reference to the Judiciary Committee. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, chairman of that committee, said they had considered it informally, and in order to save time it was brought up for action at once. The first amendment offered was to strike out "inhabitants" and insert "citizens of the United States," and thus avoid the embarrassments that might result from giving it so broad an extension. The amendment was promptly agreed to. Mr. Wilson, by another amendment, removed the difficulties suggested in the Senate by Reverdy Johnson, touching the question of marriage between the races. He supported the bill in a speech of great strength and legal research. He admitted at the outset that:

"Some of the questions presented by the measure are not entirely free from defects. Precedents, both judicial and legislative, are found in sharp conflict concerning them. The line which divides these precedents is generally found to be the same which separates the early from the later days of the Republic. The farther the Republic drifted from the old moorings of the equality of human rights, the more numerous became the judicial and legislative utterances in conflict with some of the leading features sought to be reëstablished by this bill."

The debate was continued by Andrew J. Rogers [N. J.], in the opposition, by M. Russell Thayer [Pa.], who made an uncommonly able speech in its favor, and by Charles A. Eldridge [Wis.], who tersely presented the objections entertained by the Democratic party to such legislation. There were some apprehensions in the minds of members on both sides of the House that the broad character of the bill might include the right of suffrage, but to prevent that result Mr. Wilson moved to add a new section declaring that "nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the laws of any State concerning the right of suffrage." Mr. Wilson said that the amendment he proposed did not change his own construction of the bill; he did not believe the term "civil rights" included the right of suffrage; he offered it simply from excessive caution, because certain gentlemen feared trouble might arise from the language of the bill. The amendment was unanimously agreed to. John A. Bingham [O.], Henry J. Raymond [N. Y.], and other prominent members of the House, to the number of forty in all, debated the bill exhaustively. It was passed by 111 yeas to 38 nays.

The President's Veto

The bill reached the President on the 18th of March (1866), and on the 27th he sent to the Senate a message regretting that it contained provisions which he could not approve. "I am therefore constrained," he said, "to return it to the Senate, in which it originated, with my objections to its becoming a law." The President stated that by the first section the Chinese of the Pacific States, Indians subject to taxation, the people called gypsies, as well as the entire race designated as black—people of color, negroes, mulattoes, and persons of African blood—"are made citizens of the United States." The President did not believe that this class possessed "the requisite qualifications to entitle them to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States." He sought to raise prejudice against the bill, says Mr. Blaine, because it proposed "to discriminate against large numbers of intelligent, worthy, and patriotic foreigners, in favor of the negro, to whom, after long years of bondage, the avenues to freedom and intelligence have now been suddenly opened."

"It is proposed by a single legislative enactment to confer the rights of citizens upon all persons of African descent born within the extended limits of the United States, while persons of foreign birth who make our land their home must undergo a probation of five years, and can then only become citizens of the United States upon the proof that they are of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed toward the good order and happiness of the same."

The President sought to impress upon Congress, in strong language, the injustice of advancing four millions of colored persons to citizenship "while the States in which most of them reside are debarred from any participancy in the legislation." He found many provisions of the bill in conflict with the Constitution of the United States as it had been hitherto construed, and argued elaborately against its expediency or necessity in any form.

"The white race and the black race have hitherto lived in the South in the relation of master and slave—capital owning labor. Now suddenly the relation is changed, and, as to the ownership, capital and labor are divorced. In this new relation, one being necessary to the other, there will be a new adjustment, which both are deeply interested in making harmonious. . . . This bill frustrates this adjustment. It intervenes between capital and labor and attempts to settle questions of political economy through the agency of numerous officials, whose interest it will be to foment discord between the two races, for as the breach widens their employment will continue and when the breach is closed their occupation will terminate.

"The details of this bill establish for the security of the colored race safeguards which go indefinitely beyond any that the general Government has ever provided for the white race; in fact, the distinction between white and colored is by the provisions of this bill made to operate in favor of the colored and against the white race. The provisions of the bill are an absorption and assumption of power by the general Government, which, being acquiesced in, must eventually destroy our federative system of limited power and break down the barriers which preserve the rights of States. It is another step, or rather stride, toward centralization and the concentration of all legislative power in the general Government. The tendency of the bill must be to resuscitate rebellion and to arrest the progress of those influences which are more closely thrown around the States—the bond of union and peace."

The debate upon the President's veto, says Mr. Blaine, was not very prolonged but was marked by excitement approaching to anger. Senator Trumbull, who had charge of the bill, analyzed the President's argument with consummate ability and readily answered him on every point of constitutional law which he had adduced. He did more than this. He pointed out with unflinching severity what he considered the demagogical features of the message.

"The best answer to the President's objection that the bill proposes to make citizens of Chinese and gypsies and his reference to the discrimination against foreigners is to be found in a speech delivered in this body by the President himself, on the occasion of a message being sent to the Senate by Mr. Buchanan, then President of the United States, returning with his objections what was known as the Homestead bill. On that occasion Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, said, 'This idea about poor foreigners somehow or other bewilders and haunts the imagination of a great many. I am constrained to say that I look upon this objection to the bill as a mere quibble on the part of the President, as being hard pressed for some excuse in withholding his approval of the measure. His allusion to foreigners in this connection looks to me more like the ad captandum[1] of the mere politician or demagogue than a grave and sound reason to be offered by the President of the United States in a veto message on so important a measure as the Homestead bill.' "[2]

Senator Trumbull argued with great force that the citizen has a counter-claim upon the Government for the comprehensive claim which the Government has upon the citizen.

"It cannot be that we have constituted a government which is all-powerful to command the obedience of the citizen but has no power to afford him protection. Tell it not, sir, to the father whose son was starved at Andersonville, or the widow whose husband was slain at Mission Ridge, or the little boy who leads his sightless father through the streets of your city, or the thousand other mangled heroes to be seen on every side of us to-day, that this Government, in defence of which the son and the husband fell, the father lost his sight, and the others were maimed and crippled, had the right to call these persons to its defence but now has no power to protect the survivors or their friends in any rights whatever in the States. Such, sir, is not the meaning of our Constitution: such is not the meaning of American citizenship. Allegiance and protection are reciprocal rights."

On April 6 the vote was taken upon passing the bill over the President's veto; the ayes were 33 and the nays 15. Every Senator was present except Mr. Dixon of Connecticut, still detained from the Senate by illness. Among the nays were Senators Cowan and Doolittle.

The bill went to the House and after a very brief debate came to a vote on the 9th of April—yeas 122, nays 41. Speaker Schuyler Colfax [Ind.] directed that his name should be called in order that he might have the honor of recording himself for the bill. He then announced that, having received the vote of two-thirds of each House, the Civil Rights bill had become a law, the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. The announcement was received with an outburst of applause in which the members of the House as well as the throng of spectators heartily joined.

ON January 8, 1866, James G. Blaine [Me.] proposed in the House of Representatives an amendment to the Constitution declaring that:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which shall be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by taking the whole number of persons, except those whose political rights or privileges are denied or abridged by the constitution of any State on account of race or color."

On the 15th of January Roscoe Conkling [N. Y.]

submitted a constitutional amendment on the subject, in two forms, making the proviso in one case that, "whenever in any one State the political rights or privileges of any man shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation," and in the other case that "when the elective franchise in any State shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color so denied shall be excluded from the basis of representation."

On the 22nd of January the Reconstruction Committee, both in the Senate and House, reported their proposed amendment to the Constitution on this subject. It was in these words:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State—excluding Indians not taxed; provided that, whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation."

The amendment was substantially the second form of that proposed by Mr. Conkling.

Mr. Blaine has reported the debate upon this measure in his "Twenty Years of Congress" [Vol. II, pages 194-204], and for it the reader is referred to his admirable digest.

The resolution was carried in the House—yeas 120, nays 46; but defeated (since it required a two-thirds vote) in the Senate—yeas 25, nays 22.

The report of the Reconstruction Committee was made in the House of Representatives by Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.] on April 30, 1866. It consisted of a joint resolution proposing an Amendment (the Fourteenth) to the Constitution with the following provisions:

1. No State shall "abridge privileges or immunities" of citizens of the United States; nor "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law"; nor deny him equal legal protection.

2. Representation in Congress shall be appointed according to population, excluding Indians not taxed; and, in States where suffrage is denied, male citizens over twenty-one years of age not debarred therefrom for "participation in rebellion or other crime," excluding these persons.

3. Former rebels shall also be excluded until July 4, 1870, from voting for Representatives in Congress and presidential electors.

4. Rebel debts and claims for compensation for emancipation of slaves shall not be recognized by the United States nor any State.

5. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Supplementary bills were also reported from the committee, admitting the lately revolted States to the Union upon ratification of the amendment, and declaring certain classes of ex-rebels ineligible to office in the Federal Government, these classes being in the main those excluded from acceptance of the amnesty offered by President Johnson.

Discussion of the proposed amendment began on May 8, 1866. Speeches were limited to one-half hour each, causing the debate to be condensed and direct.

Reconstruction by Constitutional Amendment

House of Representatives, May 8–10, 1866

Mr. Stevens opened the debate. He said that the proposition was not all that the committee wished, but all that public opinion would at present sustain.

Upon a careful survey of the whole ground, we did not believe that nineteen of the loyal States could be induced to ratify any proposition more stringent than this. I say nineteen, for I utterly repudiate and scorn the idea that any State not acting in the Union is to be counted on the question of ratification.

Mr. Stevens denounced the Senate for defeating the former amendment proposed by the Committee on Representation of States in Congress. It would, he said, have "secured the enfranchisement of every citizen at no distant period." He also denounced the Senate for defeating the amendment repudiating the rebel debt. It would, he said, "have gone far to curb the rebellious spirit of secession and to have given the oppressed race their rights."

After having received the careful examination and approbation of the committee, and having received the united Republican vote of one hundred and twenty Representatives of the people, it was denounced as "utterly reprehensible," and "unpardonable"; "to be encountered as a public enemy"; "positively endangering the peace of the country, and covering its name with dishonor." "A wickedness on a larger scale than the crime against Kansas or the Fugitive Slave law; gross, foul, outrageous; an incredible injustice against the whole African race"; with every other vulgar epithet which polished cultivation could command. It was slaughtered by a puerile and pedantic criticism, by a perversion of philological definition which, if when I taught school a lad who had studied Lindley Murray had assumed, I would have expelled him from the institution as unfit to waste education upon. But it is dead, and unless this (less efficient, I admit) shall pass, its death has postponed the protection of the colored race perhaps for ages. But men in pursuit of justice must never despair. Let us again try and see whether we cannot devise some way to overcome the united forces of self-righteous Republicans and unrighteous copperheads. It will not do for those who for thirty years have fought the beasts at Ephesus to be frightened by the fangs of modern catamounts.

Let us now refer to the provisions of the proposed amendment.

Here Mr. Stevens read the first section.

I can hardly believe that any person can be found who will not admit that every one of these provisions is just. They are all asserted, in some form or other, in our Declaration or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree. Whatever law protects the white man shall afford "equal" protection to the black man. These are great advantages over their present codes. Now different degrees of punishment are inflicted, not on account of the magnitude of the crime, but according to the color of the skin. Now color disqualifies a man from testifying in courts, or being tried in the same way as white men. Unless the Constitution should restrain them those States will all, I fear, keep up this discrimination, and crush to death the hated freedmen. Some answer: "Your Civil Rights bill secures the same things." That is partly true, but a law is repealable by a majority. And I need hardly say that the first time that the South with their copperhead allies obtain the command of Congress it will be repealed. The veto of the President and their votes on the bill are conclusive evidence of that. This amendment once adopted cannot be annulled without two-thirds of Congress. That the enemies of the amendment will hardly get. And yet certain of our distinguished friends propose to admit State after State before this becomes a part of the Constitution. What madness! Is their judgment misled by their kindness; or are they unconsciously drifting into the haven of power at the other end of the avenue? I do not suspect it, but others will.

The second section I consider the most important in the article. The effect of this provision will be either to compel the States to grant universal suffrage or so to shear them of their power as to keep them forever in a hopeless minority in the national Government, both legislative and executive. If they do not enfranchise the freedmen, it would give to the rebel States but thirty-seven Representatives. Thus shorn of their power, they would soon become restive. Southern pride would not long brook a hopeless minority. True, it will take two, three, possibly five years before they conquer their prejudices sufficiently to allow their late slaves to become their equals at the polls. That short delay would not be injurious. In the meantime the freedmen would become more enlightened, and more fit to discharge the high duties of their new condition. In that time, too, the loyal Congress could mature their laws and so amend the Constitution as to secure the rights of every human being, and render disunion impossible. Heaven forbid that the Southern States, or any of them, should be represented on this floor until such muniments of freedom are built high and firm. Against our will they have been absent for four bloody years; against our will they must not come back until we are ready to receive them. Do not tell me that there are loyal Representatives waiting for admission—until their States are loyal they can have no standing here. They would merely *mis*represent their constituents.

I admit that this article is not as good as the one we sent to death in the Senate. In my judgment we shall not approach the measure of justice until we have given every adult freedman a homestead on the land where he was born and toiled and suffered. Forty acres of land and a hut would be more valuable to him than the immediate right to vote. Unless we give them this we shall receive the censure of mankind and the curse of Heaven. That article referred to provided that if one of the injured race was excluded the State should forfeit the right to have any of them represented. That would have hastened their full enfranchisement. This section allows the States to discriminate among the same class, and receive proportionate credit in representation. This I dislike. But it is a short step forward. The large stride which we in vain proposed is dead; the murderers must answer to the suffering race. I would not have been the perpetrator. A load of misery must sit heavy on their souls.

The third section may encounter more difference of opinion here. Among the people I believe it will be the most popular of all the provisions; it prohibits rebels from voting for members of Congress and electors of President until 1870. My only objection to it is that it is too lenient. I know that there is a morbid sensibility, sometimes called mercy, which affects a few of all classes, from the priest to the clown, which has more sympathy for the murderer on the gallows than for his victim. I hope I have a heart as capable of feeling for human woe as others. I have long since wished that capital punishment were abolished. But I never dreamed that all punishment could be dispensed with in human society. Anarchy, treason, and violence would reign triumphant. Here is the mildest of all punishments ever inflicted on traitors. I might not consent to the extreme severity denounced upon them by a provisional governor of Tennessee—I mean the late lamented Andrew Johnson of blessed memory—but I would have increased the severity of this section. I would be glad to see it extended to 1876, and to include all State and municipal as well as national elections. In my judgment we do not sufficiently protect the loyal men of the Rebel States from the vindictive persecutions of their victorious Rebel neighbors. Still I will move no amendment, nor vote for any, lest the whole fabric should tumble to pieces.

I need say nothing of the fourth section, for none dare object to it who is not himself a rebel. To the friend of justice, the friend of the Union, of the perpetuity of liberty, and the final triumph of the rights of man and their extension to every human being, let me say, sacrifice as we have done your peculiar views, and, instead of vainly insisting upon the instantaneous operation of all that is right, accept what is possible, and "all these things shall be added unto you."

James G. Blaine [Me.] called Mr. Stevens' attention to the amnesty acts of 1862 and 1865, and asked:

Do we not, by the proposed action in the third section of the bill, place ourselves in the attitude of taking back by Constitutional amendment that which has been given by Act of Congress, and by Presidential proclamation issued in pursuance of the law? and will not this be justly subjected to the charge of bad faith on the part of the Federal Government?"

Mr. Stevens replied that a pardon, whether by the President having the power or specially by act of Parliament or Congress, extinguishes the crime.

"After that there is no such crime in the individual. A man steals and he is pardoned. He is not then a thief and you cannot call him a thief, or if you do you are liable to an action for slander. None of those who have been fully pardoned are affected by this provision."

Mr. Blaine replied that the constitutional amendment would be held to override the President's proclamation, being organic in its nature and therefore supreme.

"That is my understanding, and that, it seems to me, would be the legal construction; but, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, then I maintain that it is the bounden duty of this House to make the language so plain that he who runs may read—that there may be no doubt about its construction."

William E. Finck [Dem.], of Ohio, attacked the amendment. Its very proposition was confession of the unconstitutionality of previous measures, such as the Civil Rights bill, enacted by Congress.

The third section in particular he considered an absurdity. Fix a future date when a disaffected citizen should become a loyal one, and in the meantime develop his loyalty by imposing disabilities on him? Preposterous! The very proposition of the amendment was confession of the unconstitutionality of disfranchising citizens, which had hitherto been attempted without an amendment. The purpose was evidently partisan—to prevent the States lately in revolt from having a voice in choosing the next President. He said in closing:

Sir, a strange spectacle is presented in this measure. States are called upon to deliberate on proposed amendments within their own respective jurisdictions; and these very States are deprived of all opportunity of discussing or voting upon these propositions in Congress, and are States which it is gravely proposed shall not be represented, unless they shall first adopt amendments presented to them by two-thirds of the representatives of twenty-five out of the thirty-six States of this Union. And more than all, these States are thus invited to deliberate on the modest demand made of them to disfranchise a large majority of their own citizens, through legislatures elected or to be elected, by the votes of the very men who are to be disfranchised under this amendment. Sir, the proposition need only be stated to condemn it as anti-republican and wholly at war with all the well-settled principles of a free representative Government.

It is, sir, the assertion of a principle which may embarass the nation in the future. A generation who may come after us may deem it best for the true interest of a country which may then number one hundred million people, and fifty States, to modify the rights of some other States in their representation.

Sir, this measure is dangerous to our safety. It protracts an unfortunate contest without promising any beneficial results to the harmony and prosperity of the country. The time has come, I most respectfully submit, when the feelings of sectional hate and animosity should give way to the higher and nobler principles of magnanimity, of kindness, conciliation, and true charity.

Let us rise equal to the great occasion and imitate the noble example of our brave armies in the field, who, when the conflict had ended, no longer regarded the Southern people as enemies, but as friends. Let us welcome into these halls Representatives from all the States who may be true to the Constitution and the Union; and, when all these States shall once more gather around this common council chamber of the nation, then, and not till then, let the great questions of amendment be fairly discussed and voted upon.

Gen. James A. Garfield [O.] followed:

Sir, I believe that the right to vote, if it be not indeed one of the natural rights of all men, is so necessary to the protection of their natural rights as to be indispensable, and therefore equal to natural rights. I believe that the golden sentence of John Stuart Mill, in one of his greatest works, ought to be written on the constitution of every State, and on the Constitution of the United States, as the greatest and most precious of truth: "That the ballot is put into the hands of a man, not so much to enable him to govern others as that he may not be misgoverned by others." I believe that suffrage is the shield, the sword, the spear, and all the panoply that best befits a man for his own defence in the great social organism to which he belongs. And I profoundly regret that we have not been enabled to write it and engrave it upon our institutions, and imbed it in the imperishable bulwarks of the Constitution as a part of the fundamental law of the land.

But I am willing, when I cannot get all I wish, to take what I can get. And, therefore, I am willing to accept the propositions that the committee have laid before us, though I desire one amendment which I will mention presently.

I am glad to see this first section here which proposes to hold over every American citizen, without regard to color, the protecting shield of law. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Finck] undertakes to show that because we propose to vote for this section we therefore acknowledge that the Civil Rights bill was unconstitutional. He was anticipated in that objection by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens]. The Civil Rights bill is now a part of the law of the land. But every gentleman knows it will cease to be a part of the law whenever the sad moment arrives when that gentleman's party comes into power. It is precisely for that reason that we propose to lift that great and good law above the reach of political strife, beyond the reach of the plots and machinations of any party, and fix it in the serene sky, in the eternal firmament of the Constitution, where no storm of passion can shake it and no cloud can obscure it.

I wish to call the special attention of the House to the third section. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has made a point against it, which has at least this value: that, whatever may be the intention of the committee or of the House, the section is least susceptible of double construction. Some may say that it revokes and nullifies in part the pardons that have already been granted in accordance with law and the proclamations of the President. Others may say that it does not affect them, and will not apply to rebels who have been thus pardoned.

Mr. Stevens.—I admit that a pardon removes all liability to punishment for a crime committed. But there is a vast difference between punishing for a crime and withholding a privilege. Nobody will doubt that you may distinguish between classes in the privileges accorded to them if you think their enjoyment would be dangerous to the community. While I admit that the pardon will be full and operative so far as the crime is concerned, it confers no other advantages than an exemption from punishment for the crime itself.

General Garfield.—I was about to say that, if the section does not apply to those who have been pardoned, then it will apply to so small a number of people as to make it of no practical value; for the excepted classes in the general system of pardons form a very small fraction of the rebels. If the section does apply to those who have received the pardon, the objection of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] may be worthy of consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the third section is, in my judgment, the only proposition in this resolution that is not bottomed clearly and plainly upon principle—principle that will stand the test of centuries, and be as true a thousand years hence as it is to-day. If the persons referred to are not worthy to be allowed to vote in January of 1870, will they be worthy in July of that year? If the franchise were withheld until they should perform some specific act of loyalty, if it were conditioned upon any act of theirs, it would commend itself as a principle, but the fixing of an ordinary date, without any regard to the character or conduct of the parties themselves, is indefensible, and will not commend itself to the judgment of reflecting men. What is worse, it will be said everywhere that this is purely a piece of political management in reference to a presidential election.

Suppose this section should become a part of the Constitution, and suppose that it were entirely defensible as a matter of principle, I ask gentlemen how it is to be carried out in practice. If, under its operation in eleven States of the Union, nine-tenths, and, in some instances, ninety-nine hundredths of the adult population are to be disfranchised for four years, how do you propose to carry its provisions into practical execution? Will nine-tenths of the population consent to stay at home and let one-tenth do the voting? Will not every ballot-box be the scene of strife and bloodshed? It may well be doubted whether this section can be carried out except by having a military force at every ballot-box in eleven States of the Union. Are you ready to make the South a vast camp for four years more. I move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to report it back to the House with the third section stricken out.

The motion was not carried.

Benjamin M. Boyer [Dem.], from Pennsylvania, declared that the effect of the amendment would be to disfranchise for four years nine-tenths of the voting population of eleven States.

You cannot disfranchise a majority of the voters of a State without the establishment of an oligarchy; and the Constitution as our fathers made it guarantees a republican form of government to every State.

Besides, it is not for them alone that the Union is to be restored, but for ourselves also, and our children. Every hour during which we govern the eleven States with their twelve million people as conquered provinces carries us further away from the original landmarks of the Constitution and brings us nearer to centralization and military despotism.

William D. Kelley [Pa.] asked his colleague if "magnanimity required us to hand the Government over immediately to the vanquished but unconverted rebels?"

Mr. Boyer said that the people of the South were rebels no longer, but were prepared to send loyal men to Congress and therefore their right to be there represented could not be constitutionally denied.

In reply Mr. Kelley read a letter from an ex-Confederate soldier of North Carolina, who admitted the right of the Government to treat the States formerly in rebellion as conquered territory. The letter said:

"I have always held that it was absurd in us, after being reduced to submission by the Federal Government, to set up any claim of right to regulate the terms of settlement.
